in view of the early transfer of Mr. Richardson elsewhere. That enlightened section of the community which can always reason and think for itself has been disagreeably surprised at Sir Raymond's marvellous vagaries in matters legislative and administrative. The Honourable Justice West who fulminated from the High Court Bench and criticised the high-handed bureaucracy of the administration is now the Honourable Sir Raymond West, member of that irresponsible administration and its greatest admirer! So much for official consistency. We are now credibly informed that the local Government has recommended Mr. Webb for the Third Magistrate's place and that the nomination is now actually before the Secretary of State for sanction. It is superfluous to remind the reader that under the rules and instructions for the selection of persons to high judicial appointments issued by the Secretary of State for India in 1879, this nomination could not be legally made till it was sanctioned by that authority. Under the circumstances, the protest which the Bombay Presidency Association raised two weeks ago is certain to commend itself to all persons who know how in nominating Mr. Webb to the post the Bombay Government has absolutely cast to the winds, not only the original orders of 1879, but the same orders almost wholly approved by the Public Service Commission and the Government of India and confirmed by the Secretary of State. The memorial is a credit to the Secretaries, for we have seldom seen a public document emanating from a recognised representative public body so sober and yet so replete with incontrovertible facts—facts, which the section of the Anglo-Indian press which moves heaven and earth to get in Mr. Webb into a comfortable berth anyhow, at the expense of a qualified Native, has not been able to controvert despite its flippancy and light raillery. When a barrister has been out of practice for virtually ten years and when in reality he had no practice worth mentioning during his entire career at the Bombay bar, is it not mockery to appoint him a pucca Third Magistrate? We challenge those who have recommended Mr. Webb to give us proofs whether such an appointment would be conducive to public interests and to the efficiency of a most important branch of our judicial administration. Another fact should not be lost sight of. It is this that since the retirement of Mr. Dosabhoy Framji we have not had a single Native Magistrate on the bench. This we consider to be a positive scandal. They have more than one Native Magistrate on the Calcutta and Madras Police benches, and yet here we have had none for the last three years and upwards. Nay worse. The local Government is so callous of conscience, and is so reckless in over-riding the emphatic orders of the Secretary of State, that it would appoint a briefless European barrister of no practice, of no distinguished ability, and blissfully ignorant of the very A. B. C. of the vernacular languages of the local Court, to a post for which there are over a dozen Native gentlemen of proved ability—men who have been for years serving the Government zealously and assiduously, men who look to a vacant Presidency Magistracy as one of the few and rare prizes to which they have a special and a legitimate claim. Is that justice? Is it fair play? Of what use are the recommendations of the Public Service Commission, precious few as they are, if instead of appointing Natives to places strictly reserved for them, Dowbs are pitch-forked regardless of orders, instructions, rules, regulations and everything else? Lastly, age, again, is against Mr. Webb. He is over 45. And it is well-known that such a person is a real burden to the State, that is to say, to the tax-payers. For he must retire at the end of 10 years and add to the existing list of State pensioners. Thus the tax-payers are to be made to suffer doubly and trebly. The legitimate claims of their own countrymen are to be flagrantly ignored in the teeth of the orders of the Secretary of State, the burden of pension is to be increased in a shorter period than necessary, and, lastly, another instance of conspicuous judicial failure is to be flouted in their faces. Was there a job more scandalous than this? We therefore once more urge on the Presidency Association to prepare another memorial and send it to the Secretary of State without further loss of time if it is determined in the interests of the public to prevent the job from coming into play. [The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Grievances of Mahomedan pilgrims to Jeddah.

21. The Mahomedan Herald (4), in its issue of the 15th June, writes:—The pilgrim steamer "Sculptor" which left Bombay with 789 passengers was forced to leave Jeddah, the port of her destination, without disembarking any pilgrim.

When she returned to Bombay she had only 755 passengers on board. Thirty-four had perished in the interval of her departure and return. Making every allowance for the aged and the weak, this shows a death-rate of over 40 per 1,000 in the brief space of about 29 days. There must be some chronic causes to answer for this high mortality. Any one who has been fortunate enough to make the cherished trip, or has had occasion to hear the tales of woe, of those who have returned safe, will remember how general is the complaint that not the slightest regard is paid to the convenience of the pilgrims. The small vessels are so thickly crowded that each passenger barely gets 2 yards of space, which little room undergoes a further sensible diminution when we recollect the bundle of clothes of each passenger. What little room remains is just sufficient for him to squat down upon. It is in this cooped-up, uncomfortable position that he has to make a voyage of about 14 days. Such an unwholesome state of things produces its natural effect: accumulation of filth, followed by fever, diarrhœa, and cholera. The last carries off a large number of victims. Added to these avoidable causes there is the infliction of a doctor. This gentleman, who perchance failed to do anything on land, has gladly accepted a miserable pittance on board of a pilgrim-ship, in return for which he kills more than he cures. We have heard of a gentleman of this type, who possessed no diploma from a respectable medical school, but was a self-constituted authority on medicine. An idea can be formed of the professional worth of such men when it is known that they consent to serve a pilgrim-steamer for 50 rupees. Hence it is no wonder that such wasting influences as anxiety, despondency, general insanitation, sickness, unskilled treatment, doom to a watery grave a large number of the poor pilgrims. It has been estimated that fully one-third of the devotees never return to their homes. Those who escape the disastrous consequences of the voyage have one more danger menacing them on the land journey to Mecca. The roads are reported unsafe. Gangs of robbers fall upon the unwary traveller. It is high time that Government took a serious view of this state of affairs. We would recommend Government to appoint a commission similar to the Native Passenger Ships Commission, whose business should be to make a thorough investigation of the quantity of space allowed to each individual, of the causes that breed malaria, fever and cholera, of the qualifications of medical attendance, and of what steps should be taken to guarantee security of life to pilgrims on the hdj.

Remarks on a decision of Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona.

22. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 14th June, writes:—Some Europeans went to fish in the river near Dehu. The Pátil, the Kulkarni and the Mulla objected to their doing so there. Then there was a row, in which the village people assaulted the European soldiers. The Magistrate, Mr. Plunkett, sentenced the last to two months' rigorous imprisonment, the first to fifteen days' simple imprisonment, and the second to pay a fine of Rs. 200. The Magistrate in giving his decision observed that cases in which villagers assaulted Europeans had come to be of frequent occurrence, and hence the punishment inflicted in this case was purposely severe so as to make an example. For ourselves we have not heard of many cases of assault by Native villagers on Europeans. Our men are extremely timid, just as the European soldiers are bold to rashness. We therefore must demur to the remarks of the Magistrate.

23. The Native Opinion (14), in its issue of the 18th June, writes:—We beg to call the attention of the High Court to the case just now decided by Mr. Plunkett, the City Magistrate, Poona, in which three Natives have been convicted and severely sentenced for assaulting Europeans. If the facts are as they are stated to be, it must be said that the awe which the presence of a European in the mofussil inspired has disappeared and that Natives have become bold enough to venture upon attacks, wanton or otherwise, upon Europeans. This is what this case and the remarks of the Magistrate, to the effect that assaults of the kind were becoming frequent of late, would make us believe. For ourselves, however, we are loath to think that such a state of things has as yet come to pass. We think, and also know from experience, that the real facts are otherwise. It would not be far from truth if we say that assaults by Europeans upon Natives are becoming more frequent. In testimony of this we need only point out the numerous cases that come up before our tribunals in the various parts of the country, not to speak of those that are suppressed. The usual pleas of rupture of the spleen, &c., are, of course, in nine cases out of ten, given weight to, and the offenders let off with a nominal punishment. Natives may die, but that does not matter. The Dum-Dum murder case has not yet been forgotten, and so also the Delhi case of last year. We are, it is said, entering upon another aspect. We are told that it is the Natives who have now taken to assaulting Europeans, so much so, says Mr. Plunkett, that severe notice of it requires to be taken. Mr. Plunkett has been working as a Magistrate for many years. Will he have the courage to place statistics before the public in support of what he says? We hope he will, and we shall be thankful to him for undeceiving us. Let us see in the meanwhile what the alleged facts of the case, which is the occasion of the above remarks, are. In the district of Poona there is a village called Dehu, on the Indráyani river, famous for the tomb of the great Maráthe saint Tukárám Bowa. This river affords good fishing and so three young military officers, Captain Thomas, Lieutenant Westmacott, and Lieutenant Hamington (Worcester Regiment), took it into their heads on 1st May last to go out there on a fishing excursion. They had, of course, their servants and horses with them. This calvalcade went to the village with tents, and after pitching them there at a little distance from the river the operations were begun. On the first day they had plenty of fishing without any obstruction from the naughty villagers. But their good fortune deserted them the evening of the next day. Poor fellows! Had they ever dreamt that they would fare so badly at Dehu? That was indeed an evil day to them. They again resumed their sports, at that time trusting fully in the good sense and kindly feelings of the villagers. But the rogues cheated them. A number of them sally forth in a threatening attitude, and assuming a haughty and defiant tone tell the officers that they will not be allowed to fish in the river. Not only this. They produce and flourish before them an order from the District Magistrate, prohibiting fishing within 50 yards on either side of the temple there. The officers are completely non-plussed. Poor fellows! they are entirely frozen as it were. They desist and meekly appeal to the Pátil to point out to them the spot where they might fish. This that impudent village officer refuses to do, and the villagers, notwithstanding the submissive attitude of the officers, prostrate at their feet, rudely seize their fishing rods, their arms and wrists. Not only this. They play a still more revolting part. They pull them and attempt to drag them for trial before a fictitious court in the village! The officers were, however, very considerate. They generously refrained from retaliation in self-defence. They wisely saw no use in arguing or remonstrating with such villains. They give up their rods and return to their tents, cogitating over their bad luck. But still the villagers are not satisfied and pursue their aggressions further, emboldened by their previous success. They rush to the tents and do not leave until the officers give them their names. They return to their cantonment with fallen crests, but with the inward satisfaction that they had not in any way taken the law into their hands. Like so many children coming to their father or mother against their playmates after a quarrel, they report the matter to their Commanding Officer. He at once communicates with Mr. Reid, the Collector and District Magistrate. He forthwith orders a trial, and the insolent assailants on the meek European officers are at once hauled up before Mr. Plunkett. (We doubt whether he had jurisdiction in the matter, as he is the City Magistrate only. The case ought to have gone before the Mámlatdár and Magistrate of the táluka in which the village is situated. The accused were, however, dragged 20 miles to Poona, in order, perhaps, to suit the convenience of the complainants.) Three villagers, viz., Bálkrishna Bábáji, officiating Kulkarni, Bhagwantráo Dámodar, the Maráthe Pátil, and Mahomed Dadoo, the Mulla, are arraigned as principals of the unprovoked and cowardly assault. The trial lasted for nearly four days, and all the three being convicted under Section 352 of the Penal Code, of using criminal force, the first accused was sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 200, in default, two months' simple imprisonment; the second to 15 days' simple imprisonment; and the third to one month's rigorous imprisonment. Addressing the first accused the Magistrate is reported to have said that "he was the principal instigator of the offence and that the two accomplices were influenced (by him?) in the commission of the dastardly assault, which would have become most serious had the officers taken it into their head to act in self-defence." He also thought himself warranted in remarking that "the frequency of the assaults on European soldiers and officers by the villagers justified him in dealing as he had done" with the accused. So the trial came to an end, but the matter will not end there with two of the accused. In all probability the Kulkarni and Pátil will be declared by Government ineligible for their posts any longer. Such are the facts of this case. The reason why we request the High Court to send for the papers in it is that it presents several important points tending to show that the enquiry has not been exhaustive. The whole matter looks dubious. It is improbable to suppose that the villagers were guilty of an unprovoked assault. This is especially so when it is seen that the persons punished as ringleaders were not unknowing villagers but village officers, and as such knowing what the responsibilities of their positions were. It is quite possible that a provocation was given. The place is a sacred one and the villagers must have been annoyed to see Europeans fish in the river. There was also the District Magistrate's order prohibiting fishing in a certain portion of the stream. Moreover, the officers were allowed to fish without molestation for one day. It is impossible to suppose that the villagers were non-cognisant of their presence on the first day. Supposing that the case as presented is true, there seems no reason why they would not have made the alleged "wanton and unprovoked" assault on the very first day. The only probable story seems to be that the villagers on seeing the officers fishing, first remonstrated with them, and then on their refusing to desist, proceeded to prevent them from fishing. The very statement of their producing the District Magistrate's order goes to show that parleying was going on. If the officers were all along yielding and open to correction as they are represented to be, when they are said to have appealed to the Pátil to show them the spot where they might be beyond the pale of the District Magistrate's order, it is too much to suppose that the villagers were obstinate and not open to reason. Such an act of consideration would naturally have cowed down all opposition. This would have been so even if Natives had come to fish there; much more so if Europeans had been so noble, considerate and yielding. The villagers would have simply been overcome with joy. The statement that they retaliated indicates that the European officers were, in the beginning at least, obstinate and unyielding. On this supposition the subsequent conduct of the villagers, if it was such as was represented, becomes easily explicable. Their subsequent action, too, strengthens our theory. What did they do? They simply seized their rods and arms and proceeded to take them to the Fauzdár's chauki. That seems to have been the "fictitious" court and nothing else. The officers declined to go to the chauki. The villagers therefore rightly went to the tents to demand their names. This is what any person considering himself offended would have done. Very probably they wanted to report the matter to the District Magistrate whose order for the prohibition of fishing they possessed and exhibited to the officers. For these reasons we pray the Honourable the Judges of the High Court to look into the matter to see whether there has not been a failure of justice. The punishments are very heavy. [The Kesari (43), the Poona Vaibhav (54), the Arunodaya (20), the Rájyabhakt (117) and some other papers of the week are dissatisfied with the sentences passed by Mr. Plunkett in the case and call for a thorough enquiry into the matter by Government.]

The action taken by the Bombay Chamber of Commerce and the postal authorities in connection with the delivery of letters in Bombay considered highly creditable.

24. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 15th June, writes:—It is highly creditable, both to the Bombay Chamber of Commerce and to the Post Office, that the former moved and the latter promptly responded to the call for reform in the matter of the local delivery of letters. The Chamber of Commerce went the length of posting trap letters, and thus getting exact information as to the irregularities of postal deliveries, pointed out to the Post Office the precise abuses which wanted correction. The Post Office has readily consented to make the necessary changes, and Bombay will have the benefit of some additional deliveries, which will surely add to our convenience. The Post Office has in this case shown an example of ready compliance with popular wishes such as is not often shown by the executive departments of Government.

The Chamber of Commerce, too, shows a praiseworthy regard for public interests and an example which our public associations will do well to follow. Nothing is too small or too high for the Chamber to take notice of. From postal deliveries to high questions of State policy everything falls within the scope of the Chamber's deliberations, and its representations always command the respect of Government.

25. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 14th June, writes :—The public of Bombay ought to be thankful to the officiating Postmaster-General for the promptitude with which he has arranged to meet their wishes as expressed in the representation made to him on the subject by the energetic and resourceful Secretary to the local Chamber of Commerce. The new arrangements are calculated to remove many of the delays and inconveniences now experienced, and for this firstly Mr. John Marshall and secondly Mr. Atkins deserve the thanks of the commercial as well as the non-commercial public. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments. In acknowledging the receipt of the "Postal Service" of Bombay recently issued by the Presidency Postmaster, the Káside Mumbai (109), in its issue of the 17th June, says that it has supplied a long-felt want to the public, and that its translation into the local vernaculars would be a still greater boon.]

26. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 20th June, prays His Excellency Lord Harris to accord favourable consideration to the petition presented by about one thousand Native cricketers praying for the exclusion of polo from the Esplanade at Bombay as the sport of cricket has been growing quite popular among school-boys, who have little else to resort to in the shape of physical exercise, and their habitations are situated in quarters close to or round about the Esplanade, while the polo-players, who are very few and wealthy, will not be much inconvenienced by resorting to another piece of ground.

The petition of the Native cricketers in Bombay for exclusive occupation of the Esplanade recommended for the favourable consideration of His Excellency the Governor.

27. A correspondent of the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 15th June, says :—It is widely rumoured at Dhulia that on the 18th ultimo, while some travellers were going from Dhulia to Chálisgaon by tángás, they were attacked on the road at night by a gang of about eight highway-robbers, who were armed with swords, and were deprived of the valuable articles they possessed. As a thief is at times entrusted with valuables in order to prevent his stealing them, Government will do well to engage the services of the numerous Mángs, Rámoshis and Bhils in Khándesh for protecting life and property, and then the number of robberies will surely lessen. It is very desirable that Government should ensure the safety of passengers travelling at night on the Dhulia-Chálisgaon road.

28. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 19th June, writing from Daman says that an armed highway-man of the caste of Dubla is to be seen slily moving along the banks of the small river Kothal, which is about a mile from the town of Párdi, and he attacks and plunders lonely travellers both by night and day. The correspondent requests the police of Párdi to arrest and bring to justice the daring highway-man.

Part II.—Municipalities.

29. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 20th June, says that the silence observed by Government in regard to the appeal made to them by certain municipal commissioners of Sholápur on the question raised by the latter as to the Collector of that station having acted legally in having convened a meeting of the corporation a second time on the same day, without calling for explanation on the subject from the Collector

The conduct of Government in regard to the disagreement between certain municipal commissioners and the Collector-President of the corporation of Sholápur disapproved.

and the Legal Remembrancer to Government, who has given his opinion on the point in not sufficiently clear language, is certainly objectionable, and shows that the conduct of the two officials has been approved by Government. Such conduct, remarks the Samdchár, on the part of Government will, however, have the effect of making local self-government distasteful to the people, who will try to remain aloof from it.

Disapproval of the proposal of the Bombay Government to fill up the tanks at Broach.

30. In alluding to the letter from the Bombay Government to the Collector of Broach on the subject of closing the underground cisterns for storing rain-water in the city and supplying water to the city by other means, the Broach Mitrá (95), in its issue of the 17th June, observes:—It is not right to ask people to close their underground cisterns before a suitable provision is made, and we do not think the financial condition of the municipality is so good as to admit of undertaking expensive water-works. There are about 1,300 underground water cisterns, 29 wells and 2 tanks in the city. But these tanks get dried up within a short time and are therefore quite useless to supply water. Only half a dozen wells supply water, but these too sometimes dry up and people cannot entirely rely upon them for any length of time. Moreover, these wells are outside the city and are very deep, and are therefore inconvenient. The water from the river is drinkable only in certain parts of the year. Some of the officers are of opinion that the stored rain-water is not fit for drinking purposes, but they probably do not know that about three years ago, when cholera broke out, the authorities advised people to use only the stored rain-water.

The action of Government in regard to the Jambusar Municipality not approved.

31. The Bombay Samdchár (94), in its issue of the 19th June, says:—A material enhancement in the house-tax levied at Jambusar was desired by Government for the purpose of meeting the large expenditure which would be required for providing drainage and other sanitary works, but the municipality of that town having refused to make the enhancement on account of its unsuitability to the condition of the rate-payers, the municipal management has been taken by Government into its own hands. Similar disagreement has before this arisen between Government and several other municipalities. Taking for granted that the octroi duties are objectionable as maintained by Government and that the larger portion of the municipal income should be raised by a house-tax, it is not right to insist upon the complete adoption of this principle at one stroke as the people are not yet educated enough to understand its excellence and advantages and to be rid of old prejudices. Government itself has advanced the same plea of people not having progressed in education, when refusing to grant new concessions prayed for by them.

Part III.—Native States.

Remarks on the trial of the Senápati and others at Manipur.

32. The Rájyabhakta (117), in its issue of the 16th June, observes:—The conduct of the British Government in regard to the late Malhár Ráo Gáikwád of Baroda, the Rána of Porbandar, the Begam of Bhopál, and the Kashmere affairs was not fair and evoked adverse criticism, and the Government, in order not to give cause for similar remarks again, held a public enquiry into the recent disturbance at Manipur; but the decision of the military court will not satisfy the public, who desired that the trial should be held by able judges. Moreover, Government had no reason to interfere with the management of the Manipur State and to send an army, and therefore the disturbance so aroused cannot fairly be called a war waged against Her Majesty the Queen, and the Regent and the Senápati cannot be held responsible for it. The defence made by the Senápati is sufficient to warrant his acquittal, but if it be quite necessary to punish him for political reasons Government will be pleased to commute the sentence of death to one of transportation for life.

Resolution of the Bombay Government on Native States and the political officers in charge of them.

33. In alluding to the recent circular issued by the Bombay Government forbidding political officers from accepting Darbár hospitality, the Rájyabhakta (117), in its issue of the 5th May, received on the 13th June, observes:—Similar circulars were issued on previous occasions and Government have been induced to issue the recent one by the deposition given by Major Ferris, in the action for libel brought by him against the Rájyabhakta to the effect that political officers generally accepted Darbár hospitality for a day or so. The Native Chiefs will be glad if Government see that this circular is properly respected and its injunctions strictly carried out by political officers, since these Chiefs are menaced by even an ordinary Agency peon and it is hardly possible to expect that they will in any way displease high officials. Some of the Chiefs are made to defray the expenses incurred by political officers on their tours, and we know of certain cases in which such items are specifically entered in State accounts. Moreover, they have also to pay bills for articles purchased by the wives of Political Agents. It is necessary that the Bombay High Court should be vested with judicial powers over the province of Káthiáwár.

Alleged mismanagement in the States of Bhávnagar and Jámnagar and a request to Government in the matter.

34. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 21st April, received on the 13th June, complains that there is great mismanagement in several Native States in Káthiáwár and observes:—Although the Thákore of Bhávnagar has recently been honoured with the personal distinction of 'Mahárája' and notwithstanding Colonel Hancock's showering praises on him on his getting this honour, he hardly deserves them, for he has no spirit of independence in him and his subjects are hardly happy. The people of Bhávnagar seem to be so much exasperated against Mr. Sims that, if the latter had been present on the scene of a recent great fire that broke out in that city, some serious consequences would have ensued. The State is being filled with Pársis and other strangers, who have been enjoying themselves at the expense of the State. The Jám of Navánagar has not fulfilled the promises made by him to Lord Reay, and has become a puppet in the hands of Jánbái and Mr. Rághav Khavás, the latter of whom has very recently been dismissed from the State service. Mr. Maganlál, the Diwán, has failed to improve the State, and a Joint Administration alone will set matters right.

Complaints in connection with the Porbandar State.

35. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 12th May, received on the 13th June, learns that the mismanagement in the Engineering Department in the Porbandar State has so much taken up the time of Ráo Bahádur S. P. Pandit that he has scarcely had leisure to go into the districts, and that owing to a want of supervision the State servants in the districts have become arbitrary. The paper further learns that the police also has become oppressive, that long delays take place in disposing of law-suits, and that several intriguing persons with selfish objects are said to misdirect Mr. Pandit.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Abandonment of the Indian Councils Bill regretted.

1. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 19th June, writes:—The abandonment of the Indian Councils Bill seems to be quite in accord with the present regrettable policy of Government. The measure was harmless, and by their not passing it the authorities have committed a great blunder, for we are quite at one with the Bombay Gazette in thinking that by an indifference to its fate they have left it open to their successor to bring in a Bill of a more adventurous kind. Lord Cross's Bill, imperfect as it was, did not quite deserve to be discarded, for it conceded the solid advantages of the right of interpellation, the doubling of the number of additional members in the Provincial Councils, and of the right of discussing the provincial budgets. This action on the part of Government, we are grieved to say, is to be deplored and must meet with condemnation from every quarter.

2. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—The Indian Councils Bill has been finally abandoned. Its authors were evidently not proud of their bantling. It was a weak and puny little thing, but those who had brought it into being were probably afraid that if they were to nurse and rear it it might develop into a veritable Frankenstein. Lord Salisbury seems to have a mortal dread of granting even the smallest modicum of the elective franchise to Asiatic races, and he might have thought that the passing of Lord Cross's Bill would in the near future pave the way to a dangerous change vitally affecting the constitution of the Indian Councils. If the Premier had any such fear, there was really very little reason for it, for the Conservative Bill had not in it the slightest taint of the elective principle. We agree with the Bombay Gazette that by abandoning the Bill Lord Salisbury has rendered the possibility of a more advanced measure under the ægis of his opponents, should they succeed the Conservatives to power at the general election, more near and palpable than it might otherwise have been. The Bill would have given the substantial advantages of the right of interpellation and of discussing the provincial budgets. We should have rejoiced over the Bill if it had passed into law, on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread. It is, therefore, not without a sigh of grief that we read the telegraphic announcement in the papers this week that Lord Cross's bantling, after enjoying a fitful and precarious existence, was at last dead and was laid in its grave, unwept, unhonoured and unsung even by its very parents.

Disapproval of the heavy sentences passed on the rioters at Benares, and a request to His Excellency the Viceroy and the Indian Political Agency in England in the matter.

3. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 21st June, observes:—The riot that recently broke out at Benares was a spontaneous one and the local municipal commissioners are responsible for it. They selected the site of a temple for a pumping station and passed a resolution for the demolition of the temple, and thus wounded the feelings of the Hindus. Of those who were accused of taking part in the riot, sixteen have been sentenced to heavy punishment and an exceptional interest therefore attaches to the case. The punishments have caused dismay throughout India. Upon some of those convicted, sentence of solitary imprisonment has been passed. This kind of imprisonment is awarded to those alone who are found guilty of treason, and was hardly brought into requisition at the time of the Indian Mutiny of 1857. The amount of fine inflicted on some is equally heavy. It comes to about Rs. 45,000 in all, and if collected people will consider it nothing but jobbery on the part of Government. We request His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to show mercy to these prisoners, many of whom are said to be quite innocent. We also solicit the Indian Agency in England to move Parliament to take notice of the conduct of Sir Auckland Colvin, who took no steps to prevent the disturbance. Mr. White, Collector of Benares, who is now on leave, and Rája Shiv Prasád deserve censure. [The Ahmedabad Times (90) and the Gujarát Darpan (81), in their issues of the 24th and 25th June, respectively, express similar sentiments.]

4. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 22nd June, says that the fact of the Government of Bombay not having supplied a copy of Mr. Woodburn's report on the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act in the Bombay Presidency to the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha until the latter sent an appeal to the Government of India for transmission to the Secretary of State against the refusal of the Bombay Government, clearly shows the urgent necessity of the people of India bringing their grievances to the notice of their real rulers in England with a view to redress. [The Sudhárak (18) of the same date remarks that it is very shameful that a Government professing to carry on the administration in an open and straightforward manner should be so reluctant to furnish a corporation like the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha with a copy of Mr. Woodburn's report.]

The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and the Bombay Government.

5. In alluding to the case of a female who was charged before Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, on the 20th June, with stealing salt worth a quarter anna from a rock in the creek at Worli, in Bombay, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 23rd June, observes:—The Magistrate did well in censuring the officer who prosecuted the female and acquitting the accused, but this is not the first time that he has censured the officers of the Salt and Aṭhkári Departments for bringing before him such petty cases. It appears that the Magistrate's reprimands fall flat upon these officers, and it is time that Government should take due notice of their conduct. In their zeal to increase Government revenues these officers carry the law to its bitter end and thus make Government unpopular. Some time ago, several poor persons, who had used salt-earth in their food without paying duty, were convicted by a Magistrate in the Bengal Presidency of having evaded the duty, and when the question was brought before Parliament, the Under Secretary of State for India promised that steps would be taken to prevent the prosecution of poor people for such offences, but it seems that either he has yet done nothing in fulfilment of his promise, or his instructions, if issued, have been overlooked.

A request to Government to instruct the officers of the Salt Department to be lenient towards the poor people unconsciously committing petty offences.

6. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—Thanks to English barristers and High Court Judges, the Judicial Department is growing every year more and more acute in discovering flaws in procedure and defects in evidence. A highly organized bench and an ably constituted bar subject all testimony adduced in serious cases to a process of sifting, almost microscopic in its subtlety. But while the sifting machinery has been brought to such perfection, the collecting agency has remained at a standstill. The Judges and the barristers go through a certain course of training. There are schools of law and there are numerous books provided for such training. The Superintendents of Police, on the other hand, need pass no examination in the art of detection. There is no school to teach the art, and there are no text-books for the purpose. The theory of the Government, indeed, appears to be that detectives are born and not made. But the supply of born detectives is extremely limited, and therefore the public must rest content with the police force as it is now constituted. But is the public content? And we would ask, is the Government itself content? It is fortunate that the ghosts of murdered persons whose murderers have never been punished, have not yet learnt to make their appearance in Government House or to disturb the slumbers of the Inspector General of Police or of the High Court Judges. But it is certain that if the Government were to send for a special report from the trying officer in every case of acquittal of a capital offence, the revelations of the inefficiency of the police would be as astounding as any that a ghost could manufacture out of his unsubstantial brain. The alternatives open to Government are not more than two. Either let the judicial machinery be of a piece with the police machinery, or let the police machinery be polished and galvanized, so as to assort in some proportion at least with the judicial machinery. But it will never do to have a mole for your policeman and an eagle for your judge. Let either both be moles or both eagles. The collectors of evidence are usually paid a few rupees a month; the judges of evidence are paid thousands. The collectors of evidence are told, "You are so unreliable that a confession made to you is no evidence, and a statement recorded by you is also no evidence. You are not gentlemen." These men, whom the Legislature thoroughly distrusts, have to purvey for tribunals. It is these men who are the first to attend when a murder takes place and the first to hear what is said by the witnesses. The statements recorded by them are no evidence, but the statements made to them are evidence for the purpose of corroboration and contradiction. Virtually, therefore, a murderer has only to bribe these gentry, and all the witnesses can be easily shown to be liars. The bribery, of course, thanks to English law, can seldom be proved. We have placed our finger on the weakest point in our present system. We have known several criminals escape by means of such artifices. The Government seldom invites the criticisms of its judicial officers on the police, though it permits police officers to criticise judicial officers with considerable freedom. The Government is now supplied with a copy of the judgment of every court which sentences a prisoner to death or which confirms the sentence. Let it also issue an order for the supply of a copy of every judgment in which a person is acquitted of a capital offence, and request Sessions Judges to state in their judgments or in separate communications whatever might have struck them as defective or irregular in the police investigation. Let this simple suggestion be followed, and in a short time we are sure there will be plenty of material before the Government for a wise scheme of reform.

Suggestions for a reform of the police and of the criminal law.

Approval of the resolution of the Bombay Government on the Rájábái Tower tragedy, and disapproval of the further agitation in the matter made by the Pársis.

7. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—We had thought that with the fair and sensible Government resolution, which our contemporary of the Kaiser-i-Hind (86) calls an eye-wash, in the matter of offering a reward in the Rájábái Tower case and with the committal of Mánekji Asláji to the Sessions, the Párși community had got what they wanted and that there was no reason to be discontented. But it is not so. A private meeting of some of the Párși gentlemen was held on Monday last in the chambers of Mr. Setna, Barrister-at-Law, presided over by Mr. Sorábji Frámji Patel, and it was resolved that a memorial should be submitted to Government praying for a thorough and independent enquiry into the cause of the deaths of the two Párși ladies. We understand that Rs. 7,000 or 8,000 have been collected in aid of the furtherance of the objects in view, and that a vigilance committee has been appointed to carry them out; but what we fail to understand is the necessity for any further agitation at all in this matter. It would appear that Government are now perfectly cognizant of the whole case, and the resolution they have issued clearly shows their anxiety and solicitude to clear up the mystery. If they had the slightest reason to believe that an independent enquiry was necessary they would have certainly appointed a commission, but such suggestions are sooner made than adopted, and we admire the patience and firmness of Government in not allowing themselves to be carried away by the strong agitation of our Párși brethren. It is but natural that the Pársis should grow impatient and should show want of confidence in the police, but Government have to be fully convinced that there was really any intentional connivance on the part of the police before they sully with a stroke of the pen the prestige and reputation of the efficient Bombay police force.

Appointment of a committee to memorialise Government in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

8. The Kási Gofiár (87), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—A representative and influential committee of Native gentlemen, among whom we see the names of such distinguished citizens as Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái, Sir Dinsha M. Petit, Messrs. Naservánji M. Petit, Sorábji Frámji Patel, Jamsetji Bomanji Wadia, J. Cowasji Jehángir, Frámji Dinsha Petit, the Honourable Javerilál U. Yájnik, Messrs. N. G. Chandávarkar, Dámodar T. Moolji, Amirudin Tyabji and many others, has been formed for the purpose of memorializing Government for a thorough and independent enquiry into the Rájábái Tower case and all the circumstances connected therewith, and of taking the necessary steps to carry out the object. Messrs. Sorábji F. Patel and Frámji Petit have kindly consented to act as treasurers of the fund which has been started in connection with the movement and which has already gone up to some 18,000 rupees in course of four or five days. Dr. Bahádurji and Mr. Fardunji M. Banáji are the secretaries.

Disapproval of the memorial sent to Government to appoint a special commission to enquire into the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

9. The Káseide Mumbai (109), in its issue of the 26th June, observes:—The Bombay Police are zealously and creditably searching for further evidence about the real offenders in the Rájábái Tower tragedy, and it is not right that the Pársis and others interested in the matter should at this time memorialize Government to appoint a special commission for an enquiry into the tragedy. It is also to be regretted that the leaders of the agitation, in their desire to swell the number of signatures to the memorial, should not have taken sufficient care to explain the object of the memorial, and we feel sure that many of the non-Pársis would not have signed it if they had correctly understood its purport beforehand, and this is corroborated by a correspondent of the Bombay Gazette.

An independent commission to enquire into the Rájábái Tower tragedy considered imperative.

10. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—Now that the magisterial enquiry is over and Mánekji Asláji has been committed to the ensuing Criminal Sessions, a primâ facie charge having been established against him, it would not be amiss to review the situation in connection with the Rájábái Tower fatality. We refrain on purpose from commenting on all the incidents connected with that investigation, eventful as they are and challenge as they do severe criticism. For the present we leave Mánekji Asláji to his fate and leave the merits of his case to the nine men good and true who will be empannelled to try him on the charges of which he may stand arraigned by the Clerk of the Crown. What we are at present concerned with is the absolutely impotent effect of that ridiculous resolution issued by the Government the other day, warning the police that for the sake of its own reputation it should put forth extraordinary exertions to clear up the "dark mystery," and exhorting the "good citizens" of Bombay to come forward and give evidence on whatever circumstance they might personally happen to know in connection with the fatality. What then has the police done in pursuance of the letter and spirit of that precious Government resolution? Did it care to put forth any extraordinary exertions to obtain additional evidence to solve the mystery? We are absolutely in ignorance of anything of the kind having been done by that body. The only thing that was reported in the papers was that one day it passed in review order a few Mahomedans before the three Pársi children with a view to identifying the two Mahomedans supposed to have been on the balcony along with Mánekji Asláji. But we do not know whether even that report was true, or partially true, or wholly untrue. Beyond that report we have heard nothing. It is, therefore, reasonable to surmise that the police has remained as inactive after the publication of the resolution as before it. And it is for the public to judge whether such inactivity could be reconciled with the supposed reputation which it is said to have as detectives. It was not able to procure a single new witness in confirmation of the offence for which Mánekji Asláji was brought before the Chief Presidency Magistrate. Neither did a single "good" citizen come forward to volunteer as a witness. What are we then to infer from these two incidents? Are we or are we not justified in the observation we made last week on the tenor and spirit of the Government resolution? We said that it was an eye-wash. Is it not already proved to be one? In reality the police has cast to the winds that paper resolution too. It has considered it as much of a waste paper as we did. In other words, the police has all along been laughing in its sleeves, defying the public and defying its own Government. That is the exact attitude of the force under its present far from satisfactory Commissioner. Had the Government of Bombay been sincere in its intentions to cause the mystery to be unearthed, it would have never indited that resolution which it did and which is the subject of adverse criticism generally in the press. Both friends and foes have animadverted on it. We called it an eye-wash—and a veritable eye-wash it has proved to be—a perfect mockery, a public delusion and a snare. In fact, we cannot refrain from condemning that resolution in the strongest possible language at our command. It is a resolution lamentably lacking in statesmanship. It is devoid of any statesmanlike sagacity whatever, because there is in it no grasp at all of the fundamental axiom which constitutes statesmanship, namely, a true knowledge of the feelings, sentiments and aspirations of the people. If the police has egregiously belied its reputation, the Government has even more egregiously wrecked its, and failed to discharge that solemn duty it owed to the entire community of Bombay at this juncture. Here is a Government, supposed to be guided by experienced and sagacious Councillors, egged on by almost the deafening cries of a united public to appoint an independent commission of enquiry, on the ground that with the sort of police entrusted with the investigation of the foul crime no hope of a discovery of the real perpetrators could ever be entertained. Government was told that the public had somehow grown suspicious of it. Now, in times of excitement, when a police first defies public opinion, then proceeds to have its own working hypothesis for detection of crime without the slightest data for its hypothesis, and when, moreover, its attitude and behaviour at the Coroner's inquest plainly appear to be utterly repugnant to popular notions—an attitude and behaviour of an advocate for a criminal, when in reality they should be that of public guardians, sworn to detect crime and bring criminals to the bar of justice—when such were the plain and palpable elements, was it not a mockery to tell the same police that its reputation was at stake and that it should put forth further exertions to discover the "dark mystery"? For that matter they might have addressed that resolution to the police in Saturn or Jupiter. Only simpletons, if not people seized with insanity, could be capable of such a resolution. Ordinary common sense would rebel against it. Judges of human nature and human experience would have taken a warning and indited a resolution of an altogether different character. But it seems the Government was either incapable or had not the slightest intention to respond to the public cry. But because public opinion actually forced it to take some notice of the scandal, it went out of its way to allay popular excitement, nominally, of course, by inditing that most ridiculous of all ridiculous resolutions. It added insult to injury. The aggrieved populace ought, in our opinion, to have resented such an insult, so gravely offered. Government has throughout believed the police. That is written on the face of the resolution. And on the strength of that belief it actually went to the length of reading a lecture to the public at large, that it was no fault of the police if it failed to discover the crime at an early stage and if it was still baffled in its efforts to do so! What a monstrous travesty of facts! Was it unaware of the reasons popularly assigned to that state of affairs—witnesses appearing later on to volunteer evidence leading to the elucidation of the mysterious deaths? It has been openly said that everybody thought that the police would be able to discover it unaided, as it generally does. Why not in this case? Has it ever before invoked public aid in the fashion it has now done? But when it proclaimed, as it were, its incapacity or inability, volunteers came forward. And when they did, what was done? Is it necessary to remind the Government that they were more or less intimidated? Who after such browbeating could come forward at the Magistrate's Court? Now, in the face of such facts, which it might have learnt if it had cared to, instead of relying on the one-sided reports made by the police, was it not a pure mockery on the part of Government to issue that resolution? If it has deserved the fate which was expected, it is not to be wondered at. We emphatically say the resolution has miserably failed in its object. The police, in reality, is stronger than Government. This is the situation. What then is to be done? Surely, the public-spirited citizens of Bombay are not going to sit silent? To do that would be to belie their public spirit, which has on more than one critical occasion asserted its might and brought to bay the haughty and misguided authorities. Is that spirit sleeping or dying? Or is it awake? If awake, will it boldly venture to assert itself once more and prove to the Government and all India that it will not allow justice to be burked and murder to hide itself with impunity? We therefore call upon every person, male or female, child or adult, to raise an emphatic protest against the action of the Government—such a loud and vigorous protest as shall make its echo reverberate through all parts of the empire, in the Council chambers of Simla and of Westminster, aye, in the sacred hall of the august assembly at St. Stephen. Bombay to a man should arouse itself. For the honour and safety of its daughters, sisters, wives and mothers it should unite in entering a strong but respectful remonstrance, and demanding from the indifferent, apathetic and utterly misguided Government an independent committee of enquiry—a mixed tribunal, composed (say) of one experienced Judge of our local High Court, and two or three Native gentlemen of unimpeachable character. The conduct of the present police and its head should be searchingly enquired into. The reasons which led it, even before the Coroner's Surgeon had made an examination of the bodies of the deceased girls, to abandon the theory of outrage or attempted outrage and murder in which it firmly believed till that unearthly hour of 3 in the morning after the eventful occurrence, must be carefully sifted. The necessity for withdrawing the present police from the investigation of the case should be insisted upon. The public should also demand a complete reform of the superior and detective establishment of the police. It depends on ourselves, on our energy, our public spirit and our great resources to demand and get such a commission. We must therefore appeal to every man and woman in Bombay to awake, arise, and gird himself or herself to discharge a public duty which the Government has wofully neglected. The Government should be brought to its senses. It is in the condition of Philip the Drunk. Let us try by our united efforts to bring it to the condition of Philip the Sober, and show that Bombay will not tolerate the scandal which is now scandalising all classes of the community, irrespective of race or creed.

The Rájábái Tower tragedy and the Bombay Police.

11. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—Mánekji Asláji is committed to the Sessions. That was expected to be a matter of course. His fate will be decided at the Sessions. There is strong evidence against him—evidence furnished independently of the police; but, as we have already stated our belief, it may not be found by the Judge and the jury to be strong enough to convict him. The scrupulous regard with which the English law has provided safeguards against punishment being unconsciously inflicted upon innocent persons is illustrated by maxims like the one which holds that it is better that ten guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer punishment by mistake. If Mánekji Asláji is one of the persons who have done the horrible deed, his escape and the consequent escape of his accomplice, will be a grievous and terrible wrong, and the police will be held for all time morally guilty of having, from whatever motive, contributed to that wrong. The proceedings have advanced a stage, but the police have hitherto done nothing that we know of to justify the confidence evidently reposed in them by Government. There is no sign of making amends, however tardy, for their previous extraordinary attitude. They have apparently maintained all through the Police Court proceedings an air of sullen indifference and inaction. The Government might have perceived that the police, after they had pledged themselves deeply to a certain course which was opposed to the discovery of crime and had staked their reputation on it, were not expected to go on the right track, because of the appeal made to their honour and reputation in the resolution. It is painful and lamentable to think that a terrible wrong, which has rent asunder the heart of the public, should go unredressed, simply because it has pleased the professional detectors of crime to say that no crime whatever has been committed. This is a matter of public concern, because the larger question of public safety is involved in it. A due recognition of this fact is to be found in the formation of a large and influential committee which is not entirely composed of the Pársis. This being a question of truth and justice, as well as of personal safety, all men with a conscience are equally interested in it, to whatever section of the community they may belong. The very formation of the committee, headed by leaders of society like Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái and Sir Dinsha Mánekji Petit, is a slur and a stigma on the conduct of the police. It shows that the public have no confidence in them. It reveals the deplorable fact that the public have been forced to the necessity of taking upon themselves a work which, first and last, it is the duty of the police to perform. We hope the committee know full well that to draw up a memorial and to raise subscriptions is the easiest part of their work. By far the most difficult task they have to perform is to gather such evidence as may throw light upon the case and bring the culprits to their doom. It is a very tough, uphill work for them. In their search for truth they will have to make a hard fight with the Powers of Darkness. The police won't assist them, because they seem to think the public are under a spell of midsummer madness when they hold firmly to the belief that the poor girls have been the victims of foul play. Even now the Government may, if they choose, relieve the committee of a task which, however willing, they have neither the means nor the power to perform well and efficiently, by appointing a commission whose integrity, capacity and willingness for the honest discharge of the trust reposed in them may be beyond a question.

Remarks on the attitude of the Bombay English dailies in the Rájábái Tower case.

12. The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 25th June, writes :—The Rájábái Tower case, no longer a mystery, has received no sympathy from our English dailies, that sympathy having exhausted itself in pity for the police. Any theory of the police is considered good enough to account for the death of the two Pársi ladies, and any lack of zeal in endeavouring to discover its real cause, or any want of energy to lay bare the villainy that has undoubtedly been perpetrated, is not regarded in some circles as a failure of a public duty. But let us suppose that the ladies who were thrown from the tower were Europeans instead of Pársis, unmarried girls in the prime of life, favourites in society, and members of a highly respectable and respected family, and what would have been the attitude of the European press in that case? Would there not have been a daily outpouring of a revengeful wrath on the heads of the police? Would there not have been a stinging Government resolution, anxious meetings of clubs and cliques, and a large money reward offered for information that would bring home guilt to the real offenders? These things, and much more, would have been done to calm the troubled feelings of that portion of the public who were naturally interested in the fate of the European girls. "Suicide be blowed, and the police!" would have been familiar expressions in every mouth. And the Native press would have helped forward the cry of "justice!" The sympathy would be general and native money would not be wanting in searching out the delinquents. Mature reflection on the Rájábái Tower case reveals that it is only in such a case that the police would turn its back upon itself, and while bringing forward no evidence of crime, would take upon itself the office of advocates for the defence and show its hostility to persons coming forward to aid in the detection of crime. The case may end in a failure of justice because of defects in the evidence. This is probable enough. And when it ends in this way, where will be the public confidence in public safety? New villains and new kinds of villainies are being hatched in Bombay every day. This occurs in all large cities, especially where the people consist of mixed classes. The police should therefore be an ever advancing organization, with a highly qualified detective force. Does Bombay possess such a force, or are the criminal classes gaining in acuteness on the police? If the bereaved parents of the two Pársi girls can get no sympathy from our English contemporaries, their condition is indeed forlorn. The Native press has shown how clearly it has perceived and how willingly it has performed an imperative duty. When may the races of India unite with one heart in universal brotherhood if they may not do so on an occasion when the young, the guileless, and the beautiful are snatched away in a moment and made to perish in a fearful death? The press that will not allow itself to be wrongly influenced when public safety is at stake is the press that India wants.

The rumour about the contemplated wholesale attack on Pársis by Mahomedans of Bombay said to be utterly without foundation.

13. The Mahomedan Herald (4), in its issue of the 22nd June, writes :—We have not been a little amused to read in a Calcutta contemporary that the Mahomedans of Bombay, enraged at the repeated assertions of the Pársis that two Khojás were implicated in the mysterious deaths of the two Pársi ladies at the Rájábái Tower in Bombay, had meditated an attack upon the Pársis. We are in a position to assure our readers that the report is utterly without foundation. It is to be regretted that the Pársis, in their infatuation for their virtuous maidens, should have indulged in insinuations and comments involving the honour of two Mussalmans against whom nothing has yet been proved.

However trying and exasperating their expressions may have been, the peaceful attitude of our co-religionists is a sufficient sign that they have the good sense not to attach any importance to the wild effusions of sensational writers.

Alleged necessity for appointing a commission to enquire into all matters connected with the Bombay Police.

14. The Várthdhar (19), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—The state of things prevailing prior to Mr. Forjett's advent in Bombay as Commissioner of Police has again unhappily set in, and it is the bounden duty of the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris to rise and be equal to the occasion; for, we are afraid, much laxity is observable in the manner in which crime is now-a-days detected. The Rájábái Tower tragedy is a case in point. The attitude which the police assumed during the Coroner's inquest was really extraordinary, and has formed the subject of just criticism in every household. The jurymen, save perhaps one, when they saw the bodies of the two poor ladies, were convinced that there was indisputably an outrage, coupled with murder, and the medical men who were on the spot to examine them at the express desire of the police conclusively showed that there was foul play. Yet, with all this transparent picture, Mánekji Asláji, who suddenly appeared as soon as the tower gate was re-opened by the police, with pan supari in his mouth and in his pocket, is patted as a favourite child of theirs, ghastly and unattractive as his mien was notwithstanding. There is much that is rotten underneath, and an independent executive of the muscular, brave and bold type of the late Mr. Forjett is at this critical juncture sadly needed, not only to unravel the mystery of that sad event which everybody acutely feels as terrific, but of those singular cases akin to Mártand Ráo Bábáji Nágnáth and others (not yet come to public gaze) which have been nipped in the bud by intimidation and by giving threats to the parties concerned. A secret committee of able men ought to be nominated at once, whose avowed duty should be to receive every manner of complaint from the citizens of Bombay wherein their wrongs have not been redressed, to examine witnesses with closed doors, and then to submit their report to the Government for such action as they may deem expedient. Unless this is done with a strong hand, the present police system will continue to be a farce, and will remain in absolute odium for ever. We wish Lord Reay were still our Governor to put all matters right in respect to our police. We require a strong-minded Governor like Lord Elphinstone and a Secretary like Sir Henry Anderson to guide the policy of our police administration at this crisis in the year of grace 1891. The vernacular press is unanimous in condemning it. It has become altogether intolerable now, and we ought to have an adequate return for the enormous sum of money that is contributed by the people towards its maintenance. The Government, it is stated, has improved the Junágad and Jámnagar police, and we do not know why the Bombay police should thus be neglected. We have had enough of lectures on the duties of political officers, on relations between Collectors and Conservators. What we want now is, decisive action in relation to our city police. The absence of the Government on the Hills and in the Deccan, from April to November every year, does not enable them to see things transparently as they would have seen if they had stayed at the capital for a longer term than four months. They enjoy, and the public are left to their fate. There is no dread anywhere over the executive. The months of December to March comprise short days, and are principally occupied in levées, Native State darbárs, Legislative Council deliberations, convivial parties, balls and the like, which leave the Government no time to listen to the police and municipal complaints of the people of Bombay. We have salams on the one hand, frequent defalcations on the other. The Government ought to see to this in personam, and to hold constant conferences with local bodies, to administer rebukes and to bring them to their senses, if they are found wanting in the conscientious discharge of their legitimate functions. Masterly activity should be kept up, and then only will people be happy and contented. The Bombay Presidency Association, the local Chamber of Commerce and other public bodies ought therefore to bestir themselves and urge on the Government the indispensable necessity that exists at present for an immediate reform in this direction. Let us have a representative commission to probe thoroughly into all matters—fiscal, disciplinary and general—affecting the Bombay Police, whereby it may be improved and placed on a satisfactory footing, as it was in the time of Mr. Forjett.

15. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—The announcement of Mr. Webb's appointment as Third Presidency Magistrate of Bombay has raised such a howl of criticism that we revert to the subject once more in the hope that the Government will reconsider their decision. The Times of India alone stands out as the champion of Mr. Webb and has taken the opportunity to misconstrue the agitation in its usual flippant style. It looks upon the refusal of Lord Reay to appoint Mr. Webb as a gross injustice and his present appointment as a tardy recognition of that injustice and a consolation for his loss. We disagree with this view entirely. Not only do we think that Lord Reay's action was just and honest, but we also regard the permanent appointment as utterly unexpected of the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris. It was no injustice to Mr. Webb to be passed over before; indeed, it was an injustice too often repeated to have appointed him at all. It was unjust to the people of Bombay and to the large staff of Native Magistrates who look to the ordinary promotion in the service as a reward of their labours. By appointing Mr. Webb, Government will favour an individual at the cost of its recognised servants who have a right to look to those appointments as a reward for themselves. What has Mr. Webb ever done to deserve the favour of Government? The Bombay Presidency Association deserve the warm thanks of the people of Bombay for the second remonstrance which they have made in this matter. The rules are so clear and the policy to be followed so emphatically laid down in the despatches that it is impossible to see how they can be set aside. The questions to be asked are simple. Is Mr. Webb under 25 years of age? The answer is—No. Does he possess a thorough knowledge of the vernaculars? The answer is still—No. Is he a distinguished barrister? And the answer is again—No. It is such a gentleman that Lord Harris is asked to appoint to be a Magistrate in the foremost city of India.

Proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate in Bombay strongly protested against.

16. The Mahratta (5) of Poona, in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—In a short paragraph in our last issue we noticed a case in which three villagers of Dehu were sentenced by Mr. Plunkett, the City Magistrate, to various terms of imprisonment, who held that they were proved guilty of using criminal force towards some Europeans who were fishing in the river near the village. We then expressed our disbelief in the assertion of the Magistrate that such assaults had become frequent. In the very nature of things they could not become frequent. The villagers are yet in great awe of a topiwálla. The topi is not so familiar a sight as to breed contempt for it in their minds. The few sáhebs that they see now and then are all persons high in authority, whom they could never dream of assaulting. It would not be altogether undesirable if this awe in their minds lessened and they thought more of their self-defence. Then cases of assault on European soldiers by villagers would not increase, but rather cases of assault on Native villagers by European soldiers would diminish. However, this has nothing to do with the present case. The reason given by the Magistrate for the heavy (of course, comparatively speaking) punishments is not satisfactory. Moreover, if the Magistrate was convinced by the evidence before him that these villagers assaulted the European military officers, we think that most probably the whole of the facts did not come before him. These villagers showed the officers the Collector's notice prohibiting fishing within fifty yards of the river on either side of the temple. Secondly, they wished to take the officers to the chawki. Thirdly, they allowed them to go away on their giving their names. These three facts are very important, and we think they hardly support the theory of assault. They rather show a desire to proceed by constitutional means. If the villagers had been so minded, they could easily have handled these officers very roughly. But nothing of the kind is said to have been done by them. They probably only seized hold of the fishing tackle when they found these gentlemen fishing within the prohibited part of the river. Then, again, there is one more fact which also deserves to be considered when weighing the probability of the assault theory. It is said that the officers were allowed on the first day to fish

Remarks on the decision of Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, in the case in which three villagers of Dehu have been sentenced for assaulting two Europeans.

unmolested; the assault is alleged to have been made on the second day. This is also inexplicable. Why should the villagers have attacked the officers on the second day unless there had been some provocation? It is this which raises the suspicion that the whole truth has not come before the Court. We hope the High Court will call for the papers and see for themselves whether the ends of justice have been satisfied. The public naturally believes that in such cases the colour of the skin is looked upon as preponderating evidence of truth or falsehood in the eyes of the subordinate European magistracy, and although we are not prepared to say that Mr. Plunkett was swayed by race bias in deciding this case, still the suspicion which naturally comes into the mind of ignorant people ought to be set at rest by the highest judicial authority declaring that there is no ground for it.

A circular alleged to have been issued by the Collector of Poona about presents of fruits or other things.

17. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 22nd June, says that it has learnt that the Collector of Poona has issued a circular intimating that presents of fruits or other things should not be sent to him by anybody, and surmises that this intimation is an outcome of a recent resolution of the Bombay Government on the subject.

The way in which Government officers are said to obtain provisions.

18. The Bakul (22) of Ratnágiri, in its issue of the 21st June, says:—When Government officers in this part of the country are at their head-quarters, they obtain their provisions from dealers in the surrounding villages without paying them proper price; and when they are on tour they ask the police pátil of a village to procure for them every article they require and he has sometimes to devote the whole of his time to this private work. If Government issue strict orders in this matter and take care for their proper enforcement, the rayats will be relieved of many of their present hardships. Surely, the Government which is anxious for the welfare of the subjects of Native Chiefs cannot be indifferent to that of its own subjects. The only thing necessary is to bring such matters to its notice.

Impressment of carts at Dhulia.

19. A correspondent, writing from Dhulia to the Indu Prakásh (14) in its issue of the 22nd June, complains of the impressment of carts by Government peons at Dhulia without minding the inconvenience the forcible seizure causes to the cartmen in various ways, and says that this practice, if continued indiscriminately, will injuriously affect the interests of the large weekly market held at that place.

Proposed change of the head-quarters of the Kolába District from Alibág to Pen.

20. The Satyá Sadan (62), in its issue of the 20th June, says that the question of making Pen the head-quarter station of the Kolába District instead of the present head-quarters at Alibág was several times mooted by the district officers before this and is now said to be under consideration once more; but that looking to the inconvenience the change would cause to the people of Alibág and the expense it would entail on Government for building new offices at Pen, and taking into consideration the importance of the Alibág harbour in the event of a foreign invasion of the country, the change cannot be expedient on any ground.

Increase in the number of Coroners for the city of Bombay recommended.

21. The Akhbáre Soddgar (92), in its issue of the 25th June, observes:—At the time the Coroner's post was created in Bombay the population of the city was so small that one Coroner was thought sufficient, but the city has since expanded and its population has increased to nearly eight millions, so that one Coroner is no longer sufficient for his increased work, and unnecessary delay is caused in holding inquests and disposing of the dead, which causes great inconvenience to the public. There is at present a Deputy Coroner under Dr. Blaney, the Coroner, but he does not get remuneration and can act only when the Coroner is ill or absent from Bombay. We request Government to appoint a separate officer for holding inquests for each ward or division, for affording facilities to the public in the disposal of the dead.

22. The Sind Sudhár (156), in its issue of the 6th June, writes:—What a horrible and fearful sight is this—jail prisoners put to the labour of beasts! That man, superior to all other creation, should be treated in the same manner as a beast, is contrary to common law and common sense. Is there any law under which jail officials are empowered to employ prisoners in drawing bullock carts? We are not aware of the existence of any such law. But the tendency of these officers seems to be to engage prisoners in any work, be it the work of man or beast. We have often seen the prisoners of the Karáchi Jail drawing bullock carts loaded with sand and earth. It is not understood why prisoners are made to do this kind of work. A jail means, in other words, a house of correction, and a house of correction means an institution for the imparting of instruction by which prisoners may be dissuaded from following vicious courses and by means of which they may be enabled to earn their livelihood by an honest calling after their liberation from imprisonment. The labour of drawing bullock carts is not employment of a kind that prisoners after their release from confinement can find.

Disapproval of the practice of employing prisoners in the jail at Karáchi for drawing bullock carts.

Part II.—Education.

23. The Akhbáre Soddgar (92), in its issue of the 26th June, observes:—The Bombay Government is trying to gradually withdraw its grants to educational institutions in Bombay, but it ought not to do so as the public has contributed its proper share towards the promotion of education in this city by erecting costly buildings for educational purposes, by establishing libraries and laboratories, and by founding numerous scholarships and endowments. The Government has recently intimated to the local University that the annual allowance of Rs. 15,000 hitherto paid by it will be discontinued and that the University must now shift for itself. At a time when the financial affairs of the University are in an unsatisfactory condition this action of Government will tell hard on it. It is to be regretted that educational grants should be discontinued one after another in the régime of His Excellency Lord Harris, who has for his Councillor the well-known educationist Sir Raymond West, and it is surprising that Sir Raymond should not have protested against the decision disallowing the University grant. It is true that the Calcutta and Madras Universities are self-supporting and that the Finance Committee have recommended the Bombay Government to stop its grant to the University, but the financial condition of the latter is not good. It is feared that the Committee of the Syndicate, appointed to devise measures to meet this loss, will, along with other proposals, suggest an increase in the examination fees. This will cause students of the middle and lower classes much hardship, for they find even the present fees heavy enough, and the best course, therefore, to get out of this difficulty is to raise a large public fund.

Disapproval of the withdrawal of Government grant to the Bombay University.

24. The Moda Vritta (48), in its issue of the 25th June, says that now that Mr. Candy, Collector of Sátára, has, on examination of the New English School at Wái, recorded favourable remarks about its efficiency, Mr. Chatfield, Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, who has without proper reasons deprived the school of its grant-in-aid, should reconsider his decision and sanction a grant-in-aid to that school, and requests the Collector to exercise his influence in the interests of the institution which he has found to be in an efficient state.

Grant-in-aid solicited for the New English School at Wái.

Part III.—Municipalities.

25. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issues of the 25th and 27th June, observes:—We disapprove of the proposed transfer of the Bombay municipal funds from the Bombay Bank to the Exchange Banks, because the latter not being prevented by law from speculating in foreign exchanges and opium are not secure places for the deposit of municipal funds. Moreover, their head offices not being in Bombay, and as they do not publish weekly statements of accounts, people here are not in a position to know the true state of their affairs. The general conduct of the Municipal Commissioner has been such as to show that he is desirous of exceeding his powers, and under such circumstances it is not desirable to give him full powers regarding municipal funds. The Corporation should try to withdraw some of his powers and request Government to allow them to continue to deposit the funds in the Bank of Bombay even without interest.

Disapproval of the proposal to transfer the funds of the Bombay Municipality from the Bank of Bombay.

Discontinuance of the allowance paid to Mr. Lálábhái, Honorary Magistrate, Ahmedabad, by the municipality disapproved.

26. The Samsher Bahádur (118), in its issue of the 19th June, hears that Mr. Lálábhái, Honorary Magistrate, Ahmedabad, will shortly resign his post as the municipality has ceased to pay him the horse-allowance, and says that his resignation will cause widespread regret among the inhabitants of that city, because he is an able and experienced officer, and being of an independent spirit has always taken severe notice of the arbitrary conduct of some of the municipal servants. The paper further observes that it does not speak well of the municipal commissioners thus to deal in a niggardly manner with Mr. Lálábhái, who has regularly worked for about six hours a day, for the sake of making a paltry saving of Rs. 30 a month, when a handsome bonus of Rs. 3,000 has been recently given to the Sanitary Superintendent on his retirement on account of old age. [The Hindusthán (84) and the Ahmedabad Times (90), in their issues of the 21st and 24th June, express similar sentiments.]

Part IV.—Native States.

Foreign Office of the Government of India and the discussion in the House of Commons on Manipur affairs.

27. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—The discussion which ensued in the House of Commons on Tuesday last on the affairs of Manipur and the apology for defence made by the Under Secretary of State for India are certain to become a chapter in the history of that unfortunate State. For, they once more bring to light the somewhat odious character of British rule in India, so far as it refers to the influence which it exerts on our Feudatory States, dependent and independent, through that intensely centralising and petrifying bureau which is known as the Political or Foreign Department of the Government of India. Whatever be the history of its relations and influence with Native States in the past, it may be observed that that history has been well nigh effaced and that influence wrongfully abused since the inglorious days of the Penjdeh scare and the still more inglorious era of the forcible seizure of Upper Burmah. The continental instincts, of which Lord Dufferin was full, have almost changed the character of British rule with regard to our feudatories. He was really a master-mind in diplomacy and desirous of making India "imperial." It was, perhaps, during his Viceroyalty that financial embarrassments first commenced, the end of which, it would seem, is as far off as ever. The character of British rule was somewhat changed, and the ancient rights and privileges of the Native States came to be trampled underfoot. It was in him that the Foreign Office found an adroit tool. It is no wonder, therefore, to read in the memoirs of his late father written by his son—the present chief of the Foreign Office, Colonel Durand—that the holder of this office is "regarded by the bulk of the Native Princes as second in importance only to that of the Viceroy." So it is—such is the dread in which the Foreign Office is held by the helpless Native Princes and Chiefs of India. The ceaseless military activity going on on the frontiers of India, east and west, the existence of so many "punitive" expeditions at this moment, the imbroglio with Thibet and Kashmere, the institution of the so-called Imperial Service Corps, and many other political but secret movements unknown to the public, may, perhaps, be traced to the policy which prevailed before the present Viceroyalty. It may be justly said that to the influence which the Foreign Office has been able to exercise over all India from a long time may be ascribed the events which have occurred and are still occurring at Manipur since September last. It may be depended upon that the public will never get at the true history of the relations of that unhappy State with the Foreign Office, especially since the annexation of Upper Burmah. But whatever be the history of the crime of Manipur, one's moral sense of truth is shocked at the way in which the Under Secretary of State endeavoured last week to defend the action of the Foreign Office. The position of the Viceroy may be pitied. We take him to be an eminently peaceful and righteous Governor-General, who is sincerely desirous of acting according to his conscience in his relations with Native States. But, after all, what is a Viceroy in these days in political matters? By the very virtue of his position, by his very ignorance of the true knowledge of the past history of our feudatories, he is the unconscious instrument of the sharp business of the Foreign Office. And when he is surrounded by a bureaucracy, civil and military, with all its mischievous fads and foibles, hardly responsible for its acts and defiant towards Parliament—a sort of mortal god in India—it is hopeless to expect him to put down his foot with vigour on those schemes, and emancipate the down-trodden Native States from their existing thraldom. The Viceroy for the time being is helpless to assist them despite his best intentions. It takes him nearly the whole term of office to learn the history of these States—that is to say, history unwatered by the sophistries and the traditions of the Foreign Office. Meanwhile, he is entirely at the mercy of that office. If imbroglios here, there or anywhere occur, it is hardly possible for him to mediate and do good. If he be a strong-minded person and interpose his authority, setting at naught the practices of the Political Department, he must lament to the last day of his Viceroyalty that he ever interfered. For, from that moment the Foreign Department would set its back against him. Every attempt would be made to thwart his wishes. In short, the Viceroy himself may become the secret victim of that department, aided by the Catilines of his own Council. Either he must lay down his office in disgust, or shut his eyes and allow the upper hand to the Foreign Office to do what it likes. Such is its omnipotent influence! Recently some States fell owing to this paramount influence of the Foreign Office, and Manipur is now sharing its fate for the self-same reason. While the English press is, in ignorance, wrongly denouncing His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, we commiserate his unenviable situation. Heaven forbid that one should be a Viceroy surrounded by influences which surround every Viceroy in turn! But it may be seen how Sir John Gorst tried to minimise the "treachery" of the British with reference to the arrest of the Senápati, telling hardly what he ought to have. He tried to hoodwink the House of Commons by asserting that it was no unusual occurrence—the arrest of a Chief in open Darbár! Was ever such a statement made by a responsible Minister of the Queen to her Parliament? But we are surprised that it has passed unchallenged. He alleged that recently there have been several instances of such arrests. Why did he not enumerate them? Reuter has not informed us that he did. If he did not, we ask that some member of the House of Commons who holds truth to be dear to his heart, will have the courage to impinge the Under Secretary and demand from him a list of the arrests. Is it not clear that in these days of self-ambition, power, avarice and self-love, political morality is somewhat at a low ebb? For the sake of the British rule we wish it could be conducted on more righteous principles. Does not the Government seem to be precipitating to the verge of some disaster in the near future? It is this unrighteousness which is the most fatal error in the political administration of India. In the words of the late Major Evans Bell, it is this that "vitiates all our relations with these States, and that must in the nature of things do so, until by some great act of statesmanship they become incorporated with and discharge their true functions as component parts of the empire. That no real empire can ever be established in India until this fact is seen and no principles that are truly imperial can spread in the country, is a truism." Will the great English nation ever try to realise that truism in reference to Indian political affairs? Never, unless, as Major Bell further observes, there comes to the front a "strong statesman to strike once more the note that resounded for a time in Parliament and throughout the Empire in 1858, and produced that memorable Proclamation," and once more scrupulously and religiously acted on it.

28. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—The discussion ushered in by Sir William Harcourt on the evening of Tuesday last in the House of Commons, when moving for the production of the papers relating to Manipur, may be considered to be a prelude to the regular debate which is immediately on the tapis. It is not a little surprising to learn that Sir John Gorst endeavoured as usual to fence with this particular part of the question, as if such fencing could arrest the tide of the coming debate. We consider it a tactical blunder on the part of that astute lieutenant of the Secretary of State for India to have given to Sir William Harcourt the reply which Reuter has telegraphed. Very few in the House, we mean those on the opposition bench, must have been satisfied with the oracular response of that State official, that a debate on the conduct of the Government of India at this stage was premature. And very few on either side of the House must have accepted that mendacious statement, as mendacious as it is astounding, that "there was nothing unusual in making an arrest at a Darbár, as this had frequently been done recently." We in India have not known of such frequent arrests at Darbár. And it would, indeed, be news to the enlightened public to know that such is really the case. If there has been recently cases of arrest of princes or chiefs of Native States in their Darbárs, it may be said without fear of contradiction that Indians have absolutely no knowledge of them. Is it to be presumed that the Foreign Office of the Government of India is accustomed to have private inquisitions on and deport unruly chief or chiefs whose power or influence may be inconvenient and an obstacle to those precious "British interests" of which we hear so much in these days of degenerated politics? If, we say, the Foreign Office has on its private records cases of which Sir John Gorst speaks, the sooner they are made public the better. It is indeed a new revelation of the policy which the Government of India is insidiously pursuing in its relations with Native States, if what he observed to the House of Commons is a fact and not a fiction of the India Office, like so many other political fictions it now-a-days manages to handy before an ignorant and ill-informed House, which has no leisure to follow up such statements with a view to their complete verification. If, however, there really be cases of the character described, then we think it is high time, not only for Sir Willian Harcourt but for all members interested in the true welfare of Indian Feudatory States, whether independent or semi-independent, to demand from the Under Secretary a complete return of such. We would specially urge the British Committee of the Indian National Congress and the indefatigable and accomplished Secretary of the Indian Political Agency to leave no stone unturned to obtain such a return. For, such a return must raise grave political issues. It would show that, in the first instance, the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India in Council are guilty of the suppression of facts relating to Native States from the knowledge of Parliament and of the British and Indian public alike. How are we to know that arrests of the character referred to by Sir John, if made at all, were justifiable? Nay, the circumstance leads us to the serious inquiry whether the Foreign Department of the Government of India is accustomed to carry on its relations with Native States on the plan of the inquisition of the middle ages or on the plan so successfully in these days followed by the Third Section of the Bureaucracy at St. Petersburgh. And if so, is the Secretary of State for India in Council regularly kept informed of these inquisitions? Or is it that the information is entirely suppressed? Either Sir John Gorst is right in his statement or not. If he is, then the inquiries we demand should be at once set on foot. If not, then Sir John ought to be hoisted by some courageous member on his own petard. We think Mr. Maclean could very well perform this kind of execution on a high official of the position of an Under Secretary of State for India. It is also clear from the concluding remarks of Sir John that, owing to the massacre of the Chief Commissioner and other officers, the affair would remain an obscure page of history and that criticisms thereon would therefore be both unjust and futile, that he was intent on stifling the debate. When even his own slavish benchman, the great Sir Richard Temple, is unable to justify the arrest of the Senápati at the Darbár, it may be taken for granted how painfully conscious must the Ministerialists be of the weakness of the case they pretend to defend. Of course, under such circumstances the observations which fell from Mr. Stanhope are perfectly intelligible. While cautious in stating that he would refrain from defending the conduct of all concerned, he thought it his duty to add that Lord Salisbury's Government had full confidence in the policy of the Government of India. That this kind of impotent line of defence is the only line left to be adopted goes without saying. Mr. Stanhope and his party must have, however, been disagreeably surprised to find that the luminous common sense of the leading English press has treated with contempt such defence. Despite the meagreness of the contents of the Blue-book (Nos. 1 and 2) and of the further correspondence contained in No. 3 which followed it, the British conscience, in this case at least, has not been able to swallow all the sophisticated and plausible arguments urged by the Government of India in support of its action to have the Senápati arrested in an open Darbár. There has appeared on the scene at the most opportune hour an avenging Nemesis of the Government of India in the person of Mrs. Grimwood. She is, indeed, a noble woman. Regardless of official frowns, she, who has suffered so much on account of the moral turpitude of the Government of India in this discreditable Manipur affair, has done her duty by letting out the plain and unvarnished narrative of those two eventful days which preceded the lamentable tragedy of 26th March. There is no escape from it. She has entirely foiled the Foreign Department of the Government of India. It may be presumed that, but for her true narrative, that department would not have hesitated to send quite a different character of despatch than the one submitted to the Secretary of State. That was a virtue of a necessity. And the account that had to be sent was really one which left no other alternative to the public and the press but to declare that there was "treachery" on the side of the rulers of British India, who are never tired of proclaiming their sense of righteousness and justice in dealing with Native States. We are, therefore, sure that the coming debate will be so far useful as to leave emphatically on the records of the House a condemnation of the action of the Government of India. Long before a single paper in India attacked the Government for its unjustifiable interference in Manipur affairs, from the very commencement we observed that it reaped the whirlwind of disasters because it was the first to sow the wind of disturbance.

29. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 25th June, observes:—The conduct of the British Government towards some of the Native Chiefs, for instance, towards the late Mahárájas Holkar and Scindia and the ex-Ráns of Porbandar, has led Natives to believe that Government dislike able and independent Native Chiefs and Princes and are anxious to see them succeeded by such princes as would be mere puppets and would follow indiscriminately the wishes of European officers. Since the deaths of the former Holkar and Scindia, who had rendered valuable services to the British Government in the Indian Mutiny of 1857 and who were princes of independent views, the administration of their States has been conducted according to the wishes of the Political Residents, as the present rulers of those States have not the pluck of their predecessors, and it is because these States are governed according to the desire of European officers that the English press has been bestowing praises on their administration. Then again the Rána of Porbandar was dethroned because he would not care to please British officers; while in the case of the Jám of Navánagar, who is, as it were, an ornamental ruler and whose administration is not free from reproach, no steps for reformation have been taken. The recent declaration made in Parliament by Sir John Gorst while discussing the Manipur affairs, that it was better and safer to depend on mediocrity than on ability, has strengthened the general belief above referred to. This statement has naturally given rise to much adverse criticism in England, though Lord Cross tried to explain away the utterance of his Under Secretary in order to quiet the popular excitement; but this will hardly have the desired effect, because it is believed that the Secretary and the Under Secretary of State for India consult each other before replying to any question that is put in either House, and also because Sir John Gorst had once before made a statement to the effect that the Indian Government is quite independent and free to act as it chooses. It is a fortunate circumstance that the English press has censured the Under Secretary and supported the explanation of the Secretary of State for India; but all this is not sufficient to restore confidence among Native Chiefs and the people, who are waiting to see what steps are taken for its restoration.

30. In alluding to the same subject, the Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 25th June, observes that Lord Ripon rightly feared that the statement of the Under Secretary would excite suspicion amongst Indian Chiefs and Princes, and it is just possible that they might in future hesitate to appoint able Natives in their States.

31. The Gujarátí (32), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—It is, indeed, a very difficult feat for an honest and righteous critic to control his pen while commenting on the ghastly and shameful incidents of the Manipur tragedy. If we write on this painful topic with a little less candour than is justified by the circumstances of the case, it is because it is our desire that neither we nor our Native contemporaries should give an additional handle to the dishonest and shameless apologists of Government, some of whom have seriously proposed to the authorities to revive the Gagging Act against Native journals, forgetting that it is they who drive the latter into vehement writing by their enthusiastic defence of official measures, however unjustifiable or immoral. We believe no conceivable justification can be offered for the contemplated arrest of the Senápati in open Darbár, and yet the usual official ventriloquists have proclaimed it urbi et orbi that the paramount Government could do so, little caring for the disastrous consequences of such a declaration upon the minds of the feudatory princes within whose hearing it is so loudly trumpeted. Sir John Gorst declared the other day in the House of Commons (a declaration for which a Native journal would have been hanged, drawn and quartered by the infallible and immaculate official organs) that British rule in India is a despotism and a very arbitrary one. On Tuesday last there was a discussion in Parliament on Manipur affairs, and Sir John Gorst again surpassed himself by the statement that there was nothing unusual in making an arrest at a Darbár, as this had been frequently done recently. That such a clever and responsible official in the India Council should mislead the House by such an amazing assertion is simply incomprehensible. We wish he had named a few instances in which Government had arrested princes in open Darbár. It is, indeed, a significant commentary on the policy of the Indian Government that even Sir Richard Temple expressed in Parliament his disapproval of the policy in pursuance of which an unsuccessful attempt was made to entrap the Senápati into a snare. During the last fifteen years the Indian Government have done their best to weaken their moral prestige by embarking upon measures fraught with ruinous consequences to their rule. It was fortunate that Lord Ripon succeeded during his régime in once more winning the confidence and affections of the people. But with him departed all real statesmanship founded on the principles of justice, kindness and equality. Then Burmah was annexed by Lord Dufferin in the interests of England and the rayat of India deprived of even the pinch of salt that Lord Ripon had given him. Then came another Viceroy, by nature noble-minded on the whole, who was expected to depart from the Indian shores more appreciated and loved than his predecessor, who was never destined by nature to inspire love or confidence in the population over whom he ruled. We believe Lord Lansdowne would have satisfied the expectations formed of him, if he had shown those robust qualities of mind which distinguished Lord Ripon—inflexible strength and independence of character, and an unflinching adherence to the principles of justice and righteousness. We feel perfectly sure that if Lord Lansdowne had exercised his own independent judgment before sanctioning a wholly unnecessary expedition to Manipur for the removal of the Senápati who had successfully accomplished a revolution without a word of protest on the part of Mr. Grimwood with whom he lived on the closest terms of intimacy, and who was in no sense hostile to the Indian Government, no one would have heard of the disgraceful muddle which has shocked every right-minded person in India as well as in England. Where was the necessity for removing the Senápati after six months, during which interval he had thoroughly established his own and his brother's power? What was the Foreign Office doing till then? This question has never been answered. Lord Lansdowne lived in an atmosphere which has unfortunately proved too strong for him, but which never got the better of Lord Ripon. The series of blunders that have been committed from the beginning is still being continued. Now the Senápati, the usurping Mahárája, the Tongal General and others are being tried by a commission of military gentlemen, who from the nature of things cannot be expected to approach the cases in a perfectly judicial spirit. If Lord Lansdowne's Government wanted to wreak vengeance on the members of the ruling family, many would have liked the summary and straightforward course adopted by the Manipuris when they massacred Mr. Quinton and his party. But few people have any faith in the mockery of a trial conducted by the accusers themselves. From the nature of things the accused cannot possibly hope to obtain evidence to prove their case, and of course the evidence in the case must be of a one-sided character. Most shameless attempts are being made in some quarters to paint the Senápati and even his counsel in black colours. These accounts may gratify the hearts of those who are interested in proving black white and white black. But they cannot favourably impress the minds of disinterested spectators about the morality of such procedure. Manipur is not a feudatory State; at most it was a protected State: but Government had no business to interfere in its dynastic quarrels. They were as much, if not more, in the wrong as the Senápati. He had an excellent opportunity of dictating his terms when he made up his mind not to be entrapped so easily as was expected. He, however, acted indiscreetly. He is now convicted of waging war against Her Majesty's Government. Heaven alone knows if he ever really intended to attempt any such thing. He has been sentenced to be hanged, and very likely he will be hanged. The usurper also will probably be transported, and after the horrid executions of the guilty have taken place, the Manipur tragedy will be complete and the ends of justice and morality satisfied. We may, however, frankly tell Government that though they are powerful enough to send the Senápati, the Tongal General and a number of other Manipuris to the gallows in the supposed interests of justice or British prestige, people's faith in the honour and righteousness of British Government, which has already been not a little undermined during the last fifteen years by their own acts, has received a tremendous shock, and it is to be devoutly hoped that nothing will be done further, at least in Manipur, to intensify that shock by the adoption of measures contrary to the principles of justice and morality, which are as much applicable in the sphere of politics as they are in the ordinary concerns of human life.

Comments on Manipur trials.

32. Several other papers have this week made adverse comments on the trials at Manipur and expressed disapproval of the sentence of death passed on the Senápati. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 21st June, observes:—If the Senápati of Manipur has been sentenced to death for waging war against the Queen, the sentence is unbecoming to a just ruler. A generous and noble-minded ruler does not ill-treat an enemy taken prisoner in war, but treats him respectfully. In our opinion the decision arrived at by Government in the matter of the Senápati is such as will stigmatise British policy, and we think that it is not yet too late to reconsider the matter and to commute the sentence of death passed on him to simple imprisonment or to being kept under strict surveillance.—The decision come to by Government in which the prince of Manipur has been doomed to death in spite of the absence of evidence against him, says the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 25th June, confirms the popular belief of the present Manipur trials being a mere farce, and shows the British policy to be based on the principle of "Might is right" and the English people to be hypocrites in making professions of justice and humanity in their dealings with other nations.—The Bodh Sudhákar (9) of the 24th June also considers the Senápati and Jubráj of Manipur to be innocent and ridicules the sentences of death passed on them.—The Indu Prakásh (14) laughs at the Military Court at Manipur for sentencing the Senápati to death for having sided with Jubráj, and considers the whole action of Government in the affair to be disgraceful.—The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 23rd June, refers to Sir John Gorst's statement in Parliament that arrests in darbárs are not uncommon, and says that the common people are more safe than Native Chiefs, inasmuch as the former cannot be arrested without warrant, which is not necessary in the case of the latter. The same paper regrets that the Senápati and others should be doomed to death, while the questions of the propriety and legality of the intended arrests at Manipur and of the expedition ordered by the Government of India into that State are being discussed in England, and fears that the horrible sentences will be carried out before these questions are decided. So strange, exclaims the paper, is the constitutional procedure of the British Government!

33. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 22nd June, writes:—The Manipur trials are coming to their close. Prince after prince has been tried and found guilty of waging war against the Queen, murder, or abetment of murder, as the case may be, and condemned to death. The sentences await the sanction of the Government of India. The trials have proceeded so far unquestioned, and it may be presumed the sentences will be confirmed and the Manipur episode closed in due course. But a doubt suggests itself as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal, the propriety of the trials, and the law to be applied to the accused. Are the Manipur Princes subjects of Her Majesty? Does the Penal Code apply to them? Is the Court of the military officers appointed likely to be quite fair and independent? These are some of the questions which occur to us in reference to the trials, and which will doubtless be urged against the Government when the time comes for passing judgment on the whole expedition. To our mind, it would have been safer for the Government to have dealt with the prisoners under martial law. If the prisoners were implicated in the massacre of British subjects, as they probably were more or less, the Government is entitled to have justice done to it. But the Manipur Princes could not, we presume, by any stretch of language be called subjects of the Government. The war which Manipur waged against the Government was, it would seem, in the nature of one between two sovereign powers, whatever their relative strength, and the British Government after its victory might have exercised the right of the successful belligerent by exacting any penalty it pleased. Its present proceeding is open to the charge of being called a mock trial.

Approval of the resolution of the Bombay Government on Native Princes and the political officers in Native States.

34. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 21st June, writes:—No one except, perhaps, "some of those concerned" will take exception to a Government order which has lately been issued prohibiting political officers from enjoying the hospitality of Native Princes while sojourning in their territories. It is well known that the hospitality is on a most liberal scale. The sedulous care with which the honoured guest is provided with every comfort and luxury owes its origin more to a fawning desire to please than to the pure instinct of hospitality. Such treatment is liable to pave the way to a relationship between the prince and the "political" which may be open to serious objection. The Bombay Gazette affects to believe that the order will be regretted, not by the officers who quartered themselves upon the princes, but by the princes, whose lavish hospitality to their guests had been their delight. It is human to suppose that the regret for various reasons will be on both sides. The Government order is worthy of praise. The only thing now to be seen is that it is duly honoured in the observance.

Ráo Bahádur S. P. Pandit, Administrator of the Porbandar State, and the cases of alleged frauds in the Porbandar Public Works Department.

35. The Arunodayá (20), in its issue of the 21st June, refers to the comments made by the Bhávnagar correspondent of a Bombay English daily newspaper in connection with the alleged frauds in the Public Works Department of Porbandar, and remarks:—The correspondent is surprised to see that the Administrator, with almost absolute power in the State, with the resources of the State at his disposal, with the full approval of Government and the Political Agent to every step that he took, with expert assistance and with about fifteen months' full control of all documents, was unable to secure a single conviction. We should have believed in his surprise had there not been a white skin to counterbalance all the things in favour of the Administrator. If the Administrator is to be blamed in connection with these cases, why should not the Bombay Government be blamed for the Crawford case? If Rs. 20,000 have been spent from the Porbandar treasury on these cases the Bombay Government spent two or three lakhs, and if it is not right to blame the latter the former also cannot be blamed. But we are mistaken in what we have said above. The Bombay Government consists of white men, while Mr. Pandit is a dark man, and therefore he is guilty and likely to be punished!

1. The Varhád (Berár) Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 22nd June, says that it is a matter for joy that many people, young and old, have resolved and already begun to use, as far as possible, indigenous cloth and that associations to promote this object are being formed in several places. Considering the circumstances in which India is at present situated and also the principles of political economy, it is not, adds the paper, favourable to the interests of India to apply to the country the principles of free trade. Besides, the so-called philanthropic people of England are throwing obstacles in the growth of the cotton industry of India by trying their utmost to introduce the English Factory Act into this country. Government are not expected to safeguard the interests of India in this matter, as with it the interests of Englishmen are more connected. The leading men and statesmen in India are therefore requested to establish all over the country associations, the members of which will bind themselves to use none but indigenous cloth.

Establishment of associations throughout India for promoting the use of indigenous cloth recommended.

2. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 20th June, considers the Manipur trials to be a farce, and hopes that the Government of India will consider well before according its sanction to the sentences passed on the Senápati, Jubráj, and other accused persons.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Extracts alleged to have been taken from the diary of His Imperial Highness the Czarewitch regarding his Indian tour.

1. Under the heading of "Notes in the diary of the Czarewitch regarding his Indian tour," the Mahárâshtrâ Mitrâ (46), in its issue of the 25th June, contains the following note:—Once while in the bath tent I overheard an oppressed and respectable native of India murmuring as follows to my Secretary: "I am eighty-five years old and have seen several kings, their capitals and régimes; but none can say that the reception you have given me is not hospitable, civil and gentlemanlike. Though the connection of the English with India is very peculiar, they are not afraid of anybody. They call themselves rulers, but are ignorant of the manners, customs and religion of the Hindus. The disrespect which they show the Hindus in religious matters is such as no living being can put up with. The English as soon as they subjugate a people effect a change in the manners, customs and religious practices of the latter, who are consequently much distressed. The English are good rulers, but thinking that their manners, customs and religion are good and those of the Natives bad, they have become arrogant, oppressive and imperious in their behaviour. Their conduct is in conformity with their ideas towards their equals alone, but towards those whom they have conquered they behave just as they like. They say, 'We have taken India from the Natives by force, not with selfish motives, but for their own welfare.' This is mere humbug. In consequence of their association with us we have learnt to distinguish truth from falsehood, and if we had sufficient strength we should have enlightened the minds of the English in no time. But what should we do? The leader of the solar race has gone to the west. Please entreat the Czarewitch to remonstrate with the English. There are many things which are worth being brought to His Imperial Highness' notice, but I lay before you only the principal of them." The same man, when I came out of the bath room, bowed to me and said:—"There are no rulers like the English and we wish to be under their control as long as we live. But their conduct towards us is arrogant instead of affectionate. Your Highness is their benefactor, or else you could not have gone about in India so safely. Moreover, our rulers are in awe of you. We shall therefore feel obliged if you create in their mind mercy for us." I consented to do so and asked him to let me know their grievances.

2. The same paper under the same heading, in its issue of the 2nd July, notices the following grievances of India:—"We do not ask the English rulers for anything but affection; they have, however, no desire to show it. I have observed no Englishman seeking means to secure the respect and confidence of the people. An individual officer or two might be doing so, but it will be a mistake to say the same of all. It is true that the subjects should not hate their ruler, but if he has deprived them of happiness, is it not natural for them to cry out constantly that he has plundered, deceived and ruined them? Suppose the English hand over to you the Madras Presidency in consideration of your keeping quiet on the Afghan frontiers and your officers turn out more oppressive than the English, will you call us disloyal if we, in that case, invoke the help of the English? If you do so and the people of India find fault with you and you are irritated, will it be wrong to say that you cannot judge of others from your own case? If there is a real desire to convince the natives of India that the English rulers are solicitous about their welfare, there is only one remedy that ought to be used and that is to be careful about their interests. I am quite sure that he who goes to India with benevolent intentions, and with the clear understanding that it is his duty to love the people, will never return to his country without earning a great reward, which is their love and confidence. I tell you solemnly that he who wishes to rule over India must behave himself so as to secure the confidence of the people. Sir, I tell you that these Englishmen often act against this principle. We have been disarmed, overburdened with taxes and dealt with unjustly. Yet we are not discontented. We say to ourselves that the English will, in consideration of our faithful service, feel repentant and come to their senses one day or other. But no, do not think it possible at all. Of late, they have become so indifferent that with the restrictions and threats of law they have been oppressing the people right and left. There is not a single person in India who will advise the English and make them behave well. They consult no persons except a few flatterers." In the meantime another man came and said: "The kingdom of a ruler who does not rule over his subjects with affection is like a worm-eaten fabric. What, if one is a ruler? He must give a helping hand to each of his subjects, for, if the latter are estranged, the State is ruined in an instant. Who is unaware of this? It is wrong that the rulers should boast that they are superior even to the educated and generous natives of India. The rulers must respect the manners and customs of the subjects. Because there are some dilapidated buildings in India it is not right to jump to the conclusion that their foundations are also useless. Have you ever in the course of your tour come across any instance of our disloyalty? Is it right and just that a man should be charged with disaffection for saying that an act is oppressive or that a certain Government servant's conduct is censurable?"

Parliamentary debates on Indian matters and advice to the people of India not to be led away by them.

3. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 29th June, in an article, headed, "We forget our principal object," reminds the people of India of the Parliamentary debates which have been carried on by members interested in Indian matters for the last century and a half on diverse errors and irregularities of Indian administration and of their having never resulted in the actual rectification of the mistakes or the redress of the grievances proved to be in existence after long debates, and as instances in point refers to the discussion which took place in Parliament on the treatment of Chaitsing, Rája of Benares, by Warren Hastings, and to the diverse literary efforts made to establish the iniquity of the annexation policy of Lord Dalhousie towards the Native States of India, and pointedly asks if in either of these cases or in any other similar case a single Englishman has ever proposed that the State unjustly seized should be restored to its proper owner. Accustomed as the British rulers of India are, remarks the paper, to hollow and useless talk about the rightness or otherwise of things, all their high-sounding debates only serve to point out to the world the helplessness of the Indian people and the might and dexterity of the British Government in depriving the Natives of their proprietary and other rights. The paper, in conclusion, advises the people to forget their mutual differences like those arising from the Age of Consent Bill and to make a common cause and exert themselves in unity in furtherance of movements like the Indian National Congress in the interests of their own country, with a steadiness and singleness of purpose like that of their rulers, the English.

Necessity of having a strong public opinion in India.

4. The same newspaper refers to the old days when the agents of the British Government approached the Mogal Emperors bare-footed, bare-headed and with their hands tied with a handkerchief without minding the greatness of their own nation, and to the general tendency observable in all classes of Englishmen to forget, if need be, their real position and to adopt a time-serving policy, and says that the secret of the present grandeur and greatness of the British rule in India lies in this time-serving policy and that its absence or neglect is the principal cause of the weakness of the Indian people and of their being ruled over in a despotic manner by the British without regard to public opinion. It is unmeaning, adds the paper, to say that there is no public opinion in India when the fact is that all the people are at one on important questions like the Indian National Congress being an organ expressing the views of all the people in the country, the necessity of increased expenditure on education, the need of greater encouragement being given to Indian manufactures, a more extensive employment of the Natives in the administration of the country and such other questions. There is no denying, however, admits the paper, that public opinion in India is, as Mr. Lee-Warner maintains, weak and feeble, since it is made light of by the Viceroy and exercises very little influence on the administration of the country, as, for instance, in the case of the duty on salt, which was declared in a resolution by the Indian National Congress to be excessive on the one hand while on the other it was raised by 8 annas by the Viceroy. The paper, in conclusion, asks the people to make their opinion strong, so that the Government may not disregard it with impunity.

5. The Gujarát Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—The Secretary of State's resolution communicated to the Government of India, that he has considered Act X of 1891 in Council and that the Age of Consent Bill passes into the statute book, will be read with universal satisfaction. For the opponents of the Bill, the communication is, of course, sad enough. But say what these people may, we are bound to admit that the Age of Consent Act will ever remain a standing proof of the humanity and benevolence of British statesmanship. All that can now be desired is that the people of India should act in obedience to the law thus laid down, and virtually wipe out in course of time the slur cast upon them as the monstrous oppressors of the tender sex. All India cried out against the evil and with one stroke of the pen the age of consent has been raised from 10 to 12. Let us hope that this addition to the Indian statute book will be productive of untold blessings and benefits to the country.

Satisfaction expressed at the passing of the Age of Consent Act by the Secretary of State.

6. In noticing the remark made by Lord Cross on the freedom of the Native press, the Lok Bandhu (137), in its issue of the 28th June, observes:—A law restricting newspaper comments will deprive the people of the means which they have at present of communicating their grievances to Government, will increase corruption among the public servants, a check over them being removed, and will, lastly, weaken the cause of national reform. The editors of all Native papers should, therefore, hold a meeting in time and send a memorial to Parliament praying for the non-introduction of any gagging enactment. It seems that Government have hit upon this scheme as a punishment to the newspaper editors for the strong and united opposition recently made by them to the Age of Consent Act. But any curtailment of the liberty of the press would be considered a stain on the civilized English Government.

Remark made by Lord Cross on the use of the freedom of the press by the natives of India and observations thereon.

7. The Jdme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 29th June, observes:—The statement published the day before yesterday by Government, showing the consumption of and the revenue from salt during the months of April and May 1891, goes to support the long-standing complaint that the enhanced duty on that article of food has greatly added to the difficulties of the poor people. This statement shows an increased consumption of 37,000 maunds of salt during the months of April and May 1891 over the consumption during the corresponding period of last year. Yet the proportion of the quantity consumed to the population shows a decrease, which is much to be regretted; for, it clearly shows that poor people are debarred from using this necessary of life as largely as they should, owing to its increased cost. In the Bombay Presidency itself the quantity used during the same months is less by 11,000 maunds than it was during the same months five years ago.

Remarks on the statement of consumption of salt during April and May 1891.

8. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—It is appalling to consider that the rainfall just at present stands at 1¼ inch, whereas during the corresponding week last year there was a fall of some 22 inches, and the week before that of 16 inches. One of the peculiarities of the present season is that the supplies of drinking water have almost run short, and its want is very keenly felt. We cannot believe that the Government is unaware of all this, but what measures of relief it proposes to take to meet a contingency it is beyond our ken to know. The situation is not a very happy one, and the Government ought to make the necessary preparations to meet a contingency in the nick of time. It is very easy to poohpooh the existence of a scarcity, and men will be found ever ready to paint a rose-coloured picture of a sad spectacle, but the responsibility of those concerned will not be lessened. We may tell them that owing to heavy exports to foreign markets there are no surplus stocks of grain in the country to meet a sudden demand, and therefore the necessity of preparation becomes still more urgent. Madras has a sad budget of news in this connection to give us, and considering our own situation in this presidency we feel as if we were to be revisited by the dark days of 1877-78. While on this subject we are told that His Excellency Lord Harris and the Governor of Madras propose to play a cricket match shortly in Poona. The meeting is said to be almost settled, and the two presidential demi-gods, if they consider the present time suitable, will enjoy the fun heartily. But the question is, are the present circumstances of both the presidencies such as to afford them time for such diversions? After the opprobrium of the angel-devil dance, and in the face of a dire scarcity in Madras, Lord Wenlock ought to take a wide survey of the consequences before he thinks of such diversion. This presidency, too, is on the verge of scarcity, and Lord Harris, as a man of business, ought to use the present moments in devising measures best suited to preserve the lives of people from an impending dire visitation. Lord Harris must know, as we do, that to be forewarned is to be forearmed, and if His Lordship does not wish to envy the ungenerous and inhuman famine policy of Sir Richard Temple, for a time His Excellency must prefer hard work to the exhilerating pleasures of the cricket. At such a time as the present, a conference should be held by the three Revenue Commissioners to consider the general condition of the people, what measures are needed to meet a dire visitation and what pecuniary advances are necessary to the agriculturists to relieve them from distress. Such a conference would be quite opportune, and Lord Harris will do well to have one. His Lordship has given evidence of hard work, and we earnestly hope that before entertaining a brother Governor, he will adopt some positive preventive measures as a set-off against an impending scarcity.

The Poona Sárvajanik Sabha and the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

9. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 28th June, says that the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha is being highly praised for obtaining, by persistent efforts for over a year, a copy of Mr. Woodburn's report on the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, but that paper has great misgivings of the public character of that body as it is mostly made up of Sávkárs or money-lenders who, it asserts, want to safeguard their own interests against those of the agriculturists, for whose benefit the Act is intended. The Sabha, adds the paper, has nothing to do with the Act and Government should not listen to its advice in this matter, but should extend the operation of the Act to the Násik, Thána, Ratnágiri and Kolába Districts.

Comments on the decision of Ráo Bahádur Chunilál Mánikl&l, First Class Subordinate Judge, Poona, in the suit brought by Ráo Bahádur H. R. Chiplunkar against Mr. Plunkett.

10. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—We have a wrong idea of loyalty and we naturally suffer a good deal on account of this wrong idea. We do not like to say a word against our "Má-báp Sarkár" because according to the Hindu idea of loyalty it is not proper that we should make a complaint against the doings of the Sarkár. There is also another wrong idea prevailing in the Native mind—that of identifying the Sarkár with the lowest policeman. These are wrong ideas, but the officers of Government have their best protection in them. Should everybody understand that even the meanest individual has the right to expect that he shall be justly treated, and that even if the highest officer in the land wrong him he has a right to complain and seek redress of his grievance, and if every one so knowing the law is prepared to exercise his rights, official zulum would soon be reduced to the minimum. But, unfortunately, there are very few gentlemen who always make it a point to stand upon their rights. We have often pointed out that unless we are prepared to watch with jealous and piercing eyes the operation of laws already framed for us and to practically demonstrate how they ought to be framed and given effect to, if they are to serve the purpose for which all laws are and should be intended, we shall be so far our own legislators. The civil suit which Ráo Bahádur Hari Ráoji Chiplunkar brought against Mr. Plunkett is a very good illustration in point, and the Ráo Bahádur's example ought to be imitated by us all. It was a case in which the Ráo Bahádur complained that Mr. Plunkett erred in serving upon him a notice to prosecute for making an encroachment on Government land, that Mr. Plunkett's action was unauthorized and ultra vires, and that he was entitled to damages under civil law. This case was heard by Ráo Bahádur Chunilál, the First Class

Subordinate Judge at Poona, who gave his decision yesterday against the plaintiff and in favour of the defendant. Ráo Bahádur Chunilál has written an elaborate and lengthy judgment. We have not had time to carefully go through it and therefore we reserve a detailed review of it to another issue; but from a superficial glance at what the learned Judge has said we cannot help coming to the conclusion that there has been a miscarriage of justice, and in the interests of Mr. Plunkett, as well as for an authoritative declaration of law on the question of principle involved in the case, we think it very necessary that the case should go up to the High Court. Mr. Plunkett is a very old friend of the citizens of Poona and they have all along liked him, but there have at the same time been many complaints that Mr. Plunkett either does not properly understand municipal law or that he suffers from the fault which is found in most of the European executive officers of Government, viz., that they often set aside the law when to do so suits their whims or their pleasure. The present case is an instance of the kind. As appears from the proceedings, Mr. Plunkett had nothing to do with the land which he said the Ráo Bahádur had encroached upon. According to his own statement (we are only writing from memory and are therefore open to correction) he was not in revenue charge of the limits within which the alleged encroachment lay. As the Chairman of the Poona Municipality, he had not the authority to issue notice of prosecution. He believed, but the Act does not sanction such a belief, that the chairman of a managing committee has the power of taking executive action without any such authority from the committee of management. The three municipal commissioners who appeared as witnesses in the case confessed to the fact that their chairman overrides them and that they often condemn his illegal action. It was brought out in evidence that the proceedings book of the resolutions of the managing committee is not a faithful record of all the resolutions passed, and that there may be resolutions passed by the chairman subsequently affirmed by the committee and not entered in the proceedings book. All this is an emphatic contradiction of the high praise bestowed by Government on the working of the suburban committee, and we are extremely thankful to Ráo Bahádur Chiplunkar for thus helping to bring before the public facts which show that success or failure of local self-government depends, not upon good or bad work done, but upon the colour and race of the persons at the helm. These are some of the reflections suggested by a cursory consideration of the issues and side issues involved in the case. As to the judgment itself we are really sorry for Ráo Bahádur Chunilál. If public opinion deserves any credit, it says the case was decided in favour of Mr. Plunkett not because Ráo Bahádur Chiplunkar's case was weak, but because the Judge took quite a different view of the rights and privileges of officers.

11. Referring to the same case the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 2nd July, writes:—The Subordinate Judge has recorded a long judgment in which he gives his reasons for dismissing the suit with costs against the plaintiff. We have no desire on the present occasion to go into the merits of the case; nor are we now prepared to say whether or not the decision given is justified by the evidence recorded in the case. We propose to-day to invite the prominent attention of the reader to an extract from the Subordinate Judge's judgment which, we submit with all deference to the learned Judge, lays down a principle which, according to our view, is not only foreign to British law and jurisprudence, but is fraught with very dangerous consequences, if it be once recognized as a sound principle. After having examined at some length the authorities bearing on the law of libel, the Subordinate Judge proceeds to add: "As regards the defendant's capacity of a chairman, it has been abundantly proved by the evidence on the record of this suit that a chairman has invariably and always been looked upon as the head of the managing committee, and has power to do all executive work without consulting the managing committee. Such a practice has been in existence since very long, and it needs no grounds to hold that the defendant did honestly believe it was his duty, he having simply acted in accordance with the long established practice above referred to. It seems to me, therefore, that it was, or he himself believed it was, his duty as Deputy Collector as well as a chairman to report to the District Collector on the matter of the alleged encroachment. Even as a European subject of Her Majesty it was his moral duty to report the alleged encroachment to the District Collector. The plaintiff was in the course of building his compound wall, and it was necessary to bring the matter to the notice of the District Collector before the wall was completed. There was an occasion and an exigency for the report, and the only part that remains to be considered is whether the defendant acted bona fide in making that report." The italics are our own. This is, we believe, the first time that an attempt has been made in a grave judicial decision to institute an invidious distinction between European subjects of Her Majesty on the one hand, and the Native subjects of Her Majesty on the other, as regards their so-called moral duties and obligations towards the Crown as distinct from their strictly legal duties and obligations. There is, of course, no legislative enactment laying down these so-called moral duties and obligations, or furnishing the slightest warrant for the institution of any invidious distinction of the character referred to above. But we may go further and add that we are not aware of any State document containing an authoritative declaration of policy, which would warrant the institution of the aforesaid invidious distinction. On the contrary, the oft-repeated declarations of policy in solemn State documents warrant us in holding that there is no such thing as a ruling caste in India, the individual members of which have any particular obligations, legal or moral, imposed upon them. Again, if the doctrine laid down in the Subordinate Judge's judgment were true and well-founded, it would mean that even if the defendant had not occupied any official position he would still have been justified as a European subject of Her Majesty in taking the action he did in the matter of the alleged encroachment by the plaintiff on the Government land. The object with which this argument is put forward is to enable the defendant to claim for his report to the Collector the character of a privileged communication which it would not otherwise possess; and such being the case, the argument requires to be carefully scrutinized. We for our part feel no hesitation in protesting against it with all the earnestness we can command. It may be here observed that even the pleader for the defendant did not venture to claim on his behalf any protection on the strength of such an argument.

12. In alluding to the case in which the Cantonment Magistrate at Belgaum convicted on the 28th March last two females of committing criminal trespass by entering the compound of the bungalow of Dr. Harris, and sentenced each of them to one month's rigorous imprisonment, but who were recently acquitted by the Bombay High Court, the Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—The hobby of Government in appointing military officers to perform judicial duties has been extremely mischievous, and we cannot believe that this fact has not been brought to their notice. These sons of Mars may be very clever men in the use of arms, but, certainly, in a department for which they have had no special training they can make no pretension to proficiency. How mischievous the performance of judicial functions by these men has been we need not say. An instance of the kind has just occurred in Belgaum, in which two prostitutes were punished without any evidence leading to their conviction. From the judgment of Mr. Justice Jardine in the case it will be apparent that the present is not the first case of its kind in which this Daniel of Belgaum has been censured. As Mr. Justice Jardine observed, he had defied the principles of law on a former occasion and was admonished in that connection; but that was not enough for him to exercise due discretion on the present occasion. We cannot believe that judicial functions in a cantonment are less arduous than in other civil stations, and yet the prevailing practice is to invest a military officer with the exercise of judicial powers. The spectacle is really disappointing, and though Government may not pretend ignorance in the matter, they ought not to persist in a course which is sure to shake people's confidence in the British administration of justice in this country.

Appointment of military officers to perform judicial duties considered mischievous.

13. The Bombay Samachár (94), in its issue of the 29th June, expresses satisfaction at the admonition administered in the above case by the Honourable Judges of the High Court to the Cantonment Magistrate, who is a military officer, and observes:—Notwithstanding the close supervision of the High Court over the Magistrates, which ought to hold the latter in check and keep them on their guard against committing any vagaries, numerous cases come before the High Court in which the Magistrates are found to have exceeded their authority and their decisions are reversed. This is particularly the case with Cantonment Magistrates, who being generally military men do not possess sufficient knowledge of law and are generally hasty in their action. We think that military officers need not be appointed to cantonment magistracies, but if Government wish to continue the present arrangement, it must try to purge it of its defects. [The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that inasmuch as the Bombay High Court has censured the Cantonment Magistrate of Belgaum on two occasions including the present one, it now remains to be seen what steps Government take to express their disapprobation.]

Disapproval of the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Presidency Association regarding the proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate.

14. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 3rd July, observes :— The reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Presidency Association, a propos of the rumour that Mr. Webb is to be appointed Third Presidency Magistrate, shows that the Government has taken an offence at the memorial and has declined to be dictated to in the matter of appointments by such representations. This shows that the public were mistaken in believing that Government is always anxious to know and respect public opinion on public questions. We do not know what public interest will be better served by the appointment of Mr. Webb than by that of a Native. Several Anglo-Indian newspapers and even the Government seem to regard the question as a personal one, but that is an erroneous belief, for the object of the memorial was to represent to Government that the rights of Natives in the matter of appointments under Government may not be overlooked. In the Government resolution nothing has been said about the qualifications of Mr. Webb, but only the memorial of some of the citizens of Bombay submitted to Government in 1887 urging the claims of Mr. Webb to the office of the Chief Presidency Magistrate is referred to. This memorial, it must be remembered, was sent only by his friends and admirers in their private capacity and the general public had very little to do with it, as was evident from the strong protests made by the Native press on that occasion. The Presidency Association represents the views of the Bombay public, and its memorial deserved from Government as much attention as a representation from the public at large would merit. [The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments and adds that the present constitution of Government is defective, as there is not a single Native officer in the Executive Council to represent the interests of the Natives, and that it is therefore not right to treat public opinion with indifference in matters of appointments.]

Memorial of the Bombay Presidency Association against the appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate strongly supported.

15. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 28th June, writes :— The Bombay Presidency Association deserves the thanks of the Native public for the memorial it has sent to the Secretary of State regarding the Government of Bombay's nomination of Mr. Webb to be the Third Presidency Magistrate of this city, subject to the Secretary of State's sanction. The memorial is a vigorous and closely reasoned document, and most of the points urged in it seem to be unanswerable. The Association rightly protests against all the three Presidency Magistrates being Europeans, and calls the attention of the Secretary of State to the recommendations of the Public Service Commission, which have received his approval. But it seems that now-a-days rules are only made to be broken, or else we cannot understand on what principle the Government of Bombay has chosen to recommend Mr. Webb's appointment to the Third Magistracy. The Bombay Gazette in a leader asks the Association to point out where and when it has been laid down by Government that the Presidency Magistrate's post belongs to the Uncovenanted or Provincial service. It may be a sufficient answer to this query to say that the very fact that no member of the Civil or Covenanted Service can claim this post as of right, and that generally uncovenanted men have been appointed to it, shows that it cannot be regarded as a post belonging to the Imperial service. The request of the Association that one at least of the three Presidency Magistrates should be a native of India is extremely reasonable. In fact, the Association would be perfectly justified in asking that two of the posts should be reserved for qualified natives of India, having due regard to the fact that the Secretary of State has put it emphatically on record that the Provincial service should be maintained essentially as a Native service. It is curious how the Bombay Gazette tries to get rid of this important concession. Our contemporary must have been put to it, indeed, when, instead of dealing fairly with the arguments and facts of the memorial, he deals with it in a bantering spirit and tries to show to the world as if the three Secretaries of the Association want to make the appointment. The Gazette professes not to be able to see in this connection why it should be made a race question, and why the appointments to the Presidency Magistracies should not be made on the principle of the fittest man for the fittest place. That undoubtedly is a very good principle, but is it acted upon by the Government in all or even in many cases when Natives are concerned? Whenever the natives of India have complained that the Civil Service rules and regulations hamper them, and that they should be so modified as to place Native candidates in the same position as English candidates, the Government has said that Imperial considerations require the observance of certain distinctions, and the very fact that the Public Service Commission, the Government of India and the Secretary of State have divided the public service of India into two classes—one called the Imperial and the other the Provincial service—shows that the principle now sought to be upheld (because convenience in this particular case demands it) has not been recognised by the authorities themselves. The natives of India would be the first to accept that principle, and, in fact, they have all along contended for it. They have asked for no favour, but fair play and justice, and impartial treatment. But the recommendations of the Public Service Commission, which have been adopted by the Secretary of State, have been treated as a sort of compromise. It is little short of adding insult to injury to rule at one time that the exigencies of the Government require that certain appointments ought to be reserved essentially for Europeans, others essentially for Natives, and then to violate the rule to the prejudice of Natives on the principle of the fittest man for the fittest place, when a European has to be provided for and a job perpetrated. We may go further and, with the Presidency Association, ask whether Mr. Webb is the fittest man for the place. Perhaps, his friends may laugh in their sleeves when they indite that this gentleman is the fittest man that could be found in the whole presidency of Bombay, merely because some years ago he acted as a Presidency Magistrate. The Bombay Presidency Association points out that both at the bar and on the bench Mr. Webb was a failure: and yet the public are seriously told that the fittest man the Government can find for a Bombay Magistracy is a barrister who hardly had a large practice at any time. The standard of fitness must have gone very low, indeed, among us if the view of Mr. Webb's friends, that he is the fittest man, be correct. But we hope we are not so badly off. Whatever others may say about the majority of the Native bar not sharing the opinion expressed by the Association about Mr. Webb's qualifications, it may be observed that most of the members of the Native bar are of the Association's view. The Association is taken to task because it has not named any candidate whom it may regard as better qualified for the place. This is a futile argument, for it is no business of a public body to advocate individual interests, as the Government ought to be able to find a qualified Native. And there is this to say that if the Association had done what it is dictated to, those so anxious to seek for convenient arguments would have been probably the first to say that the Association was working in the interests of individuals and not of a cause or a principle. Mr. Webb's friends make much of the fact that his having acted as a Presidency Magistrate on certain occasions gives him a sort of claim; but why does not the Government choose to apply this principle to Natives as well? We know at this moment of a Native gentleman, who, having acted on several occasions in a certain high office, was in a letter written to him by Government promised the permanent incumbency whenever one fell vacant, but who, when a vacancy did occur, was told that his having acted gave him no claim. The fact is that when it is intended to perpetrate a job, not only rules are violated, but all sorts of arguments that are supposed to serve the purpose are used. But the quibbling and the sophistry employed in this instance ought not to obscure the main contention of the Association that no reasonable cause is shown why a European barrister who has been a failure at the bar should be appointed to a post which, justly speaking, ought to be given to a qualified native of India.

Complaints in connection with the compilation of the lists of Honorary Magistrates.

16. The Mahrátta (15), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—We have received complaints about the way in which lists of Honorary Magistrates are compiled. In Rule 10 of the rules for the guidance of the benches of Honorary Magistrates for Poona, it is provided that the District Magistrate should prepare a list of the Honorary Magistrates. This list has some importance, as under this rule in the absence of a stipendiary Magistrate of the first class and of the rank of Deputy Collector, the Honorary Magistrate whose name stands highest of those present is to preside over the section to which he belongs. In his absence, again, the next one on the list is to preside. It will be thus seen that precedence in the list is a matter of some importance. On hearing a complaint about the way in which these lists are prepared we examined some of them published in the Government Gazette, and we regret to say we found the complaint to be reasonable. Of course, we are speaking of the list of Magistrates for Poona. From the list we could not find on what principle it was prepared. We found some gentlemen who were but recently appointed placed above the heads of others who have been on the bench for some years and who have also had considerable judicial experience. This is surely unjust, unmethodical and objectionable. We learn that the list is virtually prepared by the City Magistrate, who probably owing to pressure of work cannot minutely scrutinize it. He sends it on to the District Magistrate, who passes it on to Government. In this way serious errors are perpetuated. In one case a gentleman complained to the District Magistrate of the injustice done to him. The District Magistrate considered the complaint to be a reasonable one and forwarded the papers to the Commissioner. There the papers were laid by and have stuck fast. When he applied to Government he was asked to apply to the District Magistrate. The result of his application to the District Magistrate is mentioned above. This is circumlocution with a vengeance. We think the matter is worth being inquired into by Government.

Disapproval of the strong remarks passed against His Excellency the Governor in Council in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

17. The Satyá Mitrá (119), in its issue of the 28th June, observes:—Although some of the Pársi newspapers of Bombay have written strongly, evidently with good intentions, against the conduct of the police in relation to the Rájábái Tower tragedy, we cannot approve of their remarks against His Excellency the Governor in Council for issuing a mild resolution, not taking strict notice of the conduct of the police. The Pársi community, as a whole, has no hand in such insolent writings and the views expressed therein must be taken as the personal opinions of the writers. The sensible portion of the community believes that His Excellency the Governor has already taken proper steps in the matter, and will take due precautions in future to prevent a miscarriage of justice.

The Rájábái Tower tragedy and the action of the Pársi community in regard to it.

18. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 28th June, says that from what has appeared in the daily papers of Bombay concerning the Rájábái Tower tragedy it is constrained to say that the Pársi community is determined to exaggerate matters in order to give them undue importance, and that it has shown great want of judgment in submitting to Government a memorial with some fictitious signatures, as alleged by correspondents in the Bombay Gazette.—A correspondent, writing from Bombay to the Kesari (43) in its issue of the 30th June, says that he is afraid that the Bombay Police may perhaps have to sacrifice some innocent persons as victims with a view to keep up its good name in consequence of the agitation set on foot in Bombay in the matter of the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

19. The Kdside Mumbai (109), in its issues of the 29th June and 1st July, disapproves of the conduct of some of the Pársi papers of Bombay and several Gujarát papers which have made strong attacks on the Bombay Police and also on Government in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, and observes:—If the Bombay Police force, consisting of only 1,500 men, has failed to trace out the offenders, why do not the public, who number more than eight millions and a half, find them out? The memorial addressed by the public of Bombay to the Bombay Government on the subject shows nothing but an ardent wish of the memorialists for the conviction of Mánekji Asláji, but they ought to know that Government have nothing to do with his trial and that there is hardly any necessity for a special commission of inquiry, because the memorialists are at perfect liberty to produce their witnesses before the trying Judge.

Comments on the memorial of the Bombay public regarding the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

20. The Bombay East Indian (1), in its issue of the 1st July, writes:—Considering the éclat with which the conviction of Mánekji Asláji by the Coroner's jury was received, the utmost energy lavished on the task of obtaining signatures to the memorial to Government praying for a thorough investigation into the mystery of the Rájábái Tower tragedy by a special commission, the deception practised in obtaining signatures—a course of procedure which is symbolical of the precedent a certain Christian community created in a similar design, "the chorus of approbation" which received the announcement that sufficiently cogent reasons were given for the formation of a primâ facie charge against Mánekji Asláji, it is difficult to conceive what charitable motive could have evoked the petition which asks Government to withdraw the charges against Mánekji and to proceed into a more rigid inquiry for the elucidation of the mysterious tower case. Government is not likely to undo the work which a Coroner's jury after a protracted sitting has done, and whose action has been supported by a Presidency Magistrate by committing Mánekji Asláji to take his trial at the Sessions for the crimes of murder of one of the unfortunate Pársi girls and for being implicated in the death of the other. Would that the mysteries of a case which had occurred at the Clock Tower, had terminated in the gloom of the Tower of Silence!

21. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—We believe the memorial submitted by numerous inhabitants of Bombay praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry into the mysteries of the Rájábái Tower case is already in the hands of the authorities, and all Bombay will await with eager curiosity the reply which the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris may give to it. In the interests of public safety it is to be hoped that His Excellency the Governor in Council will carefully consider the contents of that memorial and readily comply with the prayer therein contained. It is needless to state that the memorialists have made out a complete case in support of the prayer. It is brimful of reasoning and fortified by unimpeachable facts regarding the extraordinary neglect of the police to discover the perpetrators of the foul crime, and its still more extraordinary attitude throughout, not to say anything of its unseemly and altogether unjustifiable behaviour during the proceedings of the Coroner's inquest. His Excellency will at once discover how far the police, including its head, has miserably fallen short of what the public of Bombay had expected from it, how far it has made those "extraordinary efforts" to track the crime since the date of the Government resolution, and how far it is now necessary to withdraw the case from its hands and place it in those of an independent body of experts. The impasse to which the affair of the tragedy has been brought, we repeat, is entirely the creation of those entrusted with it. Not only is the reputation of the police at stake; we are bound to say the reputation of the Government of Bombay is involved in it. It can have but a faint idea of the feeling and excitement on this threatened miscarriage of justice among all classes of the community. Let Lord Harris imitate the example of the mædival Harun-al-Raschied, and we are sure he will be convinced of the absolute accuracy of our statement. If the Government has been misled into the belief that the excitement exists among the Pársis alone, the important signatures on the memorial are a sufficient voucher to discard that belief. Anyhow, we may plainly inform the Government that that excitement will not be allayed until the principal prayer of the memorial is complied with. The police is entitled to say that it is unjustly accused, as much as the public is entitled to aver that the police, and the police alone, is guilty of a grave dereliction of duty. To sift the truth to its bottom, it is now imperative to appoint independent experts. The public has a deep faith in the ultimate capture of the criminals if only the right sort of men were entrusted with the further investigation which is still necessary. Though Mr. Ommanney is a name of ill-omen to the Párais, we make bold to say Government could not find a better expert in the entire presidency for the purpose; and we venture to suggest his name along with that of Mr. Sinclair, the able Collector of Kolába. With the aid of two such gentlemen, in whom we are sure every unit of the community will repose confidence, the guilt is sure to be brought home to the criminals. We therefore earnestly hope that the Government will be alive to its duty in the matter and rise equal to the occasion. Nothing would give it greater satisfaction, and nothing would tend more to allay the present excitement, than a compliance with the prayer of the memorialists. We raised our humble voice from the beginning and demanded that another body of detective experts should be immediately put into requisition. We later on observed, in vigorous terms no doubt, that the resolution issued by Government exhorting the police to put on "extraordinary efforts" would prove abortive and that it was simply an eye-wash. That forecast has turned out quite correct, and we dare say Lord Harris's Government has seen its mistake. It has now the opportunity to retrieve the error and act in sympathy with popular wish and sentiment. Let us hope that it will. The memorialists have offered it a golden bridge. May it be the good fortune of Government to retire across it! There will be wisdom in such a course, for it is really a golden way out of the impasse created by its precious police.

Remarks on the refusal of His Excellency Lord Harris to receive a deputation in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

22. Writing on the Rájábái Tower tragedy, the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 29th June, says:—A large section of the Native community of Bombay entertains a strong feeling that the conduct of the local police in the matter of the tower tragedy has been such as cannot command its confidence, and that a miscarriage of justice is about to occur in consequence of the police having committed themselves to a certain theory and adhered to it in spite of indications showing a different possibility. Such a feeling is by no means desirable or safe, and for the credit of the police and the Government it is highly necessary that it should be removed. This feeling has led to the formation of a strong committee composed of such men as Sir Jamsetji Jijibhái and Sir Dinsháh Mánekji, the Honourable Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar and Diván Bahádur Lakshman Jagannáth, Khán Bahádur Kázi Sháhábudin and Mr. Amiruddin Tyabji—a body of men who could not be accused of any extreme or alarmist views, or of any perverse antipathy to the police. The committee has framed a memorial for submission to Government, and it was proposed that a deputation of some members of the committee headed by Sir Jamsetji should wait upon His Excellency the Governor to present the memorial. His Excellency has, however, declined to receive the deputation on the ground that the personal interview could not elucidate the matter better than the memorial itself. This refusal of the Governor to receive the deputation is, to say the least, not courteous to a body of men who occupy the foremost position in Bombay society. Government could not have possibly suffered any loss in dignity or in any other respect if it had agreed to receive the deputation, and heard from the lips of the gentlemen themselves the ground of their complaints, even supposing the personal interview would not have disclosed anything more than the memorial itself. The refusal will only intensify the feeling of dissatisfaction which prevails all round. Such a refusal by a minister in England would probably be attended with serious consequences to Government. The position now taken up by the Government is somewhat inexplicable. The measures it took during the progress of the inquiry before the Coroner, such as the instructions to the Public Prosecutor to appear at the inquiry, the proposal to appoint a special commission, and the publication of the resolution had a reassuring effect on the public. But a strange and unaccountable coldness seems to have come upon the Government recently. The proposal to appoint a commission has been shelved, which has caused no little dissatisfaction, and the refusal to receive the deputation will further accentuate the uneasy feeling and will extend to Government the distrust which was so long confined to the police. This estrangement between the Government and the people is most unhappy, and Government cannot too soon take steps to allay popular uneasiness and rehabilitate confidence. The strained relations between the Government and the people will lead to no good results. If Government does not take steps to conciliate the people by timely concessions, there are sure to be further breaches of harmony. There will be public meetings, memorials and telegrams, and all the machinery of modern agitation will be put into motion. The committee is not likely to sit still under the affront offered to it by the refusal to receive the deputation. Let us hope Government will accede to the prayer of the memorialists and save itself from a disagreeable position.

Part II.—Education.

23. The Bombay Samáchár (24), in its issue of the 3rd July, observes:—

Resolution of the Bombay Government on primary education in Bombay.

The correspondence that has passed between the Bombay Government and the local Municipal Corporation on the subject of the Government contribution to primary education in the presidency town is very facetious and the attitude of the Government resembles the conduct of the Márwádis, who always higgle with their customers. In the letter dated 29th June from Government to the Corporation, the former have tried to foist upon the latter new obligations with respect to primary education, and to impress upon it that it is its paramount duty to maintain primary education in an efficient state, no matter at what cost. The local Corporation is surely mistaken in not levying additional taxation to make adequate provision for primary education in the city, when it exercises its powers of taxing and is extravagant in expenditure on other works. We cannot, however, understand the policy of the local Government in neglecting education when authorities in England propose to give free primary education, and we shall be glad to see how the local Government explain this discrepancy. [The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that it is to be regretted that it has of late been the tendency of the Government to shirk all monetary obligations to the Corporation, whereas they keep the revenues from ábkári to themselves, which ought properly to go to the municipality.]

Part III.—Railways.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—The weekly return of passenger traffic on the G. I. P. Railway to hand shows that the receipts for the week ending the 23rd May last stand at Rs. 1,21,358 as against Rs. 97,009 during the corresponding week last year. The revenue from neither the first nor the second class is as steady and increasing as that from the third class. In respect to the goods traffic the week gives an increased revenue of over four lakhs in round numbers, so that the G. I. P. Railway authorities have no reason to grumble with respect to their income. With this bright side of the income Government will not have to make up the guaranteed interest from their own treasury. The statement before us clearly shows that it is the goods and third class passenger traffic that pays the company best. As to goods, the company has erected large and convenient sheds for their reception and despatch, and, so far as we know, the merchants have nothing to complain of in the matter of the traffic arrangements. But the third class passenger is the greatest sufferer, and though he contributes the lion's share of the profit, nobody appears to think for a moment that, like the first and second class passengers, he is a human being, capable of enjoying all the conveniences and comforts so lavishly provided for the upper classes. The provision of latrines has been so often prayed for, and the company has so persistently refused it, that one is at a loss to know what to do. It is very easy to taunt Natives for want of business habits, but what can we say of a company which, howsoever careful in other matters, has not the condescension to look to the comforts of its best paymaster?

Alleged disregard of the G. I. P. Railway Company to the convenience and comfort of third class passengers from whom they are said to derive the largest income of all other classes.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Remarks on the question of the deposit of surplus funds of the Bombay Municipality.

25. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—For our own part we see no sufficient reason why the proposed arrangement of depositing the surplus funds of the Bombay Municipality in exchange banks may not be sanctioned with adequate safeguards. We do not consider all the exchange banks in Bombay to be badly managed or to be in unsafe condition. Why should not the municipality get interest on its money, especially when it may amount to such a large sum? Then, again, if the municipality is to be forced to deposit its money with the Bank of Bombay, why should not the latter be compelled to pay interest? Is this not a one-sided agreement and therefore not binding on the municipality? To follow the other alternative, viz., of investing in public securities, would be very detrimental at times, as on the present occasion when the 4 per cents. stand at 107¾. Then, again, all the money is not to be deposited with one bank, but is proposed to be distributed amongst many in the form of deposits payable at call. It is too much to suppose that all the banks will fail and the whole money will be lost. Such a contingency is next to impossible.

The question of the deposit of the surplus of the Bombay Municipality and reflections on Mr. Acworth, the Municipal Commissioner.

26. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—That was a sensible resolution arrived at by the Bombay Corporation last Monday to defer the final consideration of the question of the deposit of municipal surplus funds. No doubt, there are in this case two sides to the question. And when this is the situation there is wisdom in threshing out the pros and cons, so as to arrive at last at a healthy decision on it. It is not a question of party interest in our local politics. All are equally interested in seeing an improvement of a real and solid character in our city's finances consistent with absolute safety. So that it would be the height of unwisdom for either the Commissioner or the Councillors to approach the question from any but the safest and most unbiassed point of view. Unfortunately, it seems the Commissioner has set his heart upon making it a personal matter. He is seized with the notion that the word of the Chief Executive must be an unwritten law unto the Corporation: that the Corporation in all matters must rather follow his lead than that he should obey its corporate behest. This is the spirit of the infatuation. It is this which was at the bottom of many a warm parley at recent Corporation meetings. It is, indeed, an unfortunate attitude which all must regret. Is it a wonder if under such circumstances Mr. Wacha considers him, as Mr. P. M. Mehta so tersely put it the other day, as a "natural enemy" of the rate-paying interest? Now, in this instance, we hear that Mr. Acworth has made the Bank of Bombay question a personal one. He fancies he is bound to win. He is entitled to entertaining such a Quixotic fancy in a serious business matter involving heavy risks. We purposely refrain from commenting at present on the controversy. But meanwhile we should be glad to learn that there is no foundation for the rumour that two Mahomedan and one Hindu gentlemen of some influence are going about actively canvassing votes to support Colonel Merewether's amendment. One of the Mahomedan gentlemen and the Hindu gentleman are members of the Standing Committee. We repeat that for the sake of the purity and independence of local self-government in Bombay the report may be contradicted. Otherwise we cannot but condemn in the strongest terms the spirit in which the Chief Executive seems to conceive he should discharge his municipal functions. Is he desirous of reducing the Corporation to the level of the Paris prefecture? It would be an evil day for Bombay if the Municipal Executive became a canvasser-general in order to be the Commissioner and the Corporation himself rolled into one. There are not signs wanting to support this belief. There are municipal augurs who have forecast it. Let us wait and see whether the omens are verified.

27. The Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 29th June, writes:—We warmly commend the action of the Sholápur Municipality in passing the following resolution in regard to the proposal to institute a scholarship in the interests of technical education:—"That in the best educational interests of this municipal district, it is desirable that this municipality spend from a minimum sum of Rs. 1,500 to a maximum sum of Rs. 3,500 every year on technical education, such as is acquirable in the most advanced countries of Europe and America, subject to the approval and sanction of Government." We trust that Government will cheerfully accord its sanction to so commendable a proposal, and not raise any unnecessary technical difficulties to prevent the Sholápur Municipality from carrying out its purpose. The sort of public spirit which the Sholápur municipal commissioners have displayed is unfortunately rare and requires to be sedulously encouraged, and Government would not be realizing its responsibility well, if it were to hamper the action of the Sholápur Municipality by any formal objections. Only recently His Excellency Lord Harris has declared that in matters educational he is merely continuing the policy of his distinguished predecessor. Had that distinguished predecessor been in office at this time, no one would have had any misgiving on the score of Government sanction to the present proposal of the Sholápur Municipality. If, therefore, Lord Harris is earnest in his professions, the sanction of Government to the scheme may be confidently counted upon.

Approval of the resolution passed by the Sholápur Municipality in regard to technical education and recommendation to Government to sanction the proposal of the municipality.

28. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—The municipalities are responsible for the primary education of the citizens. They are, we think, equally bound to see that that sort of education which will increase the commercial and industrial importance of the city and add to its prosperity is also made available to the classes engaged in the trade and industry of the city. This duty the municipalities in all the civilised countries of Europe and America recognise fully. They make it a point to supply the technical educational wants of the city in an adequate manner. Here if any municipality show a desire to provide, in something like an adequate manner, for the educational wants of the citizens, instead of getting thanks, its extravagance is pointed at and sermons delivered about the prime duties of a municipality being water-supply and sanitation. These are, no doubt, duties of very great importance. But the duty of providing means of subsistence, if not of prosperity, is also not of less importance. Properly speaking, this was the duty of Government. But the British Government in the East has a convenient defect of memory in regard to its promises and duties. These lapses of memory have become chronic and there is little hope of the Government being roused to perform its duty in a thorough and ungrudging manner. There was but little inclination towards such performance before, and what little there was has been lessened still more by the want of funds and the precarious condition of India's finances. So then for the supply of this universally felt want we think the municipalities are the only and, under the circumstances, the best institutions to which we can look with confidence. They can undertake, as a matter of natural right, this sacred trust. The Sholápur municipal commissioners, having some doubts as to whether they could legally spend municipal funds on such an object, have passed the following resolution:—"That in the best educational interests of this municipal district it is desirable that this municipality spend from a minimum sum of Rs. 1,500 to a maximum sum of Rs. 3,500 every year on technical education such as is acquirable in the most advanced countries of Europe and America, subject to the approval and sanction of Government." Now the question will go up to Government for sanction and approval. This is an innovation and Government is very unwilling to sanction such measures unless there be expressed a general desire to that effect. It is, therefore, necessary that the public press should take up the question. It would also be advantageous if more important municipalities like those of Poona, Ahmedabad, Surat, Belgaum, Dhárwár, Nagar, Sátára, Dhulia and some other places followed the example of Sholápur.

Part V.—Native States.

The trial of the members of the Manipur royal family and the sentences passed on them.

29. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 28th June, writes:—Perhaps Lord Cross was justified in saying, in reply to a question from Lord Ripon, that the India Office would not be acting properly if it interfered at this stage with the discretion of the Government of India and directed that the Manipur prisoners might be spared. But after the unhesitating and unequivocal manner in which the English press condemned the policy of the Government of India which led to these unfortunate events in Manipur and cost it the lives of some of its most trusted and valuable servants, will it be judicious on the part of that Government to confirm the sentence of death passed upon each and every member of the royal family of Manipur by the Commission which tried them of being implicated in the murder of Mr. Quinton and his party? It is for lawyers to say whether the provisions of the Penal Code have been rightly applied to them; but it is impossible to forget that the Senápati and the Jubráj are, in a sense, State prisoners and hostile justice at least requires that they should be treated as such. There can, legally speaking, be not the slightest justification for the cold-blooded murders of British officers; but the fact that these officers had gone to arrest one of the royal family at a Darbár after inviting him there, and that the fatality was owing to subsequent events, cannot be altogether lost sight of in the decision of the question whether they should be treated as ordinary criminals. There is something in the plea urged for the Senápati (or Jubráj as he is otherwise called) that the change in the Government of Manipur had taken place many months before his arrest was thought of, and it had been silently acquiesced in for several months by the Government of India. The persons now condemned were in a manner driven into rebellion by the policy of the Government itself; and atrocious as the murders of the British officers are, it is impossible not to think that all this would not have occurred if the Foreign Office had not bungled the business in the very beginning.

30. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 30th June, observes that if the debate at present held in Parliament on the Manipur affair does not elicit the real facts connected with it in their true light, the confidence which the people of India have in the political morality and wisdom of the Government of India will receive a great shock, and that therefore before the Senápati and others are hanged the question should receive due consideration from Parliament.

31. The Rást Goftár (86), in its issue of the 28th June, observes:—There is no direct evidence to show that the Regent of Manipur had any hand in the disturbance or the massacre of the European officers; and as, moreover, he was a mere puppet in the hands of his brothers and others, it is surprising to find that he too has been sentenced to capital punishment. But it is hoped that the Government of India will commute the sentence passed on him and the Senápati. It is also unfair, nay cruel, to try some of the subordinate officers, and even the sepoys, many of whom have given evidence against the royal personages, because, even if the charges laid against them be substantiated, they merely acted under the orders of higher authorities. The Government would do well to direct the present authorities at Manipur not to try such persons and cancel the punishment that may have been passed against any of them by the Military Court.

32. Writing on Manipur affairs, the Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 28th June, remarks:—We at any rate think that the decision in the Manipur affair is unjust. No doubt all Englishmen, whether in Manipur, India, or any other part of the world, will be extremely rejoiced to hear of the sentence of death passed on the Jubráj and the Senápati, but the same news will not fail to strike all those who are Hindus by parentage, religion and manners and customs, and who love their country, whether they be in India or elsewhere, as horrible and likely to make one's hair stand on end. Every Hindu is grieved at heart, but to no purpose, to hear that the whole blame in the Manipur affair is thrown on the Mahárája, and that like a murderer or robber he is to be hanged with the halter round his neck. In view of our loyalty we try to suppress our emotions, but out they come in spite of all our efforts at suppression. True as it is that the rending of our hearts, however deep, is of no avail in the present condition of our helplessness, we have no doubt that it will never be profitable to anybody to incur the curses of a large number of persons. The Mahárája and the Senápati of Manipur belong to a royal family and have passed their days in princely life, and no man with a sense of justice can bear to see them tried like ordinary criminals by three English soldiers and hanged from the gallows. The course proposed to be adopted at present is quite unjust, and if the Rája of Manipur be really guilty it would be generous and wise to treat him like the late Malhár Ráo Gáikwád or Theebaw. The Rája has not yet been hanged and there is time for Government to consider the matter well and save its good name from being tarnished and the number of its sins from being added to, however infinitesimally it may be. We therefore leave the matter to our parental Government, who being mighty are free to act as they please. [Writing on the same subject the Indu Prakish (15), in its issue of the 29th June, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that if the Manipur princes be hanged the Native Princes of India will lose all confidence in the paramount power and will be disturbed and discontented at heart, and that Government should not lose sight of the assertion made in the Proclamation of 1858 by Her Majesty the Queen that in the loyalty of the people lies the strength of the Crown.]

Remarks on the orders of the Government of India regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States.

33. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 29th June, observes:—There are hardly any newspapers published in Native States, and yet the Government of India have recently issued orders prohibiting their publication without the permission of the Political Agents on pain of banishment. These orders are very hard and it is to be regretted that Government, instead of encouraging the Native press, should see fit to put it down in Native States. If the publication of a newspaper is really harmful it must be so everywhere and must be stopped in every part of the country. Public opinion in England is, however, in favour of a free press and the English public will be astonished to hear of these orders.

Comments on the establishment of a College at Indore and the conduct of His Highness the Mahárája Holkar.

34. The establishment of a College at Indore by His Highness the Holkar is only, says the Poona Vaibhav (54) of the 28th June, a screen to hide His Highness' machinations and improper actions, and His Highness can pull on in this manner with the British Government so long as he has an ample treasury; but as soon as it is all used His Highness will certainly have cause to repent for his misbehaviour. The paper has had preferred to it various complaints against the Prince, but without taking the risk of publishing any of them it only warns the Mahárája to improve his conduct and to secure the good feelings of his subjects and of the paramount Government with a view to avert evil consequences. [The Shri Shivaji (64), in its issue of the 26th June, praises His Highness the Mahárája for the arrangements made by him in connection with the new College at Indore, but cannot persuade itself to believe that the Indore Police acted without instigation from His Highness in committing the inhuman murder of one Balvantráo Váman Booti which they are said to have recently done at Ujjein, and says that if this conjecture be well-founded, nobody should, by reason of the establishment of the College, be ready to forget the Mahárája's evil deeds.]

Remarks on the circular issued by the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, regarding the Prant Vakils for Native States under his jurisdiction.

35. The Hindusthán (106), in its issue of the 28th June, observes:—Under the régime of Lord Reay the presence of Vakils for Native States and tálukás in the Courts of district political officers was deemed unnecessary and the States of Gondal and Morvi took away their agents at the time. It is surprising to find from a circular recently issued by the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, that there is no objection to kárkuns being appointed to represent Native States in place of the former Vakils, who are altogether unnecessary in these days of rapid communication. The Vakils always tried to please political officers by various means, such as arranging for carriages for them and recommending their Chiefs to subscribe to several public funds approved of by political officers. By these means the Vakils were sometimes successful in obtaining some official information privately. By the circular above referred to the kárkuns take the place of the Vakils and may continue the practices of the latter. Government will therefore do well to discontinue the kárkuns as well.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The creation of the British Indian Empire.

1. In a leader, headed, "Was the Empire found or acquired?" the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th July, notices the lecture recently delivered in England by Sir Alfred Lyall, maintaining that the Indian Empire was carved by Englishmen by their mighty prowess, and observes:—The Honourable East India Company had at first, it seems, no idea whatever of obtaining regal power in India. After the battle of Plassey Englishmen came to entertain a hope of securing kingly authority in this country. On the conquest of Bengal they were able to form a proper idea of the strength and capabilities of the people of India, and to form plans to secure a kingdom for themselves. To some extent Lord Clive's achievements were more creditable than those of Romulus, the founder of the Roman Empire, but that the former was guilty of several ugly acts has been admitted even by his own countrymen. No blame whatever attaches to the English for becoming paramount rulers in India, which was lost entirely by our own fault. They gained the suzerainty because we could not retain it. They came here as mere merchants, but the Indian kings were indiscreet enough to make great many conveniences for them and to give them undue importance. It was not right that because the English were adepts in commerce they should have been rewarded with territorial possessions, clothed with regal powers in those territories, permitted to retain irregular soldiery and to build prisons, and allowed admission into our secret leagues, and that we should have resorted to them for the arbitration of disputes among ourselves. In short, the Indian kings acted with the English in a manner fatal to their own powers and authority. No other people in the world acted towards strangers as did the Indian kings towards the English. If a person, regardless of the injury that would be done to him, put himself into the hands of a selfish and avaricious man, he is sure to meet with loss. Similarly, India has had to lose her independence. It was no wonder that others took up the regal powers which we neglected to retain. It is no use regretting the past, but we should take care in future, as far as possible, though everything has been lost and nothing is left to take care of. But, if we resolve to regain what is lost by exerting ourselves body and soul, and act in accordance with such a resolution, there will be some hope of accomplishing our desire, though not immediately, at a distant date. How this will be has been made plain by modern historical science.

Remarks on the notice given by Mr. Samuel Smith, M. P., in the House of Commons for the appointment of a Royal Commission for India.

2. In alluding to the notice given by Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., in the House of Commons for the appointment of a Royal Commission on Indian affairs, the Gujarát Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 5th July, observes:—There is hardly any chance of a Commission being appointed under the present Conservative régime, and hence it would be well for Mr. Smith to wait till the Liberals come into power. If the present Ministry consents to the appointment of the Commission, it ought to appoint at least 10 impartial members. When the Commission arrives in India it should divide itself into five sub-committees, each consisting of two or more members for each of the three presidencies and the two Lieutenant-Governorships of the North-West Provinces and the Panjáb. The Commission should only examine Native witnesses, who are sure to prove the fact that favouritism is shown to Europeans in the matter of high appointments and that Her Majesty the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 is being disregarded in many ways. [The Hindusthán (106), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Lord Cross on the liberty of the Native press in India.

3. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 6th July, writes:—His Lordship of the "Grand Cross," we mean the Secretary of State for India, is a well-meaning personage, though generally weak-minded and ill-informed. He has now been five years in office—a sufficiently long time for a Principal Secretary to get himself thoroughly conversant with the multitudinous details of Indian administration on which he is called upon to decide or give an explanation. We thought such a person would at least take the ordinary care to verify statements to which he on occasions gives utterance. Judging, however, from the speech made three weeks ago at the Press dinner, it seems that His Lordship has as much knowledge of the true tone, temper and character of the Indian press—English, Vernacular and Anglo-Vernacular—as the man in the moon. It is evident that he was coached by some anti-Native underling at the India Office, or by some atrabilious representative of the rabid Anglo-Indian press which bears no love to the Indian, to talk of the freedom of the press in the strain he did. What are the facts which warranted His Lordship to state that the Indian press was in the habit of abusing its freedom? Why did he not give specific instances? We are all aware that there is a microscopic minority of the vernacular press—utterly contemptible, as contemptible as the unscrupulous portion of the Anglo-Indian press—which on occasions exceeds its license. But there is nothing to prevent Government from either prosecuting such a press or depriving it of its privilege. It would, however, be the very opposite of truth to generalise that the Indian press, as a whole, abuses the liberty of speech and thought. We challenge Lord Cross, or those who put him up to make that statement, to verify it. If he cannot, then we must protest against this sort of random attack. It is utterly unworthy of a responsible official of Government like the Secretary of State for India. Last year the Right Honourable Mr. Goschen made an equally reckless and unjustifiable statement touching the leaders of the Indian National Congress. The ever-watchful Mr. Digby immediately pinioned that Minister and challenged him to verify his allegation. Our readers could not have forgotten the correspondence that ensued on the subject. When Mr. Digby boldly asked him to mention specific instances, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had to draw in his horns and take refuge under the miserable plea of there being somewhere on the secret archives of the Government some record of the kind. But whether that record was true or false, it was his duty to have made it public with a view of either justifying himself or confessing his error. Nothing, however, was done, which showed that in reality the record existed only in his imagination, or that it did not bear out the veracity of the statement to which he gave utterance. But what was somewhat excusable in an ignorant Chancellor of the Exchequer, we consider to be wholly inexcusable—we say, actually culpable—in a Secretary of State for India, unless he was in a position to substantiate his statement. We repeat it was utterly unworthy of him. And we would under the circumstances strongly recommend some member in the House to nail Lord Cross to his statement and challenge him to produce the papers which would justify that allegation. This is a serious matter and we would suggest Mr. Digby to demand from the Secretary of State a categorical reply. We are all aware of the strenuous attempts which are being continuously made by journals of the class of the Pioneer to vilify the Native press, without the slightest foundation in fact, in order to revive the odious Press Act. We think it is time there was an agitation with a view of forcing the hands of the Indian Government to pass first a gagging Act for the Anglo-Indian press. The Indian press cannot any longer tolerate the limit to which mendacity regarding itself is carried on by that press. Its conduct is utterly un-English and would be a disgrace in England. It is only tolerated in India, because we have a Government which is at once pusillanimous and without a spark of genuine sympathy with the Indians.

Approval of the memorial of several Mahomedan gentlemen of Bombay to the Secretary of State for the Colonies regarding the ill-treatment of Indians in Africa.

4. The Bombay Samachár (94), in its issue of the 10th July, approves of the memorial forwarded by several Mahomedan gentlemen of Bombay to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on the grievances of Indian traders in Natal, the Transvaal, and the Orange Free State, in Africa, and hopes that their prayers will meet with the favourable notice of the Home Government, although it may find difficulties in obtaining due redress to the aggrieved. [The Jame Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 11th July, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that if the memorial had been placed before the public many persons would have gladly signed it.]

His Excellency the Viceroy at the United Service Club, Simla.

5. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 11th July, observes:—His Excellency the Viceroy, in his speech recently delivered at the United Service Club, Simla, declared that he had no intention whatever to retire from India before the expiration of the term of his office. We are glad to learn from the same address that His Excellency is enjoying good health, and wish that he would continue to enjoy the same while he is here. But, at the same time, we cannot refrain from saying that his administration has not been satisfactory, and hope that the Manipur affair has shown him his error in depending upon his present official advisers, and that in future he will be good enough to exercise his own judgment.

Comments on the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the local Presidency Association protesting against the proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as a Presidency Magistrate.

6. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th July, writes:—The reply which the Government of Bombay has vouchsafed to the Presidency Association is as undignified to the Government as it is discourteous to the Association. It ill becomes an enlightened Government to assume a tone of haughty contempt for public opinion and for a public association. If it be permissible to look beyond the letter as presented to us, we may venture to identify the hand by which it is written, and if our surmise is correct, we need not be surprised at the ill-natured levity which pervades the letter. We are only sorry that His Excellency Lord Harris, who is known personally to be solicitous of being courteous towards public associations, should have allowed his name to be associated with such a letter, and we should earnestly warn His Lordship not to put his judgment and his reputation in the keeping of an official who is inebriated with his surpassing cleverness, is obtrusively contemptuous of the Native public, conspicuously devoid of sympathy, and full of rank and uncompromising Anglo-Indianism. Such an officer, with his ready pen and ready tongue, is very serviceable, but is a very unsafe guide in managing the delicate relations between the Government and the people, especially in matters relating to popular liberty and popular privileges. The ascendancy of such an official in the Councils of the Government is the surest means of discord between the Government and the people, and if Lord Harris has any real regard for popular goodwill he cannot too soon put himself on his guard against these insidious counsels. The Government charges the Presidency Association "with complete misapprehension of the orders of the Secretary of State affecting appointments to vacancies in the Court of Small Causes and on the bench of Presidency Magistrates." What the precise orders are we do not know. But surely there can be no misapprehension on the part of the Association or of the public on one point, i.e., that the person to be appointed should be fit and proper for the post. Whatever the orders of the Secretary of State may be, they cannot sanction the appointment of an incompetent person. There is a twofold objection made by the Association: first, that under the rules the person to be appointed must be a Native; and, secondly, whether Native or European, he must possess certain qualifications which Mr. Webb does not. Now, whatever may be said in regard to the first argument, the second is quite unanswerable, and is left unanswered in the letter of the Government. In regard to the first point too, Government admits that a certain proportion of the appointments is directed to be given to Europeans, meaning by implication, we presume, that the rest should be given to Natives. What the proportion is, is not stated, and a discretion is said to be left to the local Government to depart from the rule when the latter thinks a departure necessary in the public interests. Now, let us ask what public interests require a departure in the present case? Is there any impending war or rebellion which makes it unsafe to leave the magisterial power in the hands of Natives? Is there no Native competent to hold the post that a European must needs be appointed? Or is the present nominee a gentleman of such exceptional ability that not to appoint him to a place intended for a Native would seriously affect the public interests? If a European is to be appointed when it is possible to appoint a Native, where is the scope for a Native at any time? The appointment of a European in such a case we look upon as a distinct breach of promise. All the professions of good will, the proceedings of the Public Service Commission, and the elaborate resolutions of Government thereon are bare shams, and mere pretences, if Government is to set aside the rules whenever there is an opportunity to make a job. The next point Government makes is of more abiding interest. Government, in effect, denies the right of the Presidency Association to offer its opinion in regard to public appointments. It claims that "in making appointments to the public service it is impossible for Government to admit the responsibility passing from its judgment to that of popular opinion." No one asks that the responsibility should pass from Government to popular opinion or to any other power. The responsibility must rest with the Government. But in forming its judgment Government must have the materials to come to a right decision, and especially when adverse claims are to be adjudged each party must put forward its claims with all becoming emphasis. In all civilized countries, notably in England, it is a recognized principle that the public, as represented by the press, by public associations or by individual deputations, should express its opinion on all controverted public questions, and though the responsibility of the decision rests with the Government, the latter is not to disregard the opinion expressed by the public. The position of hostility to public opinion taken in the letter may fit the despotic Governments of the Continent. It ill becomes the enlightened British Government, and belies its best traditions. In India it has been often admitted by the Government itself that an expression of public opinion on measures of Government is of great advantage to the latter. Government will do well, therefore, to welcome such responsible expression of public opinion as that of the Presidency Association rather than to sneer at it. The charge of inconsistency is, if we may venture to say so, a trick of legerdemain. The former petition approving of Mr. Webb's appointment was not made by the Presidency Association at all, as has been represented by the not overscrupulous Anglo-Indian dailies. It was promoted by a few of Mr. Webb's friends of the Byculla Club clique, and it is possible a few of our leading gentlemen put their signatures to it to oblige friends or to avoid inconvenient importunities. But it, certainly, did not represent true Native public opinion, and cannot in any case be charged against the Presidency Association. True Native opinion as represented by the Native press has, we venture to think, been uniformly consistent in objecting to Mr. Webb's appointment then as now. Indeed, the charge of inconsistency may with better propriety be laid against the Government, for on that occasion Government itself rejected Mr. Webb's claims of which now it seems to be so enamoured.

7. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 5th July, writes:—Two weeks ago we noticed in these columns the memorial addressed by the Presidency Association to the Bombay Government on the subject of Mr. Webb's nomination to the post of Presidency Magistrate. To this Mr. Lee-Warner, Secretary to Government, who according to some ignorant and uncharitable critics regulates the affairs of the presidency, has indited a somewhat stinging reply in his usual fashion. This document gives expression to views and opinions in some places which it would be very easy to prove are more or less a reflection of the sentiments which were expounded in the Christian College Magazine by Mr. Lee-Warner with his characteristic vigour and consciousness of infallibility. Those who remember the expressions used in that article—"many-throated expression of popular opinion" and "the sound of many waters"—will fully realise the significance of the sentence, "It appears to the Governor in Council from the memorials now before him that popular opinion, or opinions which claim to be popular, cannot be relied upon for consistency in matters of appointment." After comparing this declaration with his views as enunciated in the above magazine, one is driven to express a hope that the declaration, claiming as it does to emanate from the Governor in Council, did spontaneously emanate from that quarter, is a genuine reflection of His Excellency's views deliberately formed, and did not rather receive the formal approval of the Governor in Council in the usual course of official business. There are critics who would be inclined to say that the "popular opinion" claiming to be popular is so neither more nor less than the views of the Governor in Council are the views of the Governor in Council. Mr. Lee-Warner is nothing if not argumentative, and we will scrupulously follow his excellent example. The Secretaries of the Presidency Association are informed that a memorial addressed to Government by certain inhabitants of Bombay, including the then President, a Vice-President and members of the Council for the time being of the Bombay Presidency Association, spoke very highly of the qualifications of Mr. Webb, and that consequently the new representation, inconsistent as it is with the former memorial, cannot influence the decision of the Governor in Council. The language of the reply on this point is so misleading that both the Times of India and the Bombay Gazette are led to advise the Secretaries to read their own records before making such inconsistent representations. We know for certain that the Presidency Association never addressed a representation of the kind referred to in the columns of our contemporaries, who are jubilant over this supposed discovery of amazing inconsistency on the part of the Association, and we wish the Gazette learns in the interests of its reputation to moderate a little its usual tone of omniscient superiority. We will now show that Mr. Lee-Warner's logic is supremely faulty. Because the individual members of the Association were easily persuaded to sign a certain memorial, it would be ignoring all principles of sound reasoning to urge that the Association as a body is not entitled to or cannot hold different opinions from those stated in that memorial, with which the latter had nothing to do. Secondly, if popular opinion is so fickle that it cannot command respect from His Excellency Lord Harris's Government as advised by Mr. Lee-Warner and others, has not the Bombay Government proved equally capricious and unreliable in their judgment? Six years ago the Government did not approve of Mr. Webb's nomination, and why have Government now altered their views and grown so enthusiastic over the claims and qualifications of a gentleman who has never distinguished himself in any line? The policy now enunciated as regards the attitude of Government towards public opinion is opposed to their own declarations that in a country like India an expression of responsible public opinion is always welcome to them. But now there is an evident intention to depart from that policy, and even an ostentatious desire to inform influential associations that their views can have no weight with Government. Government, it is urged, have their own responsible advisers who from their situation and knowledge are most fitted to give counsel. We would have liked to know the names of the responsible advisers who have discerned distinguished abilities in Mr. Webb. The outspoken Secretary to Government informs the Association with an air of triumph over the Secretaries, who, he thinks, have been found tripping, that Government have a discretionary power according to Lord Cranbook's despatch of 1879 to make nominations to the Presidency Small Causes Court and the Magisterial Bench. We believe the Secretaries to the Association know as well as the Secretary to Government the contents of the despatch. But the question is whether Government can so arbitrarily exercise their discretion that they can appoint a person whom they could not have possibly nominated, if due regard were paid to the tests and qualifications required from an eligible candidate, and upon which the memorial of the Association has laid special stress. If the exceptional power vested in Government is to be exercised, there must be exceptional occasions for it. These would arise when there are men of exceptional abilities. Is Mr. Webb a man of more than even average abilities? In short, the lessons to be learnt from the incidents that have happened and are happening in India at this moment are, firstly, that Government is fully convinced that the people are perfectly helpless, and have, therefore, grown supremely defiant of public opinion in all matters; secondly, that as between Natives and Europeans, there is scarcely any chance of justice being done to the former, though professions of lofty morality are every now and then plentifully showered upon a guileless subject population; thirdly, that the Native community has yet to learn from the European community what unity means; and fourthly, that statesmen of the type of Lord Ripon and Lord Reay are like the rarest gems in this world and India can never be too grateful to them for the spirit of justice and mercy, righteousness and truth, which they nobly endeavoured to infuse into the administration during their ever memorable régime. [The Ittdt Goftár (87), the Indian Spectator (2), the Din Bandhu (10), the Mahrátta (5), and the Kaiser-i-Hind (86) of the 5th July, the Kesari (43) of the 7th and the Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad of the 9th, express similar sentiments.]

8. The O Portuguez Britannico (159), in its issue of the 4th July, says:—The memorial of the Bombay Presidency Association to the Secretary of State anent the contemplated appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate for the Town and Island of Bombay, has apparently in a large measure ruffled the equanimity of the local Government and has elicited from the Bombay Castle a reply which is anything but smooth or pleasant reading. It was not within the range of possibility that the Government of Bombay would in any sense approve or appreciate the action of the memorialists or acquiesce in the statements contained in the memorial; but if they felt constrained to express an opinion on the subject, we think something more sensible than the letter they have indited might have been produced. Although we endorsed every word of the representation made by the Bombay Presidency Association, we were not without hopes that the local Government would have some substantial reasons to urge in support of the action in respect of the appointment of the Third Presidency Magistrate which they had had in contemplation; but they have evidently an exceedingly weak hand, and the reply to the Secretaries of the Association only exposes their weakness. The letter under reference is neither neat nor pointed; but to give the Government their due, it must be acknowledged that they have exerted their utmost to be sarcastic and to utter the most incisive things possible, although with results the reverse of successful.

The rejoinder of the Bombay Presidency Association anent the appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, approved.

9. The Bombay Samdchár (94), in its issue of the 11th July, observes:—The rejoinder of the Bombay Presidency Association anent the proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, shows that the recent resolution of Government was not accurate. The Association has also shown that it is not unwise to make respectful representations to Government on the subject of appointments when there is a chance of the latter committing a blunder, as in the present case. Small Causes Court Judgeships and Presidency Magistracies are reserved for Natives, to which Europeans are only to be appointed in the absence of deserving Natives. This rule has been violated by the Bombay Government on several occasions without just cause, and the Association was perfectly justified in making a representation in regard to Mr. Webb's appointment. It is to be regretted that Government should repeatedly commit mistakes in replying to public memorials, and that the public should be compelled to expose them. [The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

Reform of the Indian procedure laws recommended.

10. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 5th July, writes:—A Bill has been introduced in England for the purpose of allowing accused persons to give evidence on oath for themselves. In introducing it the Lord Chancellor is said to have remarked that the English criminal law abounded in many and serious irregularities, and that, as a system, it was ridiculous, incongruous and absurd. The Lord Chancellor, perhaps, does not know that almost the whole of this ridiculous, incongruous and absurd system has been imported into India. There are hardly two provisions in the Code of Criminal Procedure or in the Evidence Act which can be said to be based upon Hindu or Mahomedan law, or the usages prevalent among the people. As for the Civil Procedure Code, it is mostly based upon the rules issued under the Judicature Acts, and very often the language is the same. If the English Legislature were to direct the Indian Criminal Procedure Code, the Evidence Act and the Civil Procedure Code to be extended in their entirety to England, there would be no appreciable change in the practice of the English Courts. This fact cannot be denied by those who are acquainted with the law administered in England and our Indian codes. The Government of India has taken no care to conserve what was best in the old Indian procedure. Indeed, our Legislature, in enacting what is called adjective law, appears to have taken it for granted that there was nothing worth conserving, and that the only system which was the best and most suitable was that which the present Lord Chancellor characterizes as ridiculous, incongruous and absurd. In some parts of India Panchâyats were not nonentities, and even in other parts they could have been easily revived. But their procedure was too simple to suit English ideas and English tastes, and they were therefore doomed to death. Again, in some provinces there was a useful class of trackers whose achievements would sound incredible at the present day. But British law simply ignored them, and it is only recently that efforts have been made to give them some standing under local laws. The village Panch, aided by their hereditary officers, were an institution which no previous Government ever destroyed, and one of the heaviest charges against British rule is no other than their destruction. Had the procedure codes been framed in conformity with the customs of the Indian people and not in slavish deference to the law prevailing in England, we should not have suffered from most of the evils now inseparable from the administration of justice. The first of these evils is that, the system being wholly new, the bulk of those affected by it are up to date ignorant of it and have to pay dearly for their ignorance. The second evil is that those who have been able to gain some knowledge of it have found it a useful one for harassing innocent people and for trafficking in litigation. The third evil is its extreme costliness. If all that the pleaders and solicitors and barristers have to be actually paid were taxed as costs in both criminal and civil matters, Government would be astonished at the result. The fourth evil is the increase of perjury—an increase which is bemoaned by every good Judge, and utilised by every bad one. Is it even now too late to put an end to these evils? Is there no English statesman in India who has the necessary constructive genius for incorporating all that was best in the ancient rules into our present procedure codes? We do not, for a moment, say that everything should be turned topsyturvy, and that there should be a return to primitive usages. What we do mean is that the way in which the Legislature has treated all such usages is unjustifiable, and that the best policy would have been, and even now is, to utilize all that was useful and wholesome in those customs. Elphinstone, it is well known, intended to follow this policy, and did follow it with success, so long as he had a hand in the Government of this presidency. But his successors have not trodden in his footsteps and the Government of India has wholly disregarded his eminent example. Sir Raymond West is well acquainted with the legal history of both England and India, and we look to him to suggest amendments in the present law for the purpose of obviating the evils we have pointed out. As a member of our local Council his sphere of usefulness is very limited, and it is therefore a thousand pities that he was not appointed to the Supreme Council. Nevertheless, it is in his power to make enquiries as to the satisfactory working of the procedure law and to bring its defects to the notice of the higher authorities, and we hope he will perform this duty. We need hardly say that a statesman who succeeds in finding a remedy for the grievances here mentioned, will place India under a lasting obligation and deserve well of his own country. In the meantime, we trust that Native States will think twice before they introduce our complex and costly procedure into their territories. The genesis of evil has been always a very interesting study, but those who are responsible for the English system, and therefore for our codes, will feel hardly flattered at the extension of the mischief they have done. It is sad to see how evils propagate themselves; and sadder still to see how one evil is trotted out as an excuse for another. In the recent controversy regarding the Age of Consent Act, the absurd English law which fixes the marriageable age of girls at twelve was cited again and again by the reactionaries as a justification of infant marriage. The English Legislature ought really to put its own household in order, and such obsolete enactments should have no place in its statute book. Every reform of the English law should be welcomed in India, for every such reform means in many cases a reform of the Indian law. We do not, however, expect that English politicians will have, for some years at least, any time to cleanse the Augean stable of their statutory and judge-made law. In India, however, a humane and wise statesman can do a great deal, and we pray that one may yet be found to place our procedure laws on a sounder footing.

Judicial administration in Sind.

11. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 4th July, writes:—Now that the helm of Government is entrusted to a man who has the repute of being an able administrator, and who, moreover, if report says true, has apparently resolved on a close and searching inquiry into all the needs and wants of our province, it would be worth our while, we think, in the interests of the public to assist his deliberations by such suggestions as the welfare of Sind requires. And first of all, we would revert to a subject which has already been well threshed in these columns, but which as being of paramount importance could never be discussed too often. It is the administration of justice and the constitution of the highest tribunal in the land which imperatively require a comment. It is, indeed, anomalous that the province of Sind should in point of administration of justice be severed from the presidency proper almost wholly, whereas in all the other departments it has to abide by its behests. The Sadar Court, the highest Court of appeal and revision in Sind, is presided over by a single Judge. In all criminal cases it has the power of determining conclusively the life and liberty of all but European British subjects. In civil cases it likewise wields the same amount of power without there being a right of appeal or revision, except in suits the value of which exceeds Rs. 10,000, when an appeal lies to the Privy Council. Now, in the first place, it is neither more nor less than establishing a very invidious distinction in granting European British subjects the right of appeal to the Bombay High Court in criminal cases and investing the latter with the right of revising the records of the Sadar Court, whereas the Natives would even in matters of life and death have to rest satisfied with the decision of one single Judge. What could be the principle which could have dictated such a distinction is not intelligible to us, and the only result, as far as we know, that arises from it is to widen the breach between Europeans and Natives and give the latter an additional reason to realize the galling disparity between the two races. In the presidency proper every sentence of death passed by a Sessions Judge is subject to confirmation by a Divisional Bench of the Bombay High Court consisting of two or more Judges; in Sind the same sentence would be subject to the confirmation of a single Judge, and it is a single Judge who has the right of revising the records of all the Courts in Sind, of issuing notices to parties concerned to show cause why they should not be retried, of enhancing sentences,—in short, a single Judge of a Court which is a stepping-stone to the Bombay High Court, discharges all the functions which in the latter Court are discharged by a bench of two or three Judges. Now, even supposing that the Judge of the Sadar Court is a man profoundly versed in legal lore, that he is an astute jurist, yet it is possible that errors in law are likely to be committed even by the most experienced and practical lawyers. Law covers a very wide area, and it requires abilities of no mean order to grasp all its minutiæ and to store up in the memory the formidable array of facts which are spread through the length and breadth of all the text-books on law. Even after 15 or 20 years' experience, there is still a vast volume unfolded before us. The risk, therefore, that must necessarily attend on cases of all nature, from the highest to the lowest, must indeed be very great. In the Bombay High Court provision is even made for a difference of opinion between two Judges, by which the case is referred to a third Judge. The Sadar Court is entirely devoid of any such assistance. However serious may be the doubts entertained, yet it has to depend exclusively on its own discretion. Constituted as it is, therefore, the Sadar Court is not in a position to command much respect with a single Judge. Its popularity or unpopularity will purely depend on the then incumbent, and if he happens to be a man whose qualifications are unquestionable, suitors will be willing to prosecute their appeals to the Sadar Court, but if he fails to inspire the people with sufficient respect for him by his abilities, the latter would rather not appear in the Court than have a precedent laid down which might be fraught with dangerous consequences. In civil matters, where the value of the subject-matter of the suit does not exceed Rs. 10,000, the Sadar Court is, again, the highest Court, beyond which there is no right of appeal. The dictum of a single Judge would, therefore, in such cases be conclusive, and would debar the parties from prosecuting their suit any further. However, in civil matters, where only money or property is concerned, there cannot be as much ground for complaint as in criminal matters when the life of a man is at stake. The interests of the inhabitants of the province of Sind certainly require some amendment in this respect. Either let the Sadar Court consist of a bench of two Judges at least, or if the financial condition should not permit of it, render the Sadar Court directly subordinate to the Bombay High Court, so that appeals could lie from the former to the latter.

Disapproval of the alleged imprisonment of honest debtors by the Judges of the Bombay Small Causes Court.

12. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 5th July, says that honest debtors are still sent to jail and their wives and children deprived of their only support by the Judges of the Bombay Small Causes Court, who have not yet brought into force, except in the case of women, the amended section of the Civil Procedure Code regarding the incarceration of insolvent debtors, and requests Government to enquire why the section is not put into force.

Approval of the admonition administered by the Bombay High Court to Lieutenant-Colonel J. B. Lawrence, Cantonment Magistrate, Belgaum, and a request to Government in the matter.

13. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 5th July, approves of the admonition administered by the Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine and the Honourable Mr. Justice Parsons of the Bombay High Court to Lieutenant-Colonel J. B. Lawrence, Cantonment Magistrate, Belgaum, for having convicted two females of criminal trespass by entering the compound of the bungelow of Dr. Harris, and observes :—The conduct of the Cantonment Magistrate throughout the case was improper and stupid, and as this is not the first time that the High Court has censured him, it is clear that Lieutenant-Colonel Lawrence is unfit for the post and ought to be relieved of his magisterial duties. This case further shows that it is not safe to invest military officers with magisterial functions. [The Surya Prakash (89), in its issue of the 4th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

Power of hearing appeals against the sentences passed by village pátils proposed to be conferred on district authorities.

14. A correspondent, writing to the Bakul (22) in its issue of the 5th July, says :—As an appeal lies only to the High Court against sentences passed by the village police pátils, poor people are unable to carry the matter to that Court and are obliged to submit tamely to the oppression practised by these village officers. The district authorities should be empowered to hear appeals in these cases. The pátils may also be ordered to hold their courts in the Chávdi or village office instead of at their private residences, in order that justice dispensed by them may come under the observation of the villagers.

Remarks on the reply of Government to the memorial of the inhabitants of Bombay in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

15. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 9th July, writes :—We are not altogether satisfied with the reply of Government to the memorial of the inhabitants of Bombay in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, though some of the reasons set forth for not conceding the prayer of the public would appear to be cogent, and though the reply would seem to be courteous. On the whole, however, we are disposed to regard the reply as an off-hand one. It is more ingenious than explicit and reassuring. The attempt to explain away the attitude of the police does not appear to be satisfactory. It is to be hoped that when the proper time comes Government will place before the public all that the police have done in the matter. That is certainly very necessary to allay public apprehensions. Again, Government seem to put a very narrow interpretation upon what the memorialists have asked them to undertake. Government might well refer to their records to see whether or not commissions vested with power to take evidence on oath have been appointed even under circumstances far less serious. Commissions might be constituted so as to suit the circumstances of the case. It is not absolutely necessary that a commission should take a particular form. We do not think with the Government that it is necessary that it should take the form of a tribunal with powers co-ordinate with those of the High Court. We do not see the force of the argument advanced on this point. Moreover, Government seem to overlook the fact that the demand of the memorialists would be well met by giving the commission a form of departmental inquiry—an inquiry conducted by independent and experienced officials, able to supplement the efforts of the police by more evidence and to throw additional light on the mystery. The resolution admits that "there are matters in connection with the case which may properly be referred to the Commissioner of Police for report, and may hereafter come under review by Government." When such is the case there can be no better means for learning those matters in all their phases than the appointment of a commission of inquiry. The Police Commissioner will give satisfactory explanation from his own point of view as regards those matters and the Government are not unlikely to express themselves satisfied or highly satisfied at the efforts, or the extraordinary efforts, of the police in connection with the matter, and there the matter would, we fear, end; whereas a commission would be able to tell Government what the police should have done and what they should not have done. In this there would be no usurpation of the authority of the High Court. All that the public wants to know is, who are the culprits who have brought about the deaths of two innocent girls in the régime of His Excellency Lord Harris in the year A.D. 1891, and whether the police of Bombay of that year acted in the matter as they should have or not. The "good citizens" of Bombay may wait till the end of the trial of Mánekji Asláji to see what the "good Governor" does in the matter.

Remarks on the conduct of the Bombay Police in connection with the enquiry into the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

16. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 5th July, writes:—Two Pársi medical practitioners professionally connected with the families of the unfortunate ladies who fell victims to rapacious lust from the dizzy heights of the Rájábái Tower have written to the Bombay Samáchár (94) in their own names, complaining against the conduct of the police in their persistent, though fruitless, endeavours to find out some ground on which their pet theory of suicide on the part of the deceased may yet be bolstered up. They complain of being pursued with police enquiries as to the physical and mental condition of the ladies, and in the case of one doctor even as to the sexual potency of the husband, in order to obtain some clue whereby to prove that the deceased deliberately threw themselves down from the top balcony of the tower through sheer dissatisfaction and remorse at their unhappy social and domestic relations with their husbands and their families. One of the Pársi doctors goes the length of saying in the Samáchár that Inspector Frámji Bhikáji, who seems to be the most active agent of the police in hunting up evidence of suicide, actually enquired of the doctor whether the husband of one of the deceased had ever been treated by him for venereal disease. This statement, the truth of which we have no reason to doubt, since it is authenticated by the doctor, shows the ferocious zeal with which the police have still adhered to their iniquitous theory of suicide; for, had the doctor replied in the affirmative to the enquiry of the over-zealous Inspector, the police would have been enabled to build up some story of the deceased putting an end to her miserable existence from the vicious propensities of an immoral husband. On moral grounds it is shocking to think of such revolting enquiries carried on by the police against the innocent dead, of sacred and revered memory, in face of the plain verdict returned by the Coroner's jury after patient investigation for several weeks. We may, however, overlook the morality of police delinquencies on the supposition that the police myrmidons are not expected to judge of crimes and offences from a high standard of public morality. But what concerns us most is the glaring fact that the police of Bombay have still set their heart to disprove, by hook or by crook, the theory of foul play and to support the absurd theory of suicide in spite of the Coroner's jury, in defiance of public opinion, and also in sheer defiance of the orders of Government who solemnly charged them in a State resolution to find out the clue of murder in this sad fatality. We are informed of some other enquiries by Inspector Frámji tending to the same end. That the police should have the hardihood still to persist in leading their enquiries in the direction of suicide after the distinct orders of Government to the contrary, is what makes the public look aghast, and if any further proof were wanted by Government to induce them to grant the prayer of the petition for an independent commission of enquiry, this conduct of the police after they received their instructions from the Governor in Council must be the best proof to convince His Excellency and his advisers that little can be expected from entrusting the matter in the hands of the present police.

17. The Hindi Punch (105), in its issue of the 5th July, gives a cartoon representing Justitia throttling the fiend (murder), with the following letter-press:—Bombay, notwithstanding its so-called efficient police force, has become, within the last two months, the very hotbed of deeds of violence. Ever since the 25th April last, when two innocent Pársi ladies were outraged and murdered in broad daylight near the seat of justice, and the perpetrators of the foul deed were allowed to go scot-free owing to the gross negligence and carelessness of the Bombay Police crimes of violence have been on the increase. About half a dozen murders have been committed in Bombay since the fatal 25th April, and all this notwithstanding the braggart and the too too clever police of the First City in India!

Remarks on the extradition case recently dismissed by Mr. C. P. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, by order of Government.

18. The Anglo-Lusitano (158), in its issue of the 2nd July, writes:—The case in which General Vasco Guedes had applied to the Bombay Government for extradition of Dr. Loyola, Messrs. Roque and Jacintho Correa Affonso, S. F. Alvares and J. V. Barreto Miranda, and into which the Bombay Government had ordered an enquiry by Mr. C. P. Cooper, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, has terminated rather curiously. The case has been thrown out by order of the Bombay Government, as though more than six months have elapsed since the requisition for extradition was made, the Portuguese authorities have failed to substantiate the charges framed against the accused. A Government which applies for the extradition of its subjects, especially on such grave charges as are alleged against the accused in the present case, is supposed, if it is in earnest, to push the matter through with the least possible delay. In cases of this kind such grave charges cannot be kept hanging over the heads of persons for ever, and a Government cannot be expected to keep the subjects of a foreign Government under surveillance for an indefinite period. In the case in question it was fortunate that the Bombay Government did not take the accused into custody, which would have been a very great hardship to the latter, who would now have had just reasons to complain of it. General Vasco Guedes appears to have imagined that extradition might be had for the asking, and as Mr. Payne remarked the other day, he does not appear to have comprehended the difference between charges and evidence, or to have understood what was required to be done.

Remarks on the alleged grievances of Mahomedan pilgrims to Jeddah.

19. "A Mahomedan" correspondent of the Mahomedan Herald (4), in its issue of the 10th July, says:—Every year strict orders are being issued by the Turkish Government to the quarantine officials to do their best to please the pilgrims. The chief cause of complaints lies in the ignorance of the pilgrims in regard to sanitary rules of which they had never heard before and to which they had never been accustomed. Simply the enforcement and observance of the sanitary measures tell upon them very severely. Ten days' stay at the isolated island of Cameran and unfolding and exposing their baggage and kits to the fresh air, and the like sanitary precautions, are looked upon by them as undue interference and encroachment on the part of the quarantine employés. It is possible that sometimes quarantine officials may be unavoidably compelled, on account of the obstinacy and unruly conduct of the pilgrims, to carry out the sanitary measures by force. It may be better imagined than described what a troublesome, difficult and responsible job it is for the quarantine officials to manage thousands of unruly pilgrims of Beluchi, Bokhari, Afghan, Sindi, Bengali and other races, pouring in at one and the same time on a spot so barren and so destitute of the necessaries of life. It cannot be denied also that in such a confusion, when every passenger naturally seeks for rest and comfort on landing from a ship after a long voyage, some miscarriage of the rules may take place, for which justice and fair-play make every allowance. My personal knowledge in connection with the complaints is that the pilgrims say something or other against quarantine, and make most of what they consider to be wrong according to their own understanding, and when asked to name precisely their grievances and to mention the names of the particular persons who oppress them at Cameran and Jeddah they fail to do so. In some quarter it is said that the Turkish Government has established quarantine for the purpose of making money. This charge is as absurd as that of burning three cholera-stricken men of S. S. "Sculptor" to death. It is true that for sanitary purposes ten rupees are levied per head at Cameran, but the amount is received from the well-to-do only, and children under seven years and beggars are exempted from it. It is not unknown that the largest number of the pilgrims who go to Jeddah from Bombay are poor; hence it is evident how much money the Turkish Government has been making by this traffic.

20. In expressing gratification at the instructions issued on the application of the Zamindárs of Hoogli by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to the Joint Magistrate of Serampur to prohibit Christian missionaries from preaching within certain limits of the temple of Tárkeshvar, the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th July, says:—It would be well were the Christian missionaries who are in the habit of reviling other religions and their gods, prevented as well from doing the same. There can be no objection to the missionaries praising Christianity howsoever highly, but they should not revile Hinduism by making remarks to the effect that Ráma and Krishna are not gods, that the Vedas are not scriptures. It is strange that Hinduism should be subjected to copious revilings, while not a word should be uttered by them against Mahomedanism. The reason of this difference in the treatment of the two religions can be soon understood by the public.

Christian missionaries should be prohibited from reviling Hinduism.

21. In alluding to the reply of the Government of Bombay to the Bombay Branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 7th July, observes:—Although Government took nearly a year and a quarter to reply to the memorial of the Branch Association regarding the latest regulations for the sale of toddy, they have not clearly supported their position that toddy is an intoxicating drink by publishing the remarks made by their officers upon the memorial or otherwise. It is true that in their resolution on the Abkári administration of last year they complained that in the Surat District the consumption of toddy had increased excessively, but they did not quote statistics in proof of that assertion. Moreover, several experts have often expressed an opinion that toddy is not an intoxicant and not injurious to health, but that, on the contrary, it is nourishing. [The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issues of the 6th and 7th July, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—The severity of the rules in regard to the use of toddy has led to indulgence in poisonous English liquors and of drunkenness in the Bombay Presidency, and if these rules are relaxed for a year Government will discover the truth of the above assertion.]

Disapproval of the reply of Government to the Bombay Branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association.

22. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 8th July, observes:—His Excellency Lord Harris's reply to the Native cricketers of Bombay protesting against the use of the Esplanade by polo-players, although kind, is very disappointing, considering the great importance attached by the Supreme and Local Governments to physical education. Moreover, His Excellency being a well-known cricketer sanguine hopes were entertained of the memorialists' prayer being granted. It is strange that besides the Esplanade there should be no available ground large enough to admit polo-players, and that the convenience of numerous cricketers should not have been consulted, while the accommodation of a handful of polo-players should have been allowed preponderance. It may be added that within the last few days Government have given unfavourable replies to several public memorials, but they must not suppose that this will discourage people from laying their grievances before the authorities. [The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—His Excellency being a keen cricketer must recognise the fact that the same place cannot be suitable for cricket as well as polo. Lord Harris would have satisfied all parties if he had set aside the piece of ground in front of the Marine Lines for polo-players. At least during the rains when cricket season begins, polo-players may be well made to use the Cooperage.]

Reply of His Excellency Lord Harris to the Native cricketers of Bombay protesting against the use of the Esplanade by polo-players disapproved.

23. Alluding to a notification published by the Collector of Ratnágiri on the 21st of April 1891 regarding khoti rights, the Arunodaya (20), in its issue of the 5th July, remarks:—Although the respective rights of the Government and the Khots in khoti villages in the Ratnágiri District have been fixed by the resolution of 1876, the officers of Government have not yet ceased to interfere with the rights of the Khots.

Notification issued by the Collector of Ratnágiri regarding khoti rights and remarks thereon.

We are at a loss to know the real object of the Government in putting forth the notification in which they appear to forget that they are the protectors of their own rights as well as those of their subjects, as they have added to their own rights by encroaching upon those of the Khots.

A complaint against the Assistant Collector of Kaira.

24. A correspondent of the Ahmedabad Times (90), in its issue of the 8th July, observes:—The Assistant Collector of the Kaira District, while riding through the streets of Kaira about a week ago, saw one Lálchand commit nuisance on the road side and struck him with the cane he carried in his hand. He, moreover, fined Lálchand two rupees and sentenced him to a week's imprisonment, but subsequently, at the request of his Shirastedár, he cancelled the sentence of imprisonment. This week he beat one Gabad severely for a similar offence. It is said of this officer that he is so ignorant of the Gujaráti language that he cannot understand the meaning of such common words as Taláti, Mukhi and Rávania, and if this be true, it is not right for Government to invest such inexperienced officers with magisterial powers. The correspondent requests Government to take due notice of the conduct of the Assistant Collector. [The Kaira Vartamán (108), in its issue of the same date, censures Mr. Lawrence, Assistant Collector, Kaira, for striking Gabad, an old man of seventy years, and adds that the district has been of late unfortunate in getting hot-headed officers, since Mr. K. R. Bamanji had once beaten the Police Patel of Kapadvanj, while Mr. Weir was said to have acted similarly towards Rávanias (village watchmen).]

A complaint against the City Police Inspector and the Magistrate, Broach.

25. The Broach Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 9th July, complains that the City Police Inspector of Broach has, in his overzeal in the discharge of his duties, been oppressing the innocent inhabitants of the city and that the local Magistrate has been encouraging him under cover of law and justice. The Samáchár ironically asks the people of Broach to appreciate the services of the City Police Inspector and the Magistrate by making them valuable presents.

The postal guarantee fund condemned.

26. The Bhárat Bhráta (141), in its issue of the 3rd July, observes that it is unjust to maintain the postal guarantee fund created by deductions from the salaries of the postal servants in order to meet losses befalling the Postal Department, inasmuch as the State receives the profits derived from this department while the postmasters alone bear the losses. The paper hopes that this grievance will be duly considered by Government and the postmasters relieved from it.

Part II.—Education.

Disapproval of the way in which temporary vacancies are filled up in the Elphinstone College, Bombay.

27. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 5th July, writes:—It is hard to approve of the way in which temporary vacancies are filled up in the Elphinstone College. The chair of History was vacant. It was offered to Mr. Banáji and he had to refuse, as far as we know, because he did not like the terms on which it was offered. He refusing, of course it has been offered to another and accepted by him. Now, economy is a good thing, but we are sure that in such cases the best course is to offer more favourable terms to the best man available than to go about in search of one who may be willing to accept the low terms offered. The Educational Department can afford to spend a few rupees more in order to secure the best man, even though the appointment may be only temporary. Who can say how much the young students lose by an unhappy selection, forced perhaps on the department in consequence of the hard and fast rules of the Financial Code? As soon as a native of India is honoured with a post in the graded service, he is made to pay for the honour by forfeiting one-third of the fixed pay. This rule is especially objectionable when applied to new men appointed to temporary vacancies. It is much more objectionable when the person selected knows that he has no chance of being confirmed in the appointment, no matter how he works; that the place is really reserved for a more fortunate individual, and that he is only a stop-gap. A conscientious man finds himself in a responsible post which makes a heavy demand on his time and energies. But he also sees that the remuneration he gets is quite inadequate,

An honest man refuses to undertake the heavy responsibility on the conditions offered. Another man, who is not equally alive to his responsibility, or is not even able to discharge efficiently the duties entrusted to him, eagerly clutches at the offer and is accepted. The difference between the teaching of the one man and the other is known only to the unfortunate students, who regret that they have not got the best man to guide them in their studies. We ask whether the Government thinks itself justified in doing what it does. Another question that suggests itself to us in this connection is, has Government decided that no Native should fill permanently the chair of History in the Elphinstone College? No doubt, an Englishman is the right man to fill such a chair. Other things being equal, one who has received his education in England would be preferable to a native of India. But, in the first place, let it be mentioned here that such men as we require are not inclined to accept the terms which alone the Government or the Educational Department offers. Of such as come, a few only are satisfied with their bargain. If the Government makes up its mind to utilise local talent, it must offer reasonable terms. The person selected must have a fair prospect of promotion held out to him. He should feel the assurance that he is not called on to make a sacrifice for a barren honour. We have supposed that the man on whom the choice falls possesses special qualifications for the discharge of his duties. Such a person may be believed to be able to carve out a place for himself by his industry and intelligence. So, nothing less will be a sufficient inducement to him to abandon the chances of a successful career in other walks of life than a promise to do nearly as much for him in this line.

28. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 6th July, writes:—The reply of the Bombay Government to the local Municipal Corporation's remonstrance in the matter of the Government contribution to the cost of primary education is, as was fully anticipated, very disappointing. Considering the character of the present régime a better reply could not be expected. The Government adheres to its resolve of giving only Rs. 28,000 and commits itself by no promises. The Government, indeed, occupies a position of advantage in that the law leaves it free and binds the Corporation to make adequate provision. It repeatedly reminds the Corporation of its statutory liability and of its power to procure funds, but forgets that while the liability is unlimited the power of getting funds is limited by the tax-paying capacity of the people. The Government expresses its absolute inability to pay more than it has already promised, in consequence of the limitations of the Provincial contract and the demands of rural education. But there is one point which the Government has not considered, viz., the police contribution. This question Government has referred to the Government of India, but it is precisely the point which requires consideration in settling the question of the contribution from Government in the matter of education. If it is decided in favour of the Corporation, the latter's claim to have increased contribution from Government will be greatly strengthened.

The Bombay Government and primary education in the city of Bombay.

29. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 5th July, disapproves of the reply of Government, and says that it is not fair for Government to appropriate to themselves the local ábkári revenues to which the local municipality has a right, to shirk the obligation of maintaining the local police and also to load the Corporation with the greater portion of the cost of primary education. The reply, observes the paper, would naturally be regarded with disfavour by the rate-payers on account of the gratuitous advice therein tendered that the municipality may increase taxation, because the rate-payers are already heavily taxed and will not be able to bear any further burden. [The Rájyabhakta (117), in its issue of the 7th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

30. The Karnátak Vritt (136), in its issue of the 3rd July, says that young boys attending the vernacular schools in the Kanarese districts and their teachers have been put to much inconvenience for want of a sufficient supply of certain serial school-books, and requests the Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, to make early arrangements for supplying them.

A request to the Curator, Government Central Book Depôt, Bombay, for the supply of Kanarese school-books to the vernacular schools in the Kanarese districts.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Attention of the president of the Belgaum Municipality invited.

31. The Belgaum Samdchár (23), in its issue of the 6th July, invites the attention of the president of the local municipality to the store of inflammable substances like kerosine oil in the vicinity of the public market, as, in the event of a fire breaking out, the consequences would be very serious, and says that it is dangerous to allow shops of fire-works to be set up in the bazár itself without due precautions. The paper further adds that the instructions of the Sanitary Commissioner about the side-gutters being left open have not yet been attended to by the municipality.

The approaching election of members for the Local Board in the Kaira District and a suggestion in the matter.

32. With reference to the approaching election of members for the Local Board in the Kaira District, the Svadesh Bandhu (127), in its issue of the 8th July, suggests that those towns and villages where there is likely to be some competition, Aval Kárkuns or other responsible officers should be appointed as polling officers instead of ordinary clerks, who, it is said, try to influence voters and tamper with the voting papers, and that the voting-boxes should, after the elections, be properly sealed up in the presence of a committee of a few persons and immediately sent to the nearest police station.

Part IV.—Native States.

Lord Cross represented as a cross elephant in a cartoon in connection with Manipur affairs.

33. The Hindi Punch (105), in its issue of the 5th July, gives a cartoon of an elephant representing Lord Cross, upon whose trunk is written 'Manipur muddle,' and on the right fore leg 'Condemnation by the English Press,' on the left 'Rebuke,' and on the hind legs 'Treachery' and 'Bungle' respectively, and on the main body, 'Political Blunder,' 'Despotism,' 'Immaculate,' 'Power of the Civil and Military Bureaucrats,' and 'Mediocrity.' The elephant is represented as advancing step by step, towards a ditch (Bureaucracy of the Foreign Office of India). The letter-press runs as under:—Hind.—Ah! The cross old thing! Step by step he has advanced sufficiently near to fall headlong into the ditch! (Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, has refused to interfere with the discretion of the Indian Government in awarding capital punishment to the Jubráj and Regent of Manipur, and has generally upheld the Manipur-muddle policy of the Government.)

Refusal of the Government of India to hear counsel on behalf of the Manipur offenders.

34. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 3rd July, writes:—Government, we hear, have declined to hear counsel on behalf of the Manipur offenders. Why should this be so? It is, no doubt, unusual for Government to hear counsel in any case. But the trials themselves are not of an ordinary character, and an exception may well be made for exceptional cases like these, especially as in the original court they had not the benefit of such assistance. Government have wisely intimated that their final orders will not be passed till the end of this month. This leaves the persons concerned sufficient time to make their defence before Government. But, in addition, a point may well be stretched in their behalf to hear their counsel. In proportion as Government gives them all possible facility to defend themselves, it makes its sense of justice manifest to all and removes from the trial all trace of a vengeful spirit.

The fate of the Manipur prisoners.

35. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 6th July, writes:—The fate of the unfortunate Manipur offenders will not be decided until the end of this month. No counsel will be heard on their behalf. But they are at liberty to send up a representation drawn up by legal advisers. Such representation will, it is said, receive due consideration. In all respects their appeal will be treated as ordinary appeals against judicial decisions. Now, when we see that the tribunal which sat in judgment upon them was not an ordinary tribunal, that the procedure adopted by this tribunal was not in all respects such as is followed in ordinary cases, we really fail to understand why in the matter of the appeal the procedure should be restricted to the usual routine. Is His Excellency the Governor-General in Council afraid that if counsel were heard on behalf of the accused, injustice would be done? If the unfortunate Princes had not the best legal assistance at their trials, is it not just, fair and reasonable that such assistance should be allowed to be given at the hearing of the appeal? The Government, if they like, should also hear the Government Advocate-General on behalf of the prosecution. Let the trial be an open and fair one. If the Princes are then proved guilty, let them be punished according to law. As it is, we are not satisfied with the course pursued. The unfairness of the judgment passed upon them is seen especially in the case of the ex-Mahárája and the Senápati, who were proved to have had very little to do with the murders. They have been sentenced to be hanged mainly on the ground of their having conspired against the Government of Her Majesty the Empress of India. But then the question has to be decided if they were bound to obey the orders of the Government of India for the deportation of the Regent or Jubráj and if they should have tamely submitted to an attack on the palace. But the Government of India has acted in this matter on no recognized principle of political morality. So it is idle to expect fair consideration of such points.

Remarks on the order of the Government of India respecting the publication of newspapers in Native States.

36. Under the heading "A threatened reign of distrust and despotism (Are the days of Lord Lytton returning?)" the Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 6th July, quotes the order of the Government of India respecting the publication of newspapers and printed works in places administered by the Governor-General in Council but not forming part of British India, and says:—We have great respect for His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and are loth to place His Lordship on a par with Lord Lytton. But the Government resolution before us leaves us no choice in the matter, and we are constrained to say that if the present orders are a deliberate measure of the Government of India, they plainly indicate that a woful change of spirit is coming upon that Government and that the worst days of the Lytton administration are not far away. It is difficult to believe that a statesman, brought up in the best liberal traditions of England, should so far forget the most elementary teachings of his faith as to issue an order, practically making freedom of speech a sham and a delusion in Native States 'under the administration of the Governor-General in Council.' No one who knows how despotic, high-handed and self-willed Political Agents generally are even in States where the Chief or ruler is not a minor, will have any difficulty in realizing the fact that the present resolution places in the hands of these wayward and bigoted officers a terrible power to stamp out of existence all independence and freedom of speech in Native States. Freedom of thought and freedom of speech have been the two proud privileges of an Englishman, and noble-minded English statesmen have not scrupled to extend these blessings to the people of British India. Does the present Viceroy of the country regret that this should have been the case? Does he hold that these precious privileges have been so far abused in the territory under his direct rule that the Native States ought to be saved from a like consequence? Else, why this restriction on the liberty of the people of Native States? And why on theirs alone? Or is this prohibition the precursor of the curtailment of liberty all round? "Candid friends" of the type of Mr. Lee-Warner make it a point of reproach against the Native States that their rulers do not allow the same freedom to their subjects that the British Government does to its. What has Mr. Lee-Warner now to say to the present action of the Government of India? Will it lie any longer in his mouth to utter this reproach, which, however, we frankly admit, is in many respects well deserved? Who will blame our unenlightened princes, if in the present resolution of the Government of India they find a justification for their own unenlightened methods of government? We confess we do not understand what necessity there was for the Government to issue this despotic order. Is the Government afraid that the spread of advanced political opinions in Native States might make them less loyal to the British rule? If so, never was a greater mistake committed. No man of sense will question the truth of the proposition that enlightened Native States are more to be relied on in the matter of loyalty than those that are educationally backward. Or is the Government of opinion that all criticism of the actions of their representatives in Native States is a crime which must not be perpetrated within the territories of those States? As we understand the matter, the administrations in Native States are suffering, not from a superfluity but from a paucity of independent critics. A single glance at the condition of the press in these States is sufficient to understand the truth of what we say. Already the number of newspapers in these territories is small, and most of these, again, are remarkable only for the shameful manner in which they are ever ready to cringe to the powers that be. Independent and courageous criticism of the conduct of the authorities is thus already conspicuous by its absence in these States, and the Government of India could not have devised a better way of perpetuating this absence than the issuing of its present resolution. Hereafter no newspaper can be started in a Native State under the administration of the British Government without the written permission of the Political Agent, who, presumably, may withhold the permission, if he pleases, without assigning any reason for so doing. It is needless to say that under such circumstances the Political Agent will take care to see, before granting the permission sought, that the paper, solicitous to come into existence, gives guarantees and assurances to keep his actions and those of his favourites outside the pale of its criticism. Bad as this is, this is not all. Indeed, the most terrible provision of the resolution is not this, but the one that enables the Political Agent to extinguish at his own sweet will the existence of a paper that may show signs of independence and courageous utterance! If an editor has the effrontery to whisper the least thing against a Political Agent, that mighty functionary can put into operation clause 4 of this resolution and sweep the paper at once out of existence, and even send the unfortunate writer into a never-ending exile! It is intolerable to think that the people in the Native States will sit tamely under this outrageous order of the Government of India. Their duty under the circumstances is plain. They must protest, and loudly and persistently protest, against this restriction of their liberty, and carry on their agitation till the monstrous resolution is withdrawn. We think we may, on this side of the country, fairly look to Kolhápur—which has so many men of independence and education—to take the lead in the matter. [The Dnyán Prakásh (13) of the 6th and the Native Opinion (15) of the 9th July express similar sentiments.]

37. The Gujarát Mitra (83), in its issue of the 5th July, observes :—The recent orders of the Government of India regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States are probably meant to be applied to countries like Burmah and Manipur, as perhaps it is expected that the oppression ruling there should be screened from the notice of the English Parliament, but this expectation is erroneous. The conduct of British officers there, in spite of this gagging act, is sure to be out sooner or later and reach England through newspapers published under the British jurisdiction. Another reason may, perhaps, be that vernacular newspapers might on account of their spirited writings be a source of trouble to Government. Be that as it may, the measure is sure to be discussed in Parliament, and we wait to see the result. But it must be said that these orders will fail in their objects owing to the newspapers in British territory. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne seems to be deadly opposed to a free vernacular press. His administration has been worse than even that of Lord Lytton, and the sooner he leaves India the better. [The Ahmedabad Times (90), in its issue of the 8th July, observes that people ought to strongly protest against these orders, as perhaps they might be extended to British territories.]

38. The Surya Prakásh (89), in its issue of the 4th July, disapproves of the action of the Government of India regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States, and says that it is not fair to Native Princes that either Government or Political Agents should thus interfere in the internal affairs of their States. Such conduct, the paper says, cannot fail to excite suspicion about Government in the minds of the people. The advantages of a free press, continues the Prakásh, are well-known to Government, and it is to be much regretted that Government should now attempt to gag a portion of it. But the paper feels sure that this action of His Excellency the Viceroy will not be supported by Parliament.

39. The Poona Vaibhav (54), in its issue of the 5th July, says:—One Krishna Adhikári, a detective policeman in the Kolhápur State, was charged with the offence of housebreaking and a complaint was filed against him. The accused being a favourite of the police authorities at Kolhápur, three false complaints were lodged against the complainant in the above case, but in none of them was he found guilty. The City Faujdár, a Jamádár and a high police officer moved in bringing the false charges against the gentleman who prosecuted Krishna. The bad conduct of the policeman was exposed during the trial of these cases, but the authorities have not taken any notice of it. We hope the Kolhápur Darbár will order an inquiry into the matter and save the good name of their administration from being sullied.

A complaint against the police of Kolhápur.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks on His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's two and a half years' administration of India, and suggestions to His Lordship.

1. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—From His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's reply to the toast to his health at the United Service Club dinner, Simla, one thing is quite clear that His Excellency will not leave our shores before the expiration of the term of his office. To our mind, the policy followed by His Excellency has not been a very successful one. He had the example of Lord Dufferin before him, and we thought he would avoid both the Scylla of social legislation and the Charybdis of political evolution. The policy pursued in Kashmere as also in Manipur will not add to his reputation, but, perhaps, his mistakes were the result of either inexperience or of short-sighted counsel. It may yet be hoped that two and a half years' experience may enable him to change his present policy and pursue a more catholic one. If a Viceroy can afford, there are so many things to be done for home improvement that a whole term exclusively devoted to this purpose may not be enough to achieve much. The reform of our Legislative Councils, the separation of the judicial from magisterial functions, the reduction of Home and Indian military charges, the question of permanent settlement and a host of others call for His Excellency's attention. The consolidation of British Government in India ought to be the corner stone of the policy of Government, and Lord Lansdowne ought to see how far that consolidation has progressed under him. To the legislative reform His Excellency has committed himself, and the achievement of that reform ought, at least, to be his pride, nay his ambition.

The present Viceroy of India and his régime.

2. The Chandánshu (25), in its issue of the 12th July, ironically says:—During the last two years of the régime of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne much has been done for the good of the people of India by passing the Age of Consent Act, the Cattle Trespass Act, the Mámlatdárs' Act and the recent resolution regarding the Native press in the Native States, and by bringing about the Manipur affair, and his régime is to continue for about three years more. It is, however, to be hoped that His Lordship will not further oblige the half-starved Indians by enacting similar laws.

Remarks on the resolution of the Government of India on the purchase in India of articles of local manufacture.

3. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—Though the resolution of the Government of India on the purchase in India of articles of local manufacture required for the public service makes no large concessions, it may be welcomed by those interested in the promotion of industries and the material development of India. It has always been a matter for wonder to sensible men that the Government of this country should go to other markets than the Indian for the purchase of articles to be had without much difficulty in India itself. People may wonder, but the fact stands that the Government have done so, and intend doing it still. This course of importing foreign commodities to the neglect of indigenous articles may recommend itself to responsible authorities, but it is no use concealing the fact that it has smashed up most of the old industries and thrown work-people out of employ. It may seem that the time has come to give up the policy of allowing other people to thrive at the expense of the struggling masses of India. Owing to the enterprise of a few keen-sighted Europeans several iron factories have been set up in India, which, if there would be no clashing of interests, might be taken advantage of by the authorities. If they are turned to account, it is needless to say it would encourage industry among the Indians and diminish to an appreciable extent the drain of money to a foreign country.

4. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—We really do not know whether we should look upon the Government of India's resolution on local iron manufactures as a concession to public opinion or whether we should say that it is a confession of the weakness of the Government. There is a third view of the resolution. It may be looked upon as a piece of bread thrown at the barking firms of manufacturers who clamoured so loud for their rights. It is at present very difficult to say which of these three interpretations is correct. Much will depend upon the effect that may be given to the resolution. If the iron-founders give up their cry and cease to agitate, we may well say that this resolution is a morsel of bread large enough to gag their mouths. If they, however, continue to represent their grievances and agitate to get a ratification of the charter of Lord Ripon, and if the Government of India continue to support their claim, we may well be satisfied and say that the position of the Government of India is to be pitied, and that if any efforts are to be made to secure justice they must be directed against the mischievous control of the Secretary of State. In the present case we can safely say that the resolution is a concession extorted from an unwilling Secretary of State, and it will be the bounden duty of all interested in the material development of this country to strengthen the hands of the iron-founders and make it a public grievance. Look as we do at this resolution in this light, we cannot help saying that the Industrial Association of Western India has acted very wisely in having decided to take up the question for discussion before the conference of August next. Between the lines of the resolution we read a very valuable lesson. It is of a very broad significance, and if we can learn it well it will be very useful to us in all our national questions. That lesson is that when we prepare ourselves to ask for a privilege, our capacity to use that privilege ought to be beyond all question, and it ought to be only after we attain to that capacity that we should ask. Any earlier attempts do not only prove unsuccessful, but often put off the fruit of our labours indefinitely.

5. The Hindi Punch (105), in its issue of the 12th July, gives a cartoon representing the Punch holding a magnet (public opinion) before the Bombay Government which is bound to a tree (Bureaucracy) and therefore resists the magnetic attraction. The letter-press runs as under:—She is bound down to the tree, and she won't be drawn towards the magnet. [The Webb, the Polo, the Toddy and the Rájábái Tower tragedy resolutions of the Bombay Government, fully savouring of the spirit of bureaucracy, have been generally viewed by the Bombay public with disfavour.]

The Bombay Government represented in a cartoon anent its replies to the recent memorials of the Bombay public.

6. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 15th July, regrets that His Excellency Lord Harris, who last year declared that he could not afford much time for cricket, should now be totally occupied with that game, and observes:—This will give rise to a belief among the Natives that because His Excellency was engaged in sport he could not pay sufficient attention to the memorials recently submitted to him, and curt replies were given to these memorials. The Natives seem to think that Governors ought not to devote much of their time to sport, and this rule seems to be observed in England, where Ministers and other high officers do not mix in sport at all.

His Excellency Lord Harris engaged in the game of cricket and remarks thereon.

7. In a paragraph, headed, "Are the eyes of His Excellency the Governor open?" the Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 18th July, says:—Looking at the tone and language of the resolutions issued by the Bombay Government during the last fortnight, one is led to think that His Excellency the Governor has entrusted the reins of his office to the hands of one or two bold, meddlesome and anti-Native Secretaries, and has been himself either enjoying sound sleep or diverting himself with cricket. For, otherwise it is not conceivable that such resolutions should be issued before the eyes of His Excellency, who has only recently come out of the sacred abode of the goddess of liberty and who is well-known for his courtesy and regard for public opinion. The letter addressed by Government to the Bombay Presidency Association is very bold in its tone and shows utter contempt for public opinion. There are very few people in this presidency who have as much knowledge of the Abkári Department as Mr. D. E. Vacha, Secretary of the Bombay Branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, has. His opinions on this subject are formed after a long study of materials collected with great trouble by him. It is only Request to His Excellency Lord Harris to keep proper control over his Secretaries.

Mr. Lee-Warner (or his Assistant Mr. Harvey) who could boldly tell such a person as he that he knew nothing of the subject. It is much to be regretted that His Excellency Lord Harris should allow his Secretary to write with such liberty. Undoubtedly these officials could not have written in this way under the administration of Lord Reay. We request His Excellency Lord Harris to open his eyes and to put proper restraint upon his Secretaries. His Excellency ought to know that he will never be able to secure the good will of the people by treating public opinion with contempt.

Standard of morality among Europeans and remarks thereon.

8. The Arunodayá (20), in its issue of the 12th July, says:—The remark that the standard of morality among Europeans is higher than that among Natives is rendered untrue by the examples of Messrs. Wilson, Crawford and Wittenbaker, a forest officer of Berár who has been lately sentenced to imprisonment by the High Court of Bombay for criminal breach of trust. All these officers drew large salaries, but did not hesitate to resort to mean practices. Does it not follow from these instances that had the Europeans been placed in our position, they would have more often committed immoral acts?

Acquittal of Mánekji Asláji, the accused in the Rájábái Tower tragedy, in the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court.

9. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 16th July, writes:—All is well that ends well, and with the acquittal of Mánekji Asláji of all the five charges fresh ground is created for further inquiry into the Rájábái Tower tragedy. With the most competent legal authority on the bench, the most independent legal advisers on both the sides, and an independent jury, the final decision acquitting Mánekji Asláji of all the charges ought to command the confidence of every community, Pársi, Hindu, Mahomedan and European. The case against the accused seemed from the first so weak as not to require the calling of evidence on his behalf, and for this reason his counsel waived this privilege. However, as a subject of further inquiry, the unfortunate tragedy remains just in the same position as it was in at the beginning, and the last memorial of the vigilance committee may afford Government fresh motives for its further prosecution. We have no doubt that in the further inquiry Government and the police will be as much interested as the Native community at large, and a solution of it will be received with the utmost pleasure. But British detective skill has not yet been able to find out the White Chapel murderer, and possibly the culprit in the tower tragedy may ever remain undiscovered and the baffiement of our efforts to find him out may ultimately settle down into the now natural theory of suicide. Let us wait and watch the result of the further inquiry. [The Indu Prakásh (14) of the 13th July and the Gujarát Darpan (81) of the 16th idem express similar sentiments. The Dnyánodayá (12), the Dnyán Prakásh (13), the Kesari (43) and the Káside Mumbai (109) of the week agree in saying that the verdict of acquittal arrived at by the jury in the case against Mánekji Asláji was a foregone conclusion, as the evidence for the prosecution was very weak.]

10. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 14th July, observes:—There is no cause for surprise at the result of the trial of Mánekji Asláji in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case. The witnesses for and against the accused had been so mixed up by the prosecution that there was no opportunity for cross-examining the witnesses who spoke in favour of the prisoner. The prosecution should have been left to the relatives of the deceased, or the trial postponed until Government had enquired into the conduct of the police. The Judge and the jury believed the witnesses who spoke in favour of the prisoner and disbelieved those who spoke against him, leaving out of consideration all the surrounding circumstances upon which the public have formed a different opinion. We regret no more light has been thrown by the trial either on the conduct of the police or on the tragedy itself. Much, therefore, remains to be done by the public, and that should be done cautiously and carefully. [The Akhbáre Soudgar (92), in its issue of the 15th July, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that the writers of the anonymous letters received by the Honourable Judge and one of the jurors should be traced out and brought to book by the police. The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issues of the 14th and 15th July, adds that the children's evidence deserved better appreciation on account of their age and the other circumstances connected with them.]

11. The Pársi Tikdhár (115), in its issue of the 15th July, observes:—Long before the reply of the Bombay Government anent the tower tragedy memorial was issued it was anticipated that Mánekji would be acquitted, as the police had been working on wrong lines altogether. The fact of the perpetrators of the murders of two young females committed in broad daylight in the city of Bombay going scot-free is enough to cause fright. Government egregiously erred in entrusting the prosecution to the police, who had already made up their mind on it. The prosecution, besides, at the Sessions Court brought forward some evidence which was in favour of Mánekji and which, therefore, could not be subjected to real cross-examination. It was for such a reason as this that the memorialists had prayed to Government for the appointment of a commission, and had Government acceded to their request much more light might have been thrown upon the mystery. [The Broach Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 16th July, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—There is no shadow of doubt that the Pársi ladies have been murdered, but the murderers' money seems to have served to screen them. Truth, however, will come out sooner or later. In another place the Samáchár observes:—People are very anxious to see the alleged Khoja accomplices of Mánekji Asláji brought to book. The police seems to have come to the theory of accident on insufficient grounds, and if what the witness Bhagwándás deposed to about Mr. MacDermott be true, that officer deserves to be criminally tried.]

Remarks on the letter of the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran to the Times of India anent the case of Mánekji Asláji.

12. The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 16th July, observes:—The Honourable Mr. Justice Farran's letter to the Times of India in connection with his summing up at Mánekji Asláji's trial seems to be unprecedented and is rather uncalled for. His Lordship's motive is commendable, but the theory of accident which he appears to support cannot meet with general approval. He had no evidence before him to form an opinion on that point. [The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 17th July, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that so long as the absence of Kasti (sacred thread) and Máthe bánu (head-piece) of Bachubái is not clearly accounted for, the Pársis cannot be made to change their present opinion about the fatality, and had the relatives of the deceased ladies been allowed to take part in the trial of Mánekji Asláji they would have been able to throw a deal of light on the subject.]

Letter of Mr. Sorábji Shápurji Bengáli, C.I.E., anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy and comments thereon.

13. The Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 16th July, publishes a letter from Mr. Sorábji Shápurji Bengáli, C.I.E., in which he says that there has been much useless excitement with regard to the Rájábái Tower tragedy, which was due to the circulation of false rumours about outrage and murder, and that the editors of the Pársi papers who fanned the flame deserve to be censured. But now that the trial of Mánekji Asláji is over, Mr. Bengáli suggests that the money collected should be returned to the subscribers. He regrets that the Pársi leaders also forgot their duty in this matter, but he now hopes that the decision of such an impartial Judge as the Honourable Mr. Farran, who was lately praised by the whole Native press, will quiet the excitement. In commenting on Mr. S. S. Bengáli's letter, the Jâme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 16th July, observes:—Mr. Bengáli, like the police, the Government, and several Europeans, seems to have been misled in this matter, and if he had properly known the real feelings of the Pársis he would not have blamed the Pársi editors. It is strange that Mr. Bengáli has altogether omitted to mention the cause that may, in his opinion, have led to the deaths of the deceased ladies. [The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 17th July, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—Had it been a case of mere suicide it would have been noticed by the vernacular papers as an ordinary occurrence, but there being no evidence to support that theory, the same must be left out of consideration; nor can the theory of accident hold good. There is, however, strong evidence to support the theory of outrage. It is therefore necessary that the subject should be freely discussed in order that the offenders may be brought to account. It is to be much regretted that Mr. Bengáli should have unnecessarily rebuked the Pársi editors and leaders of the Pársi community.]

Reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Párais anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

14. In a contributed article, the Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—The reply of the Governor in Council to the memorial of the Párais anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy is as sound as it is sympathetic. The case is admittedly as serious as it possibly could be, and that, therefore, it should move the whole community with something more than mere sympathy is quite legitimate and justifiable. But the extraordinary nature of the case cannot be considered by responsible authorities a sufficient reason to depart from or to interrupt the ordinary course of justice. Whether the police have been remiss in their duty in tracking the offence, if there be one, will be apparent in the course of the trial. Government rightly observe that at this moment it is, at all events, inopportune to adopt any one of the courses suggested in the memorial. It must be remembered that the police along with the accused is, as it were, on its trial; and therefore to prejudice the case or anticipate the result in any way will be injurious to both. We are glad that Government have in this affair managed to keep their head on their shoulders and refused to be tempted to deviate from the established practice on the mere allegation of want of all possible exertions on the part of the police, which, as the resolution remarks, is quite inconsistent with the traditions of the Bombay Police. If the memorialists or any other people have reason to suspect any unfair practices on anybody's part, they must say so courageously and be able to prove it with sufficient evidence.

15. The Gujarát Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 12th July, observes:—The inhabitants of Bombay were wrong in sending a memorial to Government on the subject of the Rájábái Tower tragedy before the trial of Mánekji Asláji at the High Court was over, and Government in declining to accede to their request have brought forward very telling and convincing arguments.

16. The Satyá Mitrá (119), in its issue of the 12th July, observes:—That the Bombay Government would give the reply they did to the Rájábái Tower case memorial was a foregone conclusion and the Párais fully deserved such a rebuff. High Government officials have no high opinion of the Párais, nor are they afraid of permanently forfeiting the confidence of that community, for they are conscious that by slight measures at conciliation, such as invitations to breakfasts, &c., they will be able to regain that confidence. We advise those Párais who may be thinking of agitating the matter further to remain quiet.

17. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—The resolution of Government on the important and weighty memorial of the general community of Bombay praying for the appointment of a commission to inquire into the Rájábái Tower fatality is a most disappointing document. It would be difficult to imagine a feebler or a more evasive and inconclusive reply to such a well-considered and influential representation, on matters involving questions of great public importance. The public confession of the absolute inability and helplessness of Government, with all the elaborate and many-sided machinery at their disposal, to investigate a case of such gravity with the necessary safeguards and powers calculated to get at the truth, is, by no means, the most remarkable, though it certainly is the most uncomfortable, feature of this remarkable document. The resolution betrays a strange misapprehension of the clear aim and object of the memorial, and of the scope of the suggested inquiry. It contains fallacies which it does not require any elaborate argument to demonstrate. It indicates an inexplicable misconception of the functions of the High Court, and of the scope of the trial in which that tribunal is now engaged. It abounds in unfounded assumptions and groundless fears of a probable conflict with the authority of the High Court, and of the usurpation by the proposed body of investigation of the functions of that Court. It ignores the fact that the memorialists studiedly avoided making any suggestion as to the form of the proposed inquiry, or the conditions under which it was to be carried on, beyond pointing out the importance of its operations being conducted under circumstances calculated to ensure a complete and independent investigation, and necessarily left the most absolute discretion to Government in that as in all other matters. It overlooks the fact that the prayer of the memorial was not limited to the appointment of a commission, but that Government was further requested to take such other steps as it considered necessary or expedient to carry out the object the memorialists had in view. It assigns very unsatisfactory reasons for deferring at present any inquiry Government might ultimately decide to hold in regard to the matters which formed the subject of the memorial. In fact, there is not a paragraph of the resolution which is not vulnerable in points doubtless intended to be most telling. Altogether the reply is as disappointing as it is possible to conceive, and furnishes another noteworthy instance of the consideration which Government seem determined to vouchsafe to opinion which, not only "claims to be," but emphatically is, popular. The community of Bombay can scarcely be expected to be satisfied with such treatment, and we should be sorry if they allowed the matter to rest in this unsatisfactory position. The committee which organised the movement have the sympathy and support of the public, and the work which they have undertaken is of much public importance; and if they persevere in their efforts, they are not likely to be disappointed in the end, especially as Government have held out a hope, faint as it is, of instituting some sort of inquiry after the conclusion of the sessions case. [The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 12th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

18. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—The reply of Government to the memorial on the Rájábái Tower tragedy is sympathetic and recognizes to the full the necessity for "penetrating a dark mystery with the light of inquiry." Although some of the reasons which have been given for declining to accede to the request of the memorialists admit of an effective answer, there cannot be the slightest doubt that Government are as anxious as any member of the public "for the discovery and conviction of any who may have perpetrated a foul murder." It is conceivable that policy, as much as justice, may be at the bottom of the refusal to order a commission of inquiry. It may at times prove disastrous for Government to move as quickly as popular sentiment would wish it to, or to move exactly in the direction desired by popular opinion. It is possible that Government, too, have been struck with the extraordinary attitude of the police, but they may not have considered it politic to take the public into their confidence and express their suspicion to the public. Their intervention could only be justified by a grave necessity, by the urgent demand of justice, and by the fear that justice would not be done if they did not intervene. The resolution of Government says the occasion for deciding on such a step has not arisen, maintaining that it could only be taken if it could be proved that the police had been wilfully guilty of "a gross and nefarious crime, one particularly nefarious in the case of a police officer." Here we join issue with Government. We say that the conduct and demeanour of the police, the spirit in which they carried on the cross-examination of witnesses whose evidence went to support the theory of foul play at the Coroner's inquest, the spirit of partisanship displayed by them while their duty was to have remained neutral and impartial in their efforts to discover a clue to the mystery—all these raised in the public mind a profound distrust of the police. The public saw and felt their conduct as Government from their distance and their position cannot. They saw in that conduct something strange and extraordinary, and very naturally feared that the ends of justice would be frustrated—and that in a case which had deeply moved their hearts and minds—if the police were allowed to have their own way. The public asked for an inquiry because, as the police seemed to have made it, it was neither thorough nor searching. It was evidently directed in one groove only, and that was where the discovery of the clue was least expected. Government demand positive proof of the wilful neglect of the police and suggest that the Magistrate's Court is open to any one who may choose to proceed against them. They say it is not proved that Mr. MacDermott clung to his view against demonstration of its unsoundness. It is impossible in a case like this to demonstrate by positive evidence that the police have been wilfully guilty of lamentable neglect of duty. But taking the case as a whole, and following it in all its circumstances from day to day, we cannot resist the conclusion that the conduct of the police has been inexplicable, that whether they were guilty of wilful neglect of duty or not, their conduct was eminently calculated to bring about a failure of justice, if, as there is too much reason to suppose, there was foul play. The public regarded such result with utter dismay and accordingly went to Government, praying for the appointment of a commission which would work in the right direction or in all directions, instead of adhering, through thick and thin, to some preconceived notions. It would appear, therefore, that, irrespective of the question whether there was a deliberate crime on the part of the police or not, such inquiry as they had chosen to make having proved miserably partial and inadequate, there was absolute necessity, in the interests of truth and justice, for their supersession by others who may be both willing and competent for the task of making a complete and satisfactory investigation with the sole object of getting at the truth. We fail to see the force of the argument that a commission would have no authority to take evidence on oath, and that a public inquiry made by it side by side with that made in the High Court might prejudice the course of justice. This argument would be irresistible, if we were only to accept all the assumptions underlying it. It assumes that the inquiry would be public, that it would be side by side with Mánekji Asláji's trial at the sessions, and that there was no way by which the man's trial could possibly be postponed to the next sessions in order that an independent commission working conscientiously may be able to collect what further evidence it can and place it before the High Court to be sifted and decided upon by the presiding Judge. The police having, on their own admission, favoured the theory of suicide, there is not all the evidence that might otherwise have been obtainable in connection with foul play. If the man Mánekji Asláji is guilty, it is probable that more evidence would have been forthcoming if only the police had cared to do their duty. As it is, such evidence as there is with reference to crime has been procured, not by the police, but by others. The police, with their skill, their organization, and the power with which they are invested by law, might have worked to better purpose if they had chosen. But they did not choose, whatever be the reason : hence the prayer for a commission—hence the necessity for its appointment. Under the circumstances, it would not have been an act of injustice to the accused, if his trial had been postponed. It is cruel, no doubt, that a grave charge should be kept hanging over a person for three long months. But if he be guilty and should escape his doom in consequence of an insufficient and incomplete inquiry, it would be a monstrous and terrible wrong. It was an evil that the sword should be kept hanging over his head so long; but the conduct of the police had rendered it a sad necessity, and Government might have applied for a postponement and appointed a commission in consequence of the sad necessity. The resolution proceeds :—"If in the course of the trial it should appear that the police have erred in dealing with the case by either undue action or omission, the presiding Judge will, without doubt, in the discharge of his duty pronounce a censure on their conduct. Imputations may, on the other hand, be thrown on the police in the course of the trial, which the presiding Judge may pronounce calumnious." This is all well and good, so far as it goes. But it must not be forgotten that the High Court can only deal with such evidence as is brought before it, and that evidence may not be sufficient to enable the Judge to pronounce any positive opinion either for or against the police. Government say very truly that there was nothing wrong in releasing Mánekji Asláji, if the police could not then establish a prima facie case against him. Yes, if they could establish that. But the question is—Had they good and sufficient reason to release the man with the torn jacket within a few hours after the tragedy? Or, if it was considered advisable not to keep him longer in custody, was it not a serious piece of bungling that the police officer should have allowed him to go away in the clothes which were on his person when he was taken in custody? Had Mr. MacDermott then really good reasons to put implicit faith in the story of the dog and the torn jacket? We are sorry to say that the conduct of the officer cannot be too severely condemned for this initial mistake he made. The Government say that until the trial is concluded the conduct of the police cannot be correctly appraised. The only misfortune is that the trial alone cannot furnish sufficient materials for forming a correct estimate of their conduct. The resolution concludes by observing that "in India, where popular judgment is stances calculated to ensure a complete and independent investigation, and necessarily left the most absolute discretion to Government in that as in all other matters. It overlooks the fact that the prayer of the memorial was not limited to the appointment of a commission, but that Government was further requested to take such other steps as it considered necessary or expedient to carry out the object the memorialists had in view. It assigns very unsatisfactory reasons for deferring at present any inquiry Government might ultimately decide to hold in regard to the matters which formed the subject of the memorial. In fact, there is not a paragraph of the resolution which is not vulnerable in points doubtless intended to be most telling. Altogether the reply is as disappointing as it is possible to conceive, and furnishes another noteworthy instance of the consideration which Government seem determined to vouchsafe to opinion which, not only "claims to be," but emphatically is, popular. The community of Bombay can scarcely be expected to be satisfied with such treatment, and we should be sorry if they allowed the matter to rest in this unsatisfactory position. The committee which organised the movement have the sympathy and support of the public, and the work which they have undertaken is of much public importance; and if they persevere in their efforts, they are not likely to be disappointed in the end, especially as Government have held out a hope, faint as it is, of instituting some sort of inquiry after the conclusion of the sessions case. [The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 12th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

18. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—The reply of Government to the memorial on the Rájábái Tower tragedy is sympathetic and recognizes to the full the necessity for "penetrating a dark mystery with the light of inquiry." Although some of the reasons which have been given for declining to accede to the request of the memorialists admit of an effective answer, there cannot be the slightest doubt that Government are as anxious as any member of the public "for the discovery and conviction of any who may have perpetrated a foul murder." It is conceivable that policy, as much as justice, may be at the bottom of the refusal to order a commission of inquiry. It may at times prove disastrous for Government to move as quickly as popular sentiment would wish it to, or to move exactly in the direction desired by popular opinion. It is possible that Government, too, have been struck with the extraordinary attitude of the police, but they may not have considered it politic to take the public into their confidence and express their suspicion to the public. Their intervention could only be justified by a grave necessity, by the urgent demand of justice, and by the fear that justice would not be done if they did not intervene. The resolution of Government says the occasion for deciding on such a step has not arisen, maintaining that it could only be taken if it could be proved that the police had been wilfully guilty of "a gross and nefarious crime, one particularly nefarious in the case of a police officer." Here we join issue with Government. We say that the conduct and demeanour of the police, the spirit in which they carried on the cross-examination of witnesses whose evidence went to support the theory of foul play at the Coroner's inquest, the spirit of partisanship displayed by them while their duty was to have remained neutral and impartial in their efforts to discover a clue to the mystery—all these raised in the public mind a profound distrust of the police. The public saw and felt their conduct as Government from their distance and their position cannot. They saw in that conduct something strange and extraordinary, and very naturally feared that the ends of justice would be frustrated—and that in a case which had deeply moved their hearts and minds—if the police were allowed to have their own way. The public asked for an inquiry because, as the police seemed to have made it, it was neither thorough nor searching. It was evidently directed in one groove only, and that was where the discovery of the clue was least expected. Government demand positive proof of the wilful neglect of the police and suggest that the Magistrate's Court is open to any one who may choose to proceed against them. They say it is not proved that Mr. MacDermott clung to his view against demonstration of its unsoundness. It is impossible in a case like this to demonstrate by positive evidence that the police have been wilfully guilty of lamentable neglect of duty. But taking the case as a whole, and following it in all its circumstances from day to day, we cannot resist the conclusion that the conduct of the police has been inexplicable, that whether they were guilty of wilful neglect of duty or not, their conduct was eminently calculated to bring about a failure of justice, if, as there is too much reason to suppose, there was foul play. The public regarded such result with utter dismay and accordingly went to Government, praying for the appointment of a commission which would work in the right direction or in all directions, instead of adhering, through thick and thin, to some preconceived notions. It would appear, therefore, that, irrespective of the question whether there was a deliberate crime on the part of the police or not, such inquiry as they had chosen to make having proved miserably partial and inadequate, there was absolute necessity, in the interests of truth and justice, for their supersession by others who may be both willing and competent for the task of making a complete and satisfactory investigation with the sole object of getting at the truth. We fail to see the force of the argument that a commission would have no authority to take evidence on oath, and that a public inquiry made by it side by side with that made in the High Court might prejudice the course of justice. This argument would be irresistible, if we were only to accept all the assumptions underlying it. It assumes that the inquiry would be public, that it would be side by side with Mánekji Asláji's trial at the sessions, and that there was no way by which the man's trial could possibly be postponed to the next sessions in order that an independent commission working conscientiously may be able to collect what further evidence it can and place it before the High Court to be sifted and decided upon by the presiding Judge. The police having, on their own admission, favoured the theory of suicide, there is not all the evidence that might otherwise have been obtainable in connection with foul play. If the man Mánekji Asláji is guilty, it is probable that more evidence would have been forthcoming if only the police had cared to do their duty. As it is, such evidence as there is with reference to crime has been procured, not by the police, but by others. The police, with their skill, their organization, and the power with which they are invested by law, might have worked to better purpose if they had chosen. But they did not choose, whatever be the reason : hence the prayer for a commission—hence the necessity for its appointment. Under the circumstances, it would not have been an act of injustice to the accused, if his trial had been postponed. It is cruel, no doubt, that a grave charge should be kept hanging over a person for three long months. But if he be guilty and should escape his doom in consequence of an insufficient and incomplete inquiry, it would be a monstrous and terrible wrong. It was an evil that the sword should be kept hanging over his head so long; but the conduct of the police had rendered it a sad necessity, and Government might have applied for a postponement and appointed a commission in consequence of the sad necessity. The resolution proceeds :—"If in the course of the trial it should appear that the police have erred in dealing with the case by either undue action or omission, the presiding Judge will, without doubt, in the discharge of his duty pronounce a censure on their conduct. Imputations may, on the other hand, be thrown on the police in the course of the trial, which the presiding Judge may pronounce calumnious." This is all well and good, so far as it goes. But it must not be forgotten that the High Court can only deal with such evidence as is brought before it, and that evidence may not be sufficient to enable the Judge to pronounce any positive opinion either for or against the police. Government say very truly that there was nothing wrong in releasing Mánekji Asláji, if the police could not then establish a prima facie case against him. Yes, if they could establish that. The Government say that until the trial is concluded the conduct of the police cannot be correctly appraised. The only misfortune is that the trial alone cannot furnish sufficient materials for forming a correct estimate of their conduct. The resolution concludes by observing that "in India, where popular judgment is so apt to be misled by prejudices and by race feeling, it is particularly desirable that the sphere of reason, mercy and justice should not be roughly invaded by any impulsive action of popular sentiment." This, again, is unobjectionable in itself; but it has little application to the present case. Popular sentiment is deeply aroused, but is it not, at the same time, justly aroused in a righteous cause? The resolution lays down this and other general propositions which, in themselves, are unobjectionable. But they have scarcely any bearing on the prayer of the petitioners for granting a commission of inquiry in order that the mystery may be revealed and the truth known.

19. The Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 12th July, observes:—The reply given by the Bombay Government to the Rájábái Tower tragedy memorial is very disappointing and reflects discredit on His Excellency Lord Harris. It is a pity that Government should have paid no attention to the matters complained of in the memorial. Government were never asked to usurp the function of the High Court, and the memorialists were justified in asking Government to postpone the trial of Mánekji Asláji for the purpose of collecting further evidence against him, which when he is acquitted by the High Court would be quite useless. But since it is necessary that the mystery should be solved in order to restore public confidence, those interested in the tragedy should publish the whole literature upon the subject in pamphlet form, which should be entitled "The Second Year of Lord Harris," and that the same should be translated into European languages and freely distributed in the different countries of Europe. [The Pársi Tikákár (115), in its issue of the 15th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

20. The Hindí Punch (105), in its issue of the 12th July, gives a cartoon representing the Bombay Police as running mad with delight at the reply of the Bombay Government to the Rájábái Tower tragedy memorial. The letterpress under the heading of "The Curs(e) of Bombay in a mad frenzy of delight" runs as under:—Frantic delight! Wild joy! "Laughter holding both its sides!" But gently, my boys, gently, for who can tell what's concealed in the womb of time, and what is yet in store for you? "He laughs best who laughs last." [The refusal of the Bombay Government to appoint a commission to inquire into the conduct of the Bombay Police regarding the Rájábái Tower tragedy has been hailed with delight by the force.]

21. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 13th July, writes:—The Presidency Association has lost no time in sending a rejoinder to the Government of Bombay in the matter of Mr. Webb's appointment. The rejoinder, we are bound to say, compares most favourably with the Government's reply. It is dignified and respectful, at the same time not wanting in force and vigour. The Association neatly turns every point against the Government. Some of the points especially will be bitter pills for the Government to swallow. The Association vindicates its claim to submit to Government its views on public measures. It defines its representative character, and repudiates any participation in the memorial of 1887. The charge of inconsistency is nicely answered, and Government is further told that "inconsistency is an infirmity not confined to popular opinion." The object of the memorial is shown to be not to deal with personal claims, which only come to be discussed incidentally, but to assert a principle. The Secretary of State has laid down a certain principle and policy, and the Association feels itself bound to watch the working of the rules of that policy. The memorial winds up with a firm yet dignified protest against the sneering manner in which the Government treated the last memorial. Here is a lesson to Government in the principles of good government as well as good manners. Let us hope the Government will profit by it. [The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 12th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

The Bombay Government and the local Presidency Association on the appointment of a Presidency Magistrate in Bombay.

22. In a contributed paragraph, the Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—It is truly said that the resolution which lately appeared over the signature of Mr. Secretary Lee-Warner is but a reflection of the opinions that found expression some time ago in the Madras Christian College Magazine. The similarity of tone and arguments as well as the spirit of defiance of popular opinion that runs through the whole document is so striking that it demands no ordinary exercise of the faculty of memory to bear in mind that it purports to be an expression of the views of His Excellency the Governor in Council, and not the individual opinions of the writer in the Madras magazine. Regarded in that light, it is a sad but sure indication of the complete change that has come over the attitude of the present Government of Bombay compared with that in the times of Lord Harris's predecessor. The present personnel of that Government seem to be labouring under the delusion that by treating public opinion with courtesy they will lay themselves open to the charge of having divested themselves of their responsibility—in short, of having abdicated; and it is no wonder, therefore, that entertaining, or rather being made to entertain, as they do, such radically mistaken views of the respective spheres of popular opinion and official responsibility, they are apprehensive lest by even appearing to take into consideration that opinion, public interests will not be served. We should have very much liked if the resolution, instead of trying to point out inconsistencies where none existed, had a little more elucidated this question of public interests, which impliedly in this case demand the preference of a European to a Native, even at the risk of having to exercise exceptional powers of discretion vested in the local Government.

23. The Ahmedabad Times (90), in its issue of the 15th July, observes:—We do not think that the reply given by Government to the memorial of the Bombay Presidency Association regarding the appointment of Mr. Webb as Third Presidency Magistrate, is in accordance with the wishes of His Excellency Lord Harris, but if he has approved it it will certainly lower His Excellency in the opinion of the public. The memorial was addressed to the Secretary of State for India and ought to have been at once forwarded to its destination with such remarks as Mr. Lee-Warner deemed fit to make on it. But he probably feared that the memorial would reduce Mr. Webb's chances of success if it was sent at once, and therefore used this shift. Mr. Lee-Warner has, moreover, failed to meet the arguments of the memorialists. He has charged the Association with inconsistency, but has forgotten that the same could be said of Government as well.

Appointment of Mr. J. S. Slater, Barrister-at-law, as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, disapproved.

24. In alluding to the appointment of Mr. J. S. Slater, Barrister-at-law, as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, during the absence of Mr. C. P. Cooper, the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 17th July, observes:—Mr. Slater has been in practice as a barrister for only three years, and even during this period he has not distinguished himself so as to merit this appointment. The posts of Presidency Magistrates are, moreover, reserved for Natives, and European barristers who have had ten years' practice at the bar and know one of the local vernaculars are only to be appointed under exceptional circumstances. We do not think that a Native was not available for Mr. Cooper's place and that Mr. Slater possesses the necessary qualifications. But supposing the leading barristers declined to accept this post only for a short time, the other Presidency Magistrates should have had a lift and Mr. Shivshankar Govindrám could have been appointed Third Magistrate.

Remarks on the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial of the Bombay Branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association on the question of toddy.

25. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 13th July, writes:—The Anglo-Indian Temperance Association has given Government another opportunity of showing its utter disregard for popular opinion and contempt of public associations. The Anglo-Indian Temperance Association, or rather its Bombay Branch, submitted a memorial on the well-known question of toddy. Government affects surprise that an association having temperance for its object should ask for relaxation of the restrictions on toddy-drinking; but the Government, or rather the Secretary, who probably flatters himself he has made a crushing point, betrays his own ignorance. The whole point of the toddy agitation is that toddy is a harmless, healthful drink, that it is used as food, and that the restrictions placed on it drive people to the use of spirituous liquors. The plea to remove the restrictions has, therefore, the object of weaning people away from spirit-drinking by giving them a healthier substitute. The Government also charges the Secretary of the Association with inaccurate statements. We do not know what precise statements are meant, but we know Mr. Vácha is fully capable of substantiating his statements. Above all, the tone which the Government has adopted is most regrettable. We cannot think that it adds to the prestige or dignity of the Government.

26. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 12th July, observes:—The reply of the Bombay Government to the weighty memorial of the Bombay Branch of the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association is very captious and disappointing. Toddy not being an intoxicant is not so injurious to health as liquor, but, on the contrary, serves as a nourishment to the poor, and for a reduction in its price Messrs. Smith, Caine, and others have made out a good case. The local Branch was, therefore, perfectly justified in memorializing Government on the matter. But it is hopeless to expect any relaxation in the oppressive Ábkári laws so long as the Honourable Sir Charles Pritchard, their framer, is in office. It would have been much better if Government had kept quiet instead of having given by their reply an opportunity to the public of criticising them. [In alluding to the same subject the Gujarátí (82), in its issue of the 12th July, observes:—The true reason of this rough reply is the unwillingness of Government to reduce the Ábkári revenues, but Government cannot say so in plain language, or else such an autocratic declaration would expose them in England to much ridicule and censure. The local Government must, however, be held responsible for the increasing vice of drunkenness caused by the high price of toddy. The Hindusthán (106) and the Gujarát Mitra (83), in their issues of the 12th July, and the Pársi Tirákár (116), in its issue of the 15th July, express similar sentiments.]

Government resolution on the A'bkári Administration Report for 1889-90 and restrictions placed by Government on the sale of toddy.

27. In alluding to the Government resolution on the A'bkári Administration Report for 1889-90, the Gujarát Mitra (83), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—Referring to the Surat District, His Excellency the Governor regrets that the habit of toddy-drinking prevails in this district to a greater extent than in any other district of the presidency, and is the source of much drunkenness among the lower classes. It was also anticipated that the measures adopted to mitigate the evil would result in repressing the excessive drunkenness and in sufficiently meeting the wants of moderate consumers. For ourselves, we cannot possibly believe that the policy pursued at present would produce the desired results. Toddy with the poor is not only a beverage, but an article of everyday necessity, which by its almost prohibitive taxation tends to make the masses discontented. Real drunkenness arises from the growing use of wines and country spirits in spite of rigorous administration. We believe all sane people will agree with us in thinking that the duties imposed on toddy should be a little lowered to meet the requirements of the ordinary consumer and to enable the hard-working labourer to keep his spirits up by a moderate use of this innocent drink after his day's labour.

Grievances of the toddy shop-keepers in the Surat District.

28. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 12th July, regrets that the Honourable C. B. Pritchard should not be satisfied with the oppression already practised in connection with toddy, since at his instance Government have written to the Collector of Surat to increase the tax on toddy and to restrict its consumption by other means. The Darpan observes:—The introduction of this new arrangement will cause some delay in issuing the licenses for toddy for the next A'bkári year. The toddy shop-keepers, however, will have to pay fees from July, though they will be able to avail themselves of their licenses from the middle or end of August. This is a real hardship.

Threatened famine in some parts of the Kaira District and a request to Government in the matter.

29. The Swadesh Bandhu (127), in its issue of the 15th July, regrets that rain has not yet set in at Mehmadabad and some other places in the eastern part of the Kaira District, as it has heard that some people have conspired to plunder some villages, and says that a theft of corn has been committed at Kadi, while a highway robbery has taken place between Mahudha and Nadiád. The Bandhu requests Government to increase the police force of the district and to take timely measures for opening famine works.

Comments on a circular order issued in the Ratnágiri District prohibiting the cultivation of land within a certain area from the trunks of certain kinds of trees.

30. The Jagan Mitrá (39), in its issue of the 13th July, writes:—We hear that the forest authorities have issued circular orders in the Ratnágiri District prohibiting the holders of lands from cultivating them within a distance of about twelve or thirteen feet from the trunks of any of the five kinds of trees, i.e., Ság, Sissu, Chandan, Ain and Nána, standing on these lands, and also prohibiting the lopping of the branches of those trees. The orders do not seem to be beneficial either to Government for the conservation of forests or to the people of the district for agricultural purposes. In a district so thickly populated as Ratnágiri, where the agricultural products are hardly sufficient for the maintenance of half the number of people residing in it, every man must be trying his best to bring into cultivation as much land in his possession as he possibly can. When there are some of these five kinds of Government trees standing or growing in a survey number, each occupying a prohibited circle of land of 26 feet in diameter around its trunk, there remains no ground in that number for cultivation, and the cultivator cannot view the existence of those trunks with pleasure. The holder of such survey number has to pay assessment for the whole land to Government and can realize no produce from his estate. The existence of these trees being thus detrimental to cultivation, he will naturally have no wish to allow a new plant to thrive and take root in his land. It will be the interest of the cultivator to see how the old trunks now standing on his ground can be reduced in number and how the whole area of his survey number can be completely made free for cultivation. Furthermore, it is a fact well-known everywhere that the land in this district is not so rich and fertile as in other parts of the country, and unless it is burnt properly with small branches and leaves of trees together with other combustibles it cannot produce anything. For the purpose of burning it is necessary to collect small branches which are not of much use to the trees themselves. The present orders are not evidently beneficial either way, and we beg to suggest that they may be changed with advantage by giving a fair share in the value of this timber to the owner of the land, and by inducing and binding him to grow these trees on his ground and to watch their fair progress. He may also be allowed to lop off the unnecessary branches and cultivate the ground around the trees without affecting the trunks.

Hardships suffered by poorly paid clerks and peons in obtaining sick certificates from Presidency Surgeons and suggestions in the matter.

31. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—We have always found it a real hardship for petty Government servants to obtain a medical certificate for sick leave in Bombay. The poorly paid clerk and the peon, who form the great bulk of the subordinate Government service, are required to submit themselves to the Presidency Surgeons for examination and to obtain certificates from them to allow them to go on sick leave. It is true, some heads of departments who are considerate and sympathising do allow their subordinates to go on sick leave on the recommendation of their medical attendants; but there are many officers who have no consideration for or sympathy with the difficulties of their poor subordinates. They never like the idea of any person in their office going on sick leave except themselves. If any of their subordinates wish to go on sick leave, they will insist on his producing a medical certificate from a Presidency Surgeon. The poor servants are precluded by pecuniary considerations from placing themselves under the treatment of the Surgeons and giving them frequent opportunities of observing their condition. They naturally seek medical advice from the Native medical practitioners. The recommendations of the Native medical practitioners are, it is true, often countersigned by the Presidency Surgeons, but whenever it is done the Presidency Surgeons have to take the medical practitioner's statement of the case of his patient on trust. If this is so, where is the necessity, we ask, of the countersignature? Why not recognise the recommendation of the medical practitioner as trustworthy, as some officers do? If it is generally done, it will save a lot of trouble and anxiety to the poor servants of Government and a deal of waste of time and worry to the Presidency Surgeons. We would like to see the Medical Union and the Graduates' Association move in this matter and ask Government to recognise Native medical practitioners' certificates for sick leave. Let Government, if it likes, make a selection from the rank of practitioners and let their certificates be recognised in the case of Government servants drawing less than Rs. 200 per mensem. If this be done, it will be a great boon to the men of the lower ranks of Government servants. The rules, as they are at present, cause the greatest hardship to the poor people.

A complaint about the working of the Small Causes Court at Karáchi.

32. After quoting the remarks in the Advocate of India of the 4th instant regarding the Presidency Small Causes Courts, the Phœnix (6), in a communicated article, in its issue of the 11th July, says:—The working of the Small Causes Court at Karáchi is notoriously unsatisfactory, and mercantile men abstain from instituting suits there, not only on account of the vexatious delay they are put to, but also from a feeling that, however conscientious the Native Judge who presides over the Court may be, his past training and experience scarcely enable him to handle properly the intricate questions which constantly arise in connection with shipping and commercial matters. Cases are therefore almost invariably compromised, and as the amounts of the suits are too small for the cases to be taken into the District Court, the parties have to do the best they can. The procedure in the Small Causes Court seems eminently unsatisfactory, which is explained by the fact that only the other day it was designated by a Native as "machi bazar." I believe the Chamber of Commerce has on more than one occasion intended to represent to Government their feelings respecting the working of this Court. There can be no doubt that a complaint so general must have some foundation and calls for immediate action.

Intended transfer of the Magistrate's Court from Supa to Bárámati in the Poona District disapproved.

33. The Bodh Sudhákar (9), in its issue of the 15th July, says that the intended transfer of the Magistrate's Court and other offices from Supa to Bárámati, in the Bhimthadi Táluka, in the Poona District, should not be made, as Supa being very near the railway and at the same time in the centre of the táluka, commands several advantages over Bárámati which is situated in a corner of the táluka. The Magistrate's Court at Supa, adds the Sudhákar, has been useful in putting down the intrigues of the people of that town and neighbouring villages that are well-known for their mischievous inclinations.

Remarks on the case of Imperatrix vs. Satawa, wife of Chanbasaya, decided recently by the Bombay High Court.

34. With reference to the case of Imperatrix vs. Satawa, wife of Chanbasaya, that recently came before the Bombay High Court, the Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 15th July, approves of the action of Mr. Davidson, District Magistrate of Bijápur, in referring it to the High Court and observes:—The work of the Vaccination Department ought to be conducted with much care in order to be made popular amongst the poor and illiterate people, and the authorities ought to take severe notice of the conduct of the vaccinator concerned in offering two annas to Satawa, the mother of a baby recently vaccinated, on her promising to take the child to a neighbouring village for lymph, and in prosecuting her without formally demanding the money back from her on her declining to do so.

A complaint in connection with the Bulsár medical dispensary in the Surat District.

35. A correspondent of the Gujardt Mitrá (83), in its issue of the 12th July, complains that Dr. P. H. Dádáchánji, Assistant Surgeon in charge of the Bulsár medical dispensary in the Surat District, was absent from duty on the 28th June when a young Pársi named Frámji Bejanji met with a serious accident, and also on the 1st instant when a disastrous fire broke out in the town and six persons were seriously injured. The correspondent says that the injured persons were taken to the dispensary, but that sufficient care was not taken of them by the employés at the dispensary.

Part II.—Education.

Approval of the concession made by the Secretary of State for India to the teachers on leave for study.

36. The Bombay Samdchár (94), in its issue of the 17th July, is glad to learn that the Secretary of State for India has, at a suggestion proceeding from the Educational Inspector, C. D., made the concession of counting as service the time spent by teachers in attending Training Colleges or other institutions, and observes:—This shows that Government do not obtain able men for being teachers, and the reason is that both the salary and prospects of school-masters are not tempting. It is to be regretted that Government should not think of removing this shortcoming at a time when they are trying to throw off all responsibility in educational matters. [The Jame Jamshed (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—In order to provide the primary and middle schools with an efficient staff of teachers, an additional Training College at the presidency town should be established and the salaries of teachers should be raised with a view to draw intelligent men into the service. We recommend Mr. Chatfield, Director of Public Instruction, to take up this suggestion and to immortalize his name by organising such an institution.]

Part III.—Railways.

Alleged disregard of the Railways Act by the G. I. P. Railway Company.

37. A correspondent of the Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 13th July, says that the third class carriages reserved for females in trains, other than the mail train, coming to Bhusával with passengers either from Nágpur, Jabbalpur or Bombay, are not provided with latrine accommodation although the Railways Act IX of 1890 has made it compulsory on railway companies to provide it. The G. I. P. Railway, adds the correspondent, has been committing this breach of a legal provision ever since its enactment, and that it is to be hoped that Government will not allow the neglect to continue any longer.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Disapproval of the bonus given to Messrs. Glover & Co. by the Bombay Municipality.

38. With reference to the payment by the Municipal Commissioner, Bombay, to Messrs. Glover & Co. of a sum of Rs. 1,25,000 as bonus, the Bombay Samdchár (94), in its issue of the 17th July, observes:—This is a very ruinous practice and it is to be regretted that the Bombay Corporation should have slept over its duty in the matter. The way in which a majority of the members of the Corporation discharge their duties is certainly not satisfactory. There appear to be only a few members who are alive to their duty, but the others do not support them, and it is therefore that the executive have it their own way. The ratepayers must now and then arouse the members to their sense of duty. The present members of the Corporation on their part ought to resign, and if the public cannot elect better men, the sooner the municipal administration is handed over to Government the better.

A statement retracted and an apology offered to Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate and Chairman of the Suburban Municipality, Poona.

39. The Makrátta (5), in its issue of the 13th July, retracts the statement made in its issue of the 28th June last that "the three municipal commissioners who appeared as witnesses in the case (Hari Ráoji Chiplunkar vs. Plunkett) confessed to the fact that their chairman overrides them and that they often condemn his illegal action," and offers Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, its sincerest apology for having made it. [The Native Opinion (15) of the 16th July also expresses its deep regret for having made in its issue of the 2nd instant remarks that were prejudicial to Mr. Plunkett on the authority of the statement in the Makrátta.]

Part V.—Native States.

Reflections on the Manipur affair.

40. In an unfinished, verbose and rambling article, headed, "A singular specimen of fair or equitable warfare—entire account of the Manipur affair," the Kesari (43), in its issue of the 14th July, says:—The people of India being simple, lazy, good for nothing and foolish, the English rulers allow much wealth to be remitted to England in the shape of salaries, pensions and commercial profits, making that country enormously wealthy. If the English wish that the present state of things in India, under which their countrymen get highly paid posts and enormous wealth is remitted to England, may continue for ever, they should respect morality and justice. The permanency of British rule does not depend so much on the large army, perverse administrative policy and overbearing conduct of European officials, as on morality, justice and good conduct on the part of the rulers. The Government is well aware of this fact, but the Natives having become pusillanimous, they are treated with contempt, promises given to them are broken, they have been disarmed, and have been allowed to be robbed by England and Englishmen. All these assertions are supported by English records themselves. Nágpur, Tanjore and Benares were annexed through selfish motives. Since the English have become the paramount power, it is certainly a suicidal policy on their part to pick up a quarrel for a bit of territory, to disregard promises and to pursue a course of conduct derogatory to their good name and high position. To obtain control over Kashmere the treaty made with that State was set aside, promises were forgotten, and favours done were paid with ingratitude. Plausible reasons for a job never hold out long, jobbery at last comes to light and seeds of distrust and destruction are sown. There is, however, no question that we get justice, though costly, dispensed by impartial laws, and enjoy liberty, happiness and many other benefits, for which we are grateful and loyal to our foreign rulers; as their rule has proved happy and advantageous to us we ever pray to God to make it permanent over us. But whenever they happen to commit injustice, setting aside their honourable and excellent principles of morality, we regret it much, as we fear that by such conduct they might one day lose their empire. The Manipur embroglio and the "equitable warfare" will teach the reader the following strange principles:—That Native Chiefs should be so stupid as to submit even when their families are massacred; that it is a sin to avoid going to a darbár at which one's arrest is planned; that it is impudence to be absent from a darbár on account of a religious observance; that a Native Chief should show submission even when treachery has been seen through by him; that a feudatory prince is held responsible for the rebellion raised by his loyal subjects in consequence of an idol being polluted, the palace being pillaged and their prince fired upon; that the sentence of hanging is the proper punishment for the servants of a Native Prince who obey his behests; that the rightful heir to a State should lose his right of succession as a sequel to a war brought about by provoking a prince of bustling habits and majestic appearance, &c.

41. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 16th July, writes:—A strange principle, to which a very valid objection can be raised from the side of the subjects of Native Princes, has been given the high authority of the Secretary of State for India. The further official papers relating to Manipur reveal that Lord Cross has informed His Excellency the Viceroy that he agrees with him in considering it essential for the security of the British in India that subjects of Native States should understand that the murder of British officers renders the murderers and abettors liable to be punished with death, despite the orders they may receive from the authorities of the State concerned. Before we accept the soundness of the doctrine, we must determine whose subjects those who live in Native States really are. The Manipur trials have made it certain that, with all the semblance of justice, the British officers will not be above committing judicial murders for the security of the British position. The British Government is the suzerain of the princes, and if they rebel against that Government they are guilty of a breach of faith. If we say that the armies of these rebellious princes would be liable to wholesale execution simply for obeying the orders of their superiors, we shall have to admit that the princes are mere puppets through whom Native India is governed by the British Government. If the princes are not mere nonentities but realities, their subjects must be their subjects, the British Government holding the princes alone responsible for their loyalty. So that the principle laid down by Lord Cross seems to us to be unfair to the subjects of the Native princes. If they do not obey their rulers they are in as great a danger of losing their heads as when they obey them. Thus they are between two stools, and their condition is pitiable. We think this is worth being protested against by them. [The Bombay Samachár (24) of the 13th July expresses similar sentiments.]

Objection taken to a principle recently enunciated by the Secretary of State regarding the punishment of murderers of British officers in Native States.

Disapproval of the alleged suppression of the liberty of the press in Native States.

42. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—The suppression by the Government of India of the liberty of the press in "territories under the administration of the Governor-General in Council but beyond the limits of British India" is likely to affect but a small part of India, where there are or will be but few papers to be suppressed. But nevertheless, the principle involved in the suppression is one of great importance and calls for serious attention. These partial suppressions of liberty bear in themselves the germs of precedents, for, as one of the great masters of political wisdom has said, "the true danger is when liberty is nibbled away for expedients and by parts." We are not surprised that several of our contemporaries have criticised the regulations of the Government of India, restricting the liberty of the press in certain territories in a spirit of distrust. It is difficult to understand what has forced the Government to adopt such stringent regulations. The fact that a newspaper or two have sought shelter in British cantonments in Native States and libelled the officers of the latter can hardly justify the gagging of all the papers within those territories. The present measure is fraught with mischief for the future, and our fear is lest it should slowly slide into precedent to be cited for suppressing the press elsewhere. [The Mahrátta (5) of the same date and the Indu Prakásh (14) of the 15th July express similar sentiments.]

43. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 12th July, writes:—A most extraordinary order, that may do credit to a Provincial Russian Government in Central Asia, has just been passed by the Indian Government,—an order the like of which it may be difficult to find in the annals of the British Empire in India. That Government which has, on the very doors of its deliberative assembly, engraved the phrase "Freedom of speech and action" in flaming letters, now descends, we are constrained to say in the bitterness of our heart, from the highlands of liberty and takes away the freedom of its subject people. We could never believe that the Government of such an enlightened ruler as His Excellency Lord Lansdowne would sanction such a tyrannical order. It brings to mind in vivid colours how Lord Lytton, in defiance of popular opinion, passed the Vernacular Press Act at one sitting and on the heights of Simla, at a time when all the so-called representatives of popular opinion were far removed from the Council board. A section of the Anglo-Indian press for some time past has been finding out a cause for the advocacy of a press gag, and the writings of some of the Bengal vernacular papers have given them an opportunity; but the last Press Act being abolished by the decisive vote of Parliament, the Anglo-Indian papers could not influence Government to do anything of the sort. But what they could not achieve in British India, they have achieved in territories which, though primarily belonging to Native States, are under the control of the Viceroy. There is on the very face of the order one distinct contradiction in terms with which we cannot reconcile ourselves. The order says that it is to be enforced in territory subject to the control of the Governor-General but not in British India. Are we then to suppose that the Governor-General rules India in a dual capacity? Or are we to suppose that parts of India which are subject to the control of the Supreme Government, and therefore to that of Parliament also, can be ruled by the Governor-General according to his own will and in spite of the pronounced opinions of Parliament? Here arises the question of a duality of power which in view of the supreme and universal control of Parliament over every part of the empire seems egregiously absurd. We cannot see what could have prompted Government to indite the above order. Perhaps, a precedent has been found in the order of the Hyderabad State in this connection, but professedly the British Government is an enlightened Government, and for it to go to Hyderabad for a precedent would look somewhat absurd. But be that as it may, we must say the absurdity of the order will certainly shock every man of common sense. But has the Government come to the conclusion that the Indian Penal Code is inadequate to meet the so-called evil which the order is issued to check? Some of the Native States are the very sink of mal-administration, and if a paper exposes that and the Political Agent takes away its liberty under the above order, does not the paramount power through its political officer become guilty of contributory negligence in bringing about that mal-administration? A newspaper may not at once put an administration straight, but its constant advice must open the eyes of those who are responsible and lead them to a change. We were, however, surprised and pained to see an enlightened Government like that of Lord Lansdowne putting its signature manual to an order which is the very reverse of the traditions of British rule in India.

Suggestion to Government to invest the Chief of Sávantvádi with powers of administration.

44. The Vijaya (73), in its issue of the 10th July, says that much injustice has been done to the Chief of Sávantvádi by not entrusting him with the administration of his State though he attained his majority some 7 or 8 years ago, and that this injustice ought to be removed by investing him either with full or limited powers over his State, as he seems to possess a sound understanding.

1. Referring to the case against G. H. Wittenbaker, late Sub-Assistant Conservator of Forests in Berár, who was found guilty of the charge of misappropriation of public money brought against him and has been sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment by the Bombay High Court, the Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 11th July, observes:—This case suggests an observation or two. It can hardly be called a good system which permits offences like these to be committed without any sufficient means of detection. There was so little check or control exercised over the actions of the accused as District Forest Officer that if the incident of the burning of the papers had not taken place, nobody would ever have heard of the defalcations, and Wittenbaker would have been at large, and not only undetected but unsuspected also. Suspicions were roused by the burning of the papers. And then, too, the offence was detected because the passes from the graziers were collected. If the papers had been burnt a month or two later and inquiry set on foot after the end of the grazing season, it is likely that but very few passes would have been found and collected, and this would certainly have been the case if the Ranger had been hand in glove with Wittenbaker. There was nothing in the office of the Conservator or any other superior by which the fraud could have been detected. This is certainly not as it should be. Let us hope that in future at least a system will be devised under which District Forest Officers would be required to send vouchers in support of the entries in their cash books. If duplicates of the several kinds of passes issued are sent to the Conservator's office, frauds of the kind committed by Wittenbaker will become impossible. There have been more than one prosecution against forest officials. These would serve a useful purpose if they drew the attention of Government to the weak points in forest administration.

The system of forest administration in Berár considered defective.

2. The same newspaper writes:—There was one thing in connection with the case of G. H. Wittenbaker, Sub-Assistant Conservator of Forests in Berár, which we noted with satisfaction, and that was that while his trial was proceeding in the District Magistrate's Court here Mr. Wittenbaker was not subjected to the indignities and harsh treatment generally inflicted on those who are so unfortunate as to be arrested and put on trial. The handcuffs, the rope tied round each arm, the array of naked swords, these were fortunately absent. This was as it should be, and we are really glad that the unhappy accused was not subjected to this ill-treatment, which our present system sanctions, nay, in a manner enjoins. We would draw the attention not only of the Magistracy and the District Police, but of the higher powers, to the absurdity of the existing regulations. Persons in the position of Wittenbaker are most unlikely to attempt an escape from custody, and thus need not be pinioned and guarded like wild beasts. In serious offences like murder, dacoity and robbery such precautions are, perhaps, necessary in all instances. But distinction has surely to be drawn between these offences and the offence of criminal breach of trust by a Government servant. In framing rules, as also in carrying them out, a little exercise of sympathetic discrimination will do harm to nobody, while it will spare unnecessary mental and bodily suffering to many unfortunate beings.

Indignities and harsh treatment generally inflicted on accused persons, and necessity for making distinction in them according to the position of the accused.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks on Russia's threat to England published in the Moscow Gazette.

1. The Gujarát Darpan (81), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—Whatever other papers may say about the attitude of England, one of the most important of them, the Moscow Gazette, a semi-official organ, hurls a threat at England. It warns England that in the event of a European coalition against Russia, the latter will deal a mortal blow to the British power in India. It also says that if a revolt break out in India, it will depend on Russia's behaviour whether the English are crushed or not. It appears that the filibustering nature of the Moscow Gazette has not left it, although its late editor, M. Katcoff, has departed this life. For the present editor, whoever he may be, no new Dhulipsing is to turn up, as a trump in stock, to be used when required. It is evident that the paper in question over-estimates the power of Russian attack on the Indian frontier, which, fortified by nature, has been made more so by human skill. And its talk of a revolt in India is sheer nonsense.

How far Parliament should interfere with the Indian administration.

2. On the question whether and how far Parliament should interfere in Indian affairs, the Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 19th July, observes:—If England is responsible for the good government of this country, we do not see how it can be reasonably maintained by any politician that that responsibility is best discharged by her, when, after having sent a Viceroy to rule this country, given him immense powers and provided him with able assistants, she takes no care to see whether the country is ruled wisely or not. It is not pretended by anybody that the Viceroy should be a mere tool in the hands of Parliament; the ends of good administration certainly require that he should have vast powers, and that the responsibility of government should primarily rest on his shoulders. But, at the same time, it should not be forgotten that the tendency of power is naturally towards irresponsibility; and in India, where public opinion is of the weakest and the services are all-powerful, there is the constant risk of the Viceroy being carried away by the surrounding influences of the dominant spirit of bureaucracy. No one can rightly deny the reasonableness of the view that, so far as the details of the administration go, more harm than good will ensue if Parliament interferes; but there is no danger of Parliament running into this extreme. The standing complaint of the people of India is that Parliament is too indifferent to Indian questions, and that so important a subject as the Indian Budget excites little or no attention in the House of Commons. What Parliament is rightly called upon to do is to see that, in matters of Imperial interest, where broad questions of policy and principle are concerned, the principles of government as laid down already for the administration of this country are faithfully adhered to by those to whom the work and the responsibility of that administration are entrusted. This is certainly not expecting too much from Parliament. The interests both of the rulers and the ruled seem to require this limited exercise of control by Parliament over Indian affairs.

Causes of the alleged strained relations between Englishmen and educated Natives.

3. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—It is an open secret that European officials are not favourably disposed towards educated Natives. There is a complaint everywhere that the older officials were far more sympathetic than those of the present time. What is the reason? Who are to blame? Englishmen always like to see child-like, if not slave-like, submission. They are, as a rule, averse to the establishment of friendly relations with the Natives. They want to be lords, guardians, parents, but not friends. In old days, when there was very little of English education, when oriental ideas of servile submission were not supplanted by a spirit of independence and equality, Natives could submit to the lordly and imperious conduct of Europeans. But now the times and circumstances have changed. Natives have passed from their infancy to adolescence. We thankfully say that it is Englishmen who have given us a spirit of independence, and it is their duty to foster and regulate it in the right direction, and not to crush it. But the imperious nature of John Bull is not much inclined to give respect to educated Natives. He wants to thrust them back to old servility by ill-treatment and invective. Hence this strained feeling. In vain does one try to stop the boiling of water in a kettle on the fire. We should be unfair if we do not present the other side of the picture. There are many among the educated whom Western education has made wild. They have forgotten the relation between the rulers and the ruled, and consider it slavery to be under lawful restraint. They are inflated with the notion that they are the most intelligent beings in this world and that Englishmen are of mediocre talent. They vilify English civilisation and extol their own. They agitate to get the lion's share in the government of the country from the very jaws of the Lion. This spirit of license, vain-glory and insubordination is also one of the causes of the strained relations between Englishmen and educated Natives.

Alleged distinction made between Europeans and Natives by the Sanitary Commissioner of Bengal.

4. A correspondent from Bengal, writing to the Indian Spectator (2) in its issue of the 19th July, says:—I do not think I have any inordinate fondness for cavilling and carping at Government officials and their proceedings. Yet I have to do it in the case of the Sanitary Commissioner of Bengal, when I see him sitting quiet in Darjeeling or Calcutta whenever an epidemic devastates the Indian population of any district within his jurisdiction. However, he makes no delay to repair to a place when he is informed of the death of a European or two from any disease raging in an epidemic form. This is what Dr. Gregg actually did recently. Dacca was visited a few weeks ago by an epidemic of cholera, and of its victims two were Englishmen, viz., the Divisional Commissioner and the District Engineer, and the Sanitary Commissioner of the Lower Provinces lost no time in travelling over to the capital of the Eastern district to investigate the cause of the epidemic and take steps to check its progress. Two English lives are clearly far more valuable to the Sanitary Commissioner than many Indian lives! It is unfortunate that a superintendent of the health of a province should make such distinction between Europeans and Indians.

Alleged libel of the whole of the Bengal population by Mr. Tawney, Principal of the Presidency College, Calcutta.

5. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 20th July, writes:—It seems to be the privilege of every foreign resident to partake of our hospitality, to grow rich at our expense, and to libel us with all manner of charges. The expression "monumental liars" beats even Macaulay's description. If Mr. Tawney, Principal of the Presidency College, Calcutta, is the author of this libel of the whole of the Bengal population, he does not deserve the position he occupies. It is impossible that his relations with his pupils or colleagues should be harmonious if he entertains such an irreconcilably low opinion of them. If Mr. Jinsivále lost his place for having uttered a libel of the English nation, there is no reason why Mr. Tawney should retain his when he indulges in such offensive falsehoods relating to a whole community. [The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 19th July, expresses similar sentiments.]

Threatened famine in some parts of the Kaira District and a request to the Bombay Government.

6. The Svadesh Bandhu (127), in its issue of the 22nd July, observes:—The rains have not yet set in in some parts of the Kaira District, the poor people do not get farm work and cannot earn their livelihood, and cattle are dying for want of fodder. This state of things has led to a disturbance of the public peace by thefts, robberies, and other crimes in the villages of Hajátia, Wála and Khadol. We hear that last week a party of travellers, while going from Petlád in the Baroda territory to Wadtál in the Kaira District, with a sum of Rs. 1,500, were plundered near Karamsad in the Anand Táluka, one of them being murdered. If Government do not take timely precautions by opening famine works life and property will be in danger. We recommend Government to open railway works between Nadiád and Kapadvanj in order to provide the people with some work, and also to locate a police station in a locality equidistant from Mahudha, Dákor, Alina and other neighbouring places.

7. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—

Riots between the Mahomedans and the Hindus.

Mahomedan religious riots against the Hindus seem to be going the round of the country, and the latest is not the least remarkable because it has taken place in the small township of Rájápur, in the South Konkan, where we believe the oldest man living never knew anything of the kind to have taken place or believed to be possible. No details have yet been received, but according to the telegraphic report the riotous mob would appear to have held the town in terror for a time at least, and its feeling of helplessness was aggravated by the absence of the Mámlatdár on tour and the participation in the disturbance by the head constable who was on the spot. Such are the allegations. We await further particulars. There are, however, one or two reflections which are inevitably suggested by these sad occurrences, which are preventable and ought to be prevented from taking place. In the first place, they are generally occasioned by some religious procession or observance on the part of either section of the community at which the other gets offended. Often it happens that the local officials make a mistake in allowing or forbidding these ceremonials without due consideration, and sometimes they cancel a permission given to the Hindus because it is found displeasing to the Mahomedans, which only encourages the fanatical spirit of the lower orders of that section and results in a violation of the peace. This serious mistake ought surely never to be made. Nothing could be easier for these officials than to send for the heads of their communities on the spot and so to arrange the programme with their mutual approval as to avoid all chance of a conflict, but if they did not agree the fairest course ought to be adopted and strictly enforced, whether it pleased or displeased the parties concerned. The respectable portions of these communities are all interested in the preservation of the peace, and their leaders ought even to anticipate the officials in this matter and arrange their own plan and get it confirmed by the officials and thereby avoid all troubles. This plan was adopted with success some years ago in one or two towns in the North-West Provinces, where both sides were prone to take mutual offence and to fight it out; and we have more than once urged that a similar course should be followed elsewhere, and especially pressed it on the attention of the Indian National Congress leaders. Had that movement any real life or earnestness, life beyond either the Congress pavilion or the three days of its annual gathering, these riots would have ceased to exist altogether; but it seems our politics are above such small matters and our politicians think it better to wait till they have got an elective council where they will have a controlling voice and can correct all evils and abuses by the exercise of the right of questioning the officials. A point of still greater importance, and it is one for the consideration of Government, is the conduct of the local Native heads of the police, to whatever section of the community they may belong. In all social and religious questions they may have their own personal likes and dislikes, but the Queen's peace will be in serious danger if any of them are enabled or led to feel that they may import these likes and dislikes into their conduct as police officials towards either party to a dispute. The first instance of misbehaviour of this kind was alleged in the case of the Poona riot in connection with the age of consent agitation. If the allegation was well-founded a regular enquiry should have been held, and if anybody was found guilty the facts should have been made public to have their due moral effect, but we do not remember to have seen anything of the kind. All that was rumoured about was that one or two men had been reduced. This was hardly a wise course, and it is difficult to say what evil effect it might not produce on the minds of the subordinates elsewhere. Indeed, if this story from Rájápur is true, the apprehension may be said to have been realised in that case, but as we said above we await the correct version of the story, though the general remark cannot be affected whether it be true or false.

8. The Bakul (22), in its issue of the 19th July, says that a riot took place at Rájápur on the 14th instant between the Hindus and the Mahomedans, in which the former, who were moving in a religious procession, were attacked and severely injured by the latter, that the chief constable of the place, who is a Mahomedan, is said to have been interested in the riot and to have rendered no help to the Hindus, and that the Superintendent of Police should take proper care at the enquiry to see that the people do not withhold themselves from giving evidence against the chief constable through fear of harm from him. [The Jagat Mitrá (39) of the 20th and the Satyá Shodhak (61) of the 19th July express similar sentiments.]

The cow-slaughter at the Nágdevi Street, Bombay, and a request to the local municipality and Government in the matter.

9. The Rájyabhakt (117), in its issue of the 21st July, observes:—The cow-slaughter that was committed on the Hindu holiday of A'shádhi Agiáras, the 17th instant, in the screened verandah of a house situated opposite the old slaughter house in the Nágdevi Street, Bombay, was repugnant to the religious feelings of the Hindus, who on hearing the bellowing of the cattle assembled in large numbers, and if they had not been well-advised by some influential gentlemen present there serious consequences would have followed. The Hindus requested the Police officer at the Crawford Market to prevent the slaughter, but he declined to do so on the ground that permission was obtained for the same from the Municipal Commissioner. We hear a memorial is shortly to be sent to the Commissioner on the subject, and request the Corporation and Government to take timely measures to prevent a repetition of such occurrences.

The condition of Bráhmans under the British Government compared to that of Jews at present under the Russian Government.

10. The Mahárashtrá Mitra (46), in its issue of the 23rd July, says that the condition of Bráhmans under the British Government may be said to be just the same as that of Jews under the Russian Government, inasmuch as they are looked upon with suspicion and every attempt seems to be made to preclude them from entering the public service and to crush their independence of opinion by gagging the Native press, that the Government themselves have made the Bráhmans discontented by their selfish policy, and that the Bráhmans, if they wish to preserve respect for themselves, should strive to regain their former power and position.

Remarks on the report of the A'bkári administration in the Bombay Presidency for the year 1889-90.

11. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—The Government Resolution on the A'bkári administration of the presidency for the year 1889-90 shows an increase of 266,201 gallons in the illicit consumption of country spirit. The increase in the Thána and Kolába districts amounts to 356,913 gallons. Though it appears that illicit distillation has been checked, it is not stopped altogether. Government are thinking of legislation to bring under control the traffic in mowra flowers. They seem to be satisfied with the Commissioner's report of the measures taken for consulting local opinion in the matter of opening liquor-shops, as well as with the explanation of the reasons given for the increase of these shops. The number of toddy-shops seems to have considerably fallen, and the explanation given for this is hardly satisfactory. Only 1,586 licenses were issued against 1,659, and 22,160 trees were tapped against 27,180 of the previous year. This decline in the number of toddy-shops and the increase in that of liquor-shops may show that people rather prefer liquor to toddy on account of the restrictions placed on the latter. If such be the fact, it may prove that drunkenness is increasing, and that Government are hardly taking the right steps to repress it. Toddy, as is clear, cannot be called intoxicating, and is seldom injurious. It is a healthy beverage, and in a sense forms the food of the poor. If the restrictions on it are modified, drunkenness will be checked and the Government revenue even will not suffer. In the Surat District the number of toddy-shops declined from 407 to 269. The explanation given is not satisfactory, but Government seem to be mistaken if they suppose that toddy is a source of drunkenness among the lower classes. The number of trees tapped also fell from 136,245 to 126,064 and Government rightly attribute this to the increased rate of taxation. In the Belgaum District also the number of toddy-shops fell to a large extent.

12. The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 22nd July, observes :—The new form according to which Europe liquor sellers in Bombay will have to keep an account of their sales from the 1st August, will cause much inconvenience to them, and particularly to those poor and illiterate shop-keepers who cannot afford to employ clerks for that purpose. The revised form contains 16 different headings in place of 3 in the old one, which will cause great confusion and many mistakes, which when detected by A'bkári officers will bring the liquor shop-keepers into unnecessary troubles. Moreover, so long as we do not know how the old form was found defective, we can only say that the new form has been introduced simply to increase the difficulties of the liquor-sellers. We hear a deputation of wholesale dealers in Europe liquors has already waited on the Collector of Bombay to represent their grievances in this matter and the retail dealers will follow suit.

A complaint regarding the new form of account supplied to the English liquor sellers in Bombay by the A'bkári Department.

13. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 23rd July, writes :—Mr. Slater's appointment to the Chief Presidency Magistracy has evoked a strong protest from the Native press, and rightly. Mr. Slater is a barrister of some four years' standing, and yet during this short time, while many others have had to remain briefless or without any work whatsoever, paying engagements whether as teacher of history in the Elphinstone College or a Law Professor in the Government Law School came to him as so many windfalls. Indeed, a person who serves in so many capacities must be a many-sided individual, but surely where long experience of magisterial work combined with a deep and sound knowledge of the Bombay people is necessary, neither scholastic nor collegiate experience can help him much, however eminent his abilities may be. And yet Mr. Slater now finds himself at once elevated to a post which hardly any one, without years of practice, has ever reached, and four years are considered quite a good qualification in him to hold a most responsible post. It is an irony of fate, indeed, that Mr. Shivshankar Govindrám, who has had long experience of the High Court practice, should be ignored and Mr. Slater should be placed at the top of the ladder with no experience to back him up. But the question of a knowledge of the vernaculars apart, as a practising barrister Mr. Slater does not even fulfil the preliminary condition of ten years' practice at the High Court. And yet the Government of Lord Harris has the courage to appoint to the Chief Magistracy one who fulfils neither the one nor the other condition. Indeed, this appointment, after the proposed one of Mr. Webb which is injudicious and wrong in principle, must come upon people as a surprise indicative of a strong inclination to jingoism in defiance of Government's own rule.

Disapproval of the appointment of Mr. Slater as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

14. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 20th July, writes :—The public mind is still considerably agitated by the Rájábái Tower tragedy. The unanimous verdict of the jury, given without leaving the box and fully concurred in by the Judge as one which "no sane man could have brought otherwise," leaves no doubt of the absolute innocence of Mánekji Asláji. If Mánekji Asláji is innocent, all the frame-work of crime which popular fancy had raised, in which Mánekji was the central figure, must fall to pieces. In fact, the charge to the jury of Mr. Justice Farran clearly discredited the theory of crime. All the evidence tending to show that the deaths were the result of an outrage was shown to be too contradictory and flimsy to be trusted as proving guilt. It is not a case of the evidence being not satisfactory or not conclusive and the prisoner getting the benefit of a doubt. The theory of outrage is totally and unreservedly disbelieved. It is not Mánekji Asláji that is alone proved to be innocent, but the entire notion of there having occurred any crime at all is discarded. On such a result the public have in some measure to be congratulated. It is very gratifying to know that the mysterious deaths of the ladies were not caused by a crime, and the public will do well to reconcile itself to this position, sanctioned as it is by the opinion of an eminent Judge and a thoroughly unbiased and impartial jury, arrived at after a most searching enquiry. We think the public should cease to vex itself any further with pictures of crime and righteous indignation at certain supposed criminals having not been reached by justice. It is a more comfortable thought, and more honourable to the memory of the deceased, that neither outrage nor murder has occurred in connection with the deaths. The question then arises, what is the solution of the mystery? In the Judge's summing-up, and still more plainly in the letter which Mr. Justice Farran has addressed to the dailies, there is an indication of a probable solution, viz., accident. It is not, indeed, a new suggestion. It has often been made and discarded. But it receives great strength now by the support of so eminent an authority as the Judge. Here is a hypothesis which, supported as it is by the opinion of the Judge, may well be accepted as a solution of the mystery. [The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 19th July, expresses similar sentiments. The Gujaráti (82) of the 19th July approves of the decision and acquittal of Mánekji Asláji, but considers further enquiry necessary.]

15. The Rást Goftár (87), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—Mr. Justice Farran was perfectly right in almost directing the jury to acquit the prisoner, though, with all our respect for his judicial ability, we fear his summing up shows a lamentable lack of appreciation of the peculiar nature of the prosecution in this case and consequently of the evidence of individual witnesses. Indeed, though he seems to have himself perceived, though dimly, the peculiar nature of the prosecution, when he came to weigh the evidence for and against the prisoner he dismissed that singular circumstance altogether from his mind. The evidence that went against the prisoner was subjected by one of our ablest counsels to the most searching cross-examination, whereas the evidence which went in favour of the accused was submitted to a so-called test which was technically styled "cross-examination," but which was really an emphasized repetition, expansion and amplification of the examination-in-chief. Such witnesses had it all their own way. Free from any cross-examination worthy of the name, they were free from liability to contradiction either out of their own mouths or by other witnesses, and if they had any wish to stray from the truth, there was not the restraining fear of cross-questions to compel them to it. They were practically witnesses for the defence brought by the prosecution, and therefore the prosecution had no power to tender any evidence contradicting its own witnesses. A trial conducted under circumstances so unique and so singular cannot be called a complete and thorough enquiry. It was wanting in the essential element of a judicial investigation. Although Mánekji Asláji was bound to be acquitted on the evidence, the partial and unsatisfactory nature of the trial still leaves in grave doubt the question whether the man was guilty or not. The memorialists were anxious to avert such partial and incomplete enquiry. They wanted to get at the truth. But the result of the trial leaves the terrible mystery exactly where it stood two months ago, and fails even to establish beyond doubt the innocence of the prisoner, though he is now acquitted and at large, as he was bound to be on such evidence as was laid before the Court. Although this defect has been admitted by Mr. Justice Farran, he was scarcely sensible of its importance. For it made no difference with him whether the evidence had been subjected to cross-examination or not, and he gave as much weight to it as if it had successfully passed through the crucible. Take one instance. The learned Judge disbelieves Mr. Entee and believes the statement of Mr. MacDermott contradicting that witness. If Mr. MacDermott had been cross-examined some light would have been thrown upon the inexplicably strange conduct of the police, and His Lordship might have been furnished with the means of judging whether the policeman might not have had some very strong motive in contradicting Mr. Entee. It is most strange that the omission of this test, quite exceptional in a judicial trial, an omission of vital importance, did not weigh in the least with a Judge of such undoubted merit as Mr. Farran. Justice is unquestionably done in the acquittal of Mánekji Asláji. But the result of the trial is really an eclipse of justice, so long as the culprits, whoever they may be and whether they include Mánekji Asláji or not, enjoy immunity from the consequences of their infamous crime. It is this eclipse of justice which has deepened the grief of the community, aroused by a tragedy which has torn and lacerated their hearts. The summing-up leaves the distinct impression that even a clear head and a sound mind are not always proof against the secret influence of bias. The address shows strong bias in favour of one set of evidence as against another, though, of course, the learned Judge was never conscious of the bias. We cannot otherwise account, in a lawyer of Mr. Justice Farran's legal acumen, for a sweeping criticism, or rather condemnation, of those whose evidence supported the hypothesis of foul play, and his omission to mention some palpably weak or questionable points in the evidence which went in favour of the accused. There is a singular similarity in the evidence of the children, but that does not render it entirely unworthy of credit, unless, indeed, it were stated that the children's evidence was a pure fabrication invented with the object of swearing away the life of an innocent man. His Lordship showed similar want of discrimination in his views on the medical evidence. He preferred to put implicit faith in Dr. Sydney Smith's evidence as against that of five other medical men, including the Coroner, Dr. Blaney. While the learned Judge put great stress upon the experience of the Coroner's Surgeon, he failed to take into consideration, or even so much as to mention, the much greater experience of the Coroner himself. His Lordship, also, if we were to rely upon the published reports, omitted to direct the jury on the mysterious disappearance of the Kasti and the Máthábánu and the spectacles which Bachubái was said to be wearing. Nor did he choose to consider it of any importance to allude to the rent in Perozbái's trousers, or the ugly rent in Mánekji Asláji's jacket, or the strangely stupid neglect of the police to take possession of the man's clothes which had some very suspicious marks upon them. These were most important omissions, and they all happen to be omissions for which the defence must congratulate itself. As the result of the trial does not necessarily prove the innocence of the prisoner, so it does not, as has been strangely enough assumed in some quarters, dispel the supposition that the poor girls had been the victims of foul play. So far from clearing up the mystery, the trial has left it very much mystified. The mystery is still shrouded in a terrible gloom, and it is the duty of Government to take steps to penetrate the darkness, thus proving the earnestness of their professions of anxiety to get at the truth. It is, therefore, the urgent and imperative duty of Government to interpose its authority and appoint officers who may be able and willing to work in the only direction which is most likely to lead to a clue to the mystery. With all their exertions, the police have failed to point out any motive for suicide. The hypothesis of accident does not at all bear close scrutiny, though the learned Judge suggests that it might have been an accident. The only other supposition that remains is foul play. At this singular trial there could be no cross-examination of the police, and therefore, as we pointed out in our last issue, the pious wish expressed in the Government Resolution that the trial would enable the presiding Judge to say whether the conduct of the police deserved condemnation or approval has come to nothing. But because the Judge has no means of forming an adverse opinion, therefore we hope the Government will not jump to the conclusion that the conduct of the police has been irreproachable. In the interests of justice it will be dangerous in this case for Government to rely exclusively upon police reports and form its judgment thereon. We are sure that if Government were to look into all the painful circumstances of the case, it could come to but one conclusion, that here is a case in which there has been a good deal of bungling, if nothing worse, and that the interests of truth and justice, and also of the public safety, demand an honest, thorough and searching investigation. [The Anglo-Lusitano (158) of the 16th, the Kathiáwár Times (3) of the 17th, and the Gujarát Mitra (83) and the Kaiser-i-Hind (85) of the 19th July, express similar sentiments.]

16. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—After a trial of six days before the Sessions Judge, Mánekji Asláji has been declared not guilty of the charges on which he was arraigned by the Clerk of the Crown, viz., of the murder of one of the girls, violence on both, and aiding and abetting suicide. Taking into consideration the evidence and the indiscreet haste of the police in coming to the conclusion a few hours after the tragedy that it was not a case of violence, nobody would be surprised at the acquittal of the accused. It was almost a foregone conclusion. But it may be owned, the people who were anxious for the discovery of truth, and nothing but the truth, have abandoned themselves to grief and virtuous indignation at the circumstances connected with the tragedy not being laid bare and thus the law proving helpless. It must at any time take any people, not living in Pindharic days, by surprise that one of the foulest and most heinous deeds in broad daylight and in one of the most frequented resorts should be easy of perpetration and should even baffle detection. Two ladies in sound health of body and mind walked up the tower, and half an hour after were dropped down, mangled and pitilessly injured in certain parts of the body. If such a horrible deed should remain unaccounted for, it must strike terror into the hearts of the people and fill them with misgivings as to the security of their persons and property. We believe such a state of things cannot be tolerated in any civilised quarter of the globe. The Judge's summing-up is an added disappointment to the existing list. Some of the assumptions in it, which may prove anything, do not seem to be quite called for. At any rate, we had thought a Judge to be above starting a theory to connect cause with effect. Though we have respect for the presiding Judge, is it not the case that the summing up has not brought out the full weight of the evidence? As to the question of facts the Judge might have done better by simply stating it and leaving it to the jury to decide. He might have expounded the law on the subject, but there seems to be an attempt to impress his individual view as to the facts on the minds of the jury, which alone is the fit body to decide the question. The Judge may think that "no sane" person could believe the evidence of the children. Is it proved that the evidence of the other people, A'tmárám and men of his ilk, was believable? As a matter of fact, there are men who would not choose to agree with the opinion of the Judge.

Mr. Justice Farran's letter to the Times of India about the probable cause of the death of the two Párai ladies who met their deaths by falling from the Rájábái Tower.

17. The Kaiser-i-Hind (86), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—Mr. Justice Farran accepts as the most probable way whereby the two Párai ladies, Bachubái and Perosbái, met their deaths at the Rájábái Tower, the "hypothesis" of accident. In his letter to the Times of India he asks it to be imagined that both ladies went up on the top of the parapet wall of the tower without any "ulterior design," that is to say, they went up in a spirit of frolic! The "hypothesis" is utterly improbable as there is not a woman in Bombay whose courage to mount that wall would stand in making such an "intrepid" effort. Bachubái's nervous temperament places it out of the reach of possibility that she would mount that parapet wall. If it would be impossible for a woman of Bachubái's peculiar nervous susceptibility to mount the parapet wall, the "hypothesis" which the Judge recommends the Párais to accept is untenable, because the conditions embraced in it, viz., that of the two ladies standing together on the parapet wall, are impossible. The "hypothesis" of the Judge is completely set aside by the evidence that was taken in the case. Nowhere in that evidence was it stated that the two ladies were seen on the wall of the balcony at the same time. On the contrary, it was repeatedly deposed by many witnesses that there was a very decided interval between the falls. It was not one fall of both bodies simultaneously, but two distinct falls one after the other with a very appreciable interval. There is therefore nothing to sustain the mad conjecture that while one lady was falling the other in trying to save her fell with her. We repeat they did not fall together, hence the conjecture of the Judge cannot be sustained and the hypothesis is very lame. In fact, we are surprised that a sober and "sane" Judge like Mr. Farran should have the temerity to express it. A Mrs. Grimwood and even a Blondin would shake in their nerve, if the "hypothesis" of the Judge were so easy of accomplishment by the two girls, one of whom never went to the tower, as so light-heartedly stated with a cruel kindness. It is quite true that only one mind could conceive these two ladies mounting the parapet wall of the Rájábái Tower without any ulterior design. The only way of deciding that the ladies fell accidentally from the tower is by receiving the hypothesis as a proof, leaving out the facts and doing without an enquiry.

18. The same newspaper writes:—We fear our respected citizen, Mr. S. S. Bengali, C.I.E., has in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case entirely failed to gauge the feeling of his own community and sound the depth of its intensity. He has been led away by false issues, apart from his impression, whatever it be, as regards the cause of the death of the two ill-fated girls. His letter to a local contemporary deals with two aspects of the tragic affair—the so-called sensational and hysterical character of the Pársi press, and the alleged error of the two Pársi leaders. As to the first, opinions will differ. Mr. Bengali evidently seems to share the views of the local Anglo-Indian dailies. What the sensational and hysterical was he has not pointed out. But granting for argument's sake that the Pársi press was what he calls it, the question may be fairly put, whether the Anglo-Indian press in all parts of the country would have been less sensational and less hysterical had the victims been Europeans? In the case under discussion the Pársi press was bonâ fide discharging a solemn duty. In fact, like a "good citizen," it was eager to collect information of all kinds and degree, which, when finally sifted, might go to discover the real perpetrators of the crime. We therefore are inclined to attach little weight to the first plea of Mr. Bengali. We repeat that had the victims been Europeans the sensation created by the English press would have been a hundred-fold greater, and with this net gain in the bargain that the miscreants would have ere long been captured, tried and hung at the gallows. If sensationalism and hysterics indicate an infirmity, it may be truly said that the infirmity is not confined to the Pársi press. It is all the same the world over. Equally inconsequential and unjustifiable is Mr. Bengali's rebuke to the two Pársi leaders. Lean as they do more or less on his counsel, it is quite intelligible that to the vexation of soul and spirit of Mr. Bengali they should have considered it wise to refuse to be guided by him in this instance. But, after all, was not Mr. Sorábji's letter uncalled for, and even inconsistent? Is it not true that he himself had called a preliminary meeting of half-a-dozen representatives, at which he wished that a memorial on lines almost identical with those stated in the one submitted to Government should be drawn up? He, too, was really convinced that the conduct of the police was open to question in its investigation of the crime, and deserved to be brought to the notice of Government. If he eventually dropped that affair, it was not on account of Pársi sensationalism or bad Pársi leadership (for he himself wished to take a lead in the matter), but on account of the unwillingness, quite natural, of the Mahomedan leaders to join. If, however, Pársi sensationalism has done mischief, how is it that Mr. Bengali did not hasten to nip it in the bud? Meanwhile we conclude our observations with a sense of the deepest sorrow that so well-known and highly respected a citizen as Mr. Bengali should have been in a moment of weakness led away to address that unfortunate letter which has been the subject of such indignant but wholly just criticism in the Pársi press. [The Rást Goftár (87) of the same date expresses similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the letter of Mr. S. S. Bengali, C.I.E., to the Jáme Jamshed in connection with the attitude of the Pársi press in the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

19. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 20th July, writes:—Mr. Sorábji Shápurji Bengali's letter to a Gujaráti contemporary is worth noting. This Nestor of the Pársi community, as he may well be called, asks his fellow-religionists to moderate their zeal and resentment and to put an end to the painful controversy in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy. Mr. Sorábji severely censures the press for having given circulation to all sorts of exciting rumours, and having thereby raised the popular mind to a state of frenzy. Now that the verdict of the jury in Mánekji Aaláji's case shows all the rumours to be unfounded, he asks that the people should compose themselves and accept the solution given by the trial. "However tragic the circumstances," says Mr. Sorábji, "under which the ladies died may be, yet there is certainly no ground for the statement that an outrage was committed or even attempted upon them, and to say anything of the sort is not respectful to the memory of the deceased ladies." As to the fund already raised, he asks that the expenses incurred should be deducted and the balance returned to the donors in proportion to their donations. We should rather suggest that a meeting of the donors should be called, and with their consent the fund should be applied to some useful public charity. [A correspondent, writing from Bombay to the Kesari (43) of the 21st July, strongly condemns the attitude of the Pársis in this case from the beginning, and says that they committed a grave mistake in trying to have the mystery solved in a particular way by the strength of their riches and by sensational agitation. The correspondent makes remarks on the attitude of the Pársi press, that are similar to those made by Mr. S. S. Bengali. The Kaeide Mumbai (109), in its issue of the 20th July, says that Mr. Bengali has in his letter given a piece of good advice to the Pársis and advises them now to remain quiet.]

Rumoured refusal by the Bombay Government of the use of the Town Hall, Bombay, to the Sorosis Club to raise funds for perpetuating the memory of the Pársi ladies who met their deaths at the Rájábái Tower.

20. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the 25th July, observes that he has heard on good authority that the local English papers declined to insert an advertisement regarding a concert to be held for the benefit of the memorial fund of the late Bachubái and Perozbái who met their deaths at the Rájábái Tower on the 25th April, and that the Government have refused to allow the use of the Town Hall to the Sorosis Club for that purpose. The correspondent asks if his report is correct.

Part II.—Education.

Remarks on the educational policy of Government.

21. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 19th July, writes:—There is reason to fear that the educational policy of the Government is taking a somewhat unfortunate turn. While in Bombay, for instance, the local Government is doing its best to throw the burden of primary education greatly on the municipalities, we hear the Government of Bengal has resolved to abolish the zilla schools, because it thinks that they can be made self-supporting. There would have been something to say for this policy, if the Government had shown that it was going to bestow on higher education what it was taking away from the primary schools. But its policy as regards higher education is also not very encouraging. Surely, some definite assurance on the subject is needed from the Government.

Remarks in connection with the complaint that boys in the Union Academy, Hyderabad, Sind, are taught to disobey their parents.

22. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 16th July, writes:—The Honourable Mr. Udhárám has represented to the Director of Public Instruction that the boys of the Union Academy, Hyderabad, are taught to disobey their parents. This is a serious charge and consequently the Director has officially asked Mr. Jacob to enquire into the truth of the allegation. We know that the moral discipline of the Union Academy is markedly superior to that of Government high schools. In spite of it we hear of complaints against the Academy. The reason of the complaints does not lie in the laxity of moral discipline, for it is strictly enforced, but in the fact of the authorities of the Union Academy teaching the boys not to marry early, but to stand firm even against their parents, if necessary. A vernacular juvenile monthly, under the direct management of the authorities of the Academy, openly inculcates the principle of resistance in matters of marriage. This has given rise to discontent in certain quarters. Early marriage is, no doubt, a great evil, and an uncompromising warfare should be waged against it. But the policy of enlisting soldiers from among tender boys, to fight the battle of reform against their parents, is of doubtful propriety. It should be thrice considered before it is adopted. The spirit of disobedience is an absolute evil in the sight of God and man, while early marriage is only a relative evil. If reform brings on a spirit of disobedience, it is better to have no reform at all.

Part III.—Railways.

Remarks on the Government resolution on the proposed Mátherán Tramway and Rope-incline Railway.

23. The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issue of the 22nd July, approves of the recent resolution of the Bombay Government on the proposed Mátherán Tramway and Rope-incline Railway, and says:—The Honourable Mr. Wadia's request for the grant of all unoccupied lands at the top of the Mátherán Hill was rather extravagant and there was very little chance of its acceptance by Government. Yet it is necessary that the complete scheme of Mr. Wadia, the opinions of all those who opposed it, to which Government attached great weight, and the opinion of the Commissioner, N. D., should be published for general information.—The Bombay Samáchár (94), in its issue of the same date, observes:—The Government resolution is as disappointing as the replies to the several recent public memorials have been. Mr. Wadia's scheme deserved better attention at a time when Bombay was so over-crowded, and it is to be regretted that Government, without giving sufficient reasons, should have declined to grant the lands prayed for. It is natural for some persons to think that Government do not desire that a large number of Natives should resort to the hill. We, however, recommend Mr. Wadia to open the railway line without the concession asked for by him, if he does not consider it altogether unprofitable.

Part IV.—Native States.

24. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 16th July, writes:—We are extremely grieved to see that some of our contemporaries are doing their best to harass the Government of India with false accusations regarding Manipur trials. They are unhesitatingly declaring that the trials were mock trials, and that the main object of Government is to be revenged and not to do justice. This allegation is altogether groundless. The Manipur affair is, no doubt, a blunder from beginning to end, but that does not justify in any way the actions of the Senápati who is at present the hero of newspaper articles. There is not the least shadow of a doubt that the Senápati is a rebel, and that he has abetted the murder of English officials. If any one reads carefully the evidence, one will find that the court at Manipur could not but come to the conclusion that the Senápati was a rebel and an abettor of murder. Those who are accusing Government of vengeance have been carried away partly by patriotic sentiment and partly by animosity against Anglo-Indians. We dare say His Excellency Lord Lansdowne will do his best to secure justice. But we are afraid of one thing. If he happen to confirm the sentence passed by the Manipur Court, then his popularity as a Viceroy will be doomed. He is sure to be cried down as a monster of tyranny by sentimental patriots.

Disapproval of the accusations brought against the Government of India regarding the Manipur trials.

25. The Gujarát Mitra (83), in its issue of the 19th July, observes:—The policy of the British Government, well-known for its impartial spirit, has much altered since the Indian mutiny. It is a notorious fact that on a Native Chief dying without male issue a child of 5 or 6 years old or some one of only mediocre ability is chosen by Government to succeed him, in preference to other more able and sometimes rightful heirs, in order that Government and the Political Agents may have opportunities of interfering in the internal management of the State as they like. When the late Malhárráo Gáikwád of Baroda was dethroned, one Sadáshivráo, who was a claimant to the throne, was removed from Baroda because he was said to be as clever as the Senápati at Manipur. The open declaration made in Parliament by Sir John Gorst that mediocrity is better than ability in Native Chiefs exactly reflects the opinion of the authorities in India. This policy is not worthy of Government, and we hope that Government and Sir John Gorst will see their mistake in time and change their policy for the better.

Reflections on the Manipur affair.

26. The Nyáyadarshak (114), in its issue of the 20th July, observes:—It seems from what Sir John Gorst has said that Government do not like to see Native States administered by able Chiefs, because Political Agents and Residents cannot then meddle with the affairs of those States, and the probable reason why Political Agents highly praise the administration of weak and incapable princes is that the former have a free hand in their administration.

27. The Hitechchhu (84) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 23rd July, disapproves of the liberal pensions granted to the relatives of the late Mr. Quinton and the other British officers who were murdered at Manipur, and observes:—The Indian Government professes to know nothing about the line of conduct Mr. Quinton was to adopt in order to arrest the Senápati, and Mr. Quinton and the other British officers met their deaths on account of an error of judgment on their part and subsequent rash action. Government ought, therefore, to issue instructions to military officers to guard against similar blunders. It is wrong to misrepresent the true cause of their deaths, to magnify it into a national affair, and to award liberal pensions, not only to the wives of the deceased officers, but also to their mothers and daughters. [The Hindusthán (106), in its issue of the 19th July, disapproves that the Indian treasury should be taxed with the large pensions sanctioned for Mrs. Quinton and the relatives of other officers who were massacred at Manipur.]

Remarks on the grant of pensions to the relatives of British officers who were murdered at Manipur.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Comments on His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration of India.

1. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 25th July, writes:—When His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's appointment to the Indian Viceroyalty was announced, all cordially joined in welcoming the new Viceroy. His successful administration of Canada and his reputation as a statesman of liberal views filled many minds with hopes of his successful career as Governor-General. Since his assumption of office sufficient time has elapsed to enable the public to judge how far his régime has been liberal in its tendencies and fruitful of tangible results. So far as substantial results are concerned, His Lordship has done almost nothing to advance the good government or well-being of the country beyond the stage at which he found it. In other respects, we are compelled to say on a review of the events that have occurred and are still happening that His Excellency has embarked upon a distinctly retrograde policy. His foreign policy has proved a failure and the Manipur tragedy has cast a stigma on British Government which even time will not efface from the pages of history. Looking to domestic affairs, nothing striking has been attempted except in the way of sanctioning retrograde measures. We had no serious objection to the Official Secrets Bill except that it would never be honestly worked against all the offenders irrespective of caste, creed or colour. Events have showed that though the Viceroy was, through inexperience of the country, driven in a fit of passion to denounce one of our Bengali contemporaries as a thief and a robber in the Legislative Council, his Government had not the moral courage to enforce the provisions of the Bill against some of the Anglo-Indian papers that procured and published official secrets in contravention of the Official Secrets Act. The country rightly suspected at the time that the measure was aimed at the Native press, and the suspicions then entertained were, it now appears, founded on a correct appreciation of the attitude of Government towards the English and Native press. The recent order passed by the Indian Government against newspapers conducted and published beyond the limits of British India is again a distinctly retrograde measure, to which no one ever dreamt that a statesman of Lord Lansdowne's liberal sentiments would be a party. Yet it is the unexpected that happens. Lord Lytton had his little Afghan war, involving the country in serious pecuniary embarrassments, the consequences of which are felt even now; Lord Lansdowne, too, had his little Manipur war and every one knows how it was ended. Lord Lytton gagged the mouth of the Native press; Lord Lansdowne has attempted a similar feat on a small scale. There was deep discontent in the reign of the former, and its echo is heard throughout the country at this moment. That the Viceroy should have seized the present opportunity for fulminating a bull against papers published within the jurisdiction of Political Agents is most unfortunate. We can well understand a despotic Government like the Russian issuing a ukase like the one that has been sent forth from the Foreign Office. But one is filled with shame and disgust to hear that an enlightened Government like the British should resort to repressive measures and set an example of intolerance and illiberality to Native Princes. These do not require a lesson in the principles of arbitrary and despotic government at the hands of the paramount power. Their instincts as well as those of some of the political officers are sufficiently repressive in their tendencies. Instead of encouraging newspapers in Native States, where public opinion is nil and where the rulers and the political officers seem to look upon themselves as the monarchs of all they survey, the Indian Government steps in in a spirit of meddlesomeness where it has no business to interfere and makes the political officers arbiters of the action of journalists. What right have these officials to control the latter in derogation of the rights of the princes themselves? The Viceroy is said to be in charge of the portfolio of the Foreign Department, and hence one is at a loss to understand how His Excellency has been persuaded to issue the order, which is not only opposed to all the declared principles of liberal politics but is clearly mischievous. If a newspaper misconducts itself, there is the Penal Code, all-powerful and all-embracing. It checks the evil propensities of the evil-minded, and it ought to exercise a similar restraining influence even in Native States. The Eastern Herald acted indiscreetly and it had to pay the penalty with its life. Why should Native rulers be afraid of newspapers? Why should the Political Agents be similarly afraid? The comments appearing therein are either within the limits of journalism or they are not. If not, down comes the Penal Code. Why should the paramount power interfere and set an example of repressive despotism of which Native States are already full? The object aimed at cannot be accomplished by resorting to such unwise measures; because, so long as the liberty of the Native press in territories adjoining Native States is unrestrained, neither their rulers nor Political Agents can lie outside the pale of public criticism. If Lord Lansdowne had been a far-seeing statesman, firmly imbued with the principles of liberalism, the best course for him to adopt would have been to encourage newspapers in Native States and thus create public opinion in an atmosphere of silence and darkness, and at the same time teach Native Princes to exercise a vigilant control over the conduct of the erring journalists. Instead of adopting such an enlightened policy, Princes are being taught how they should be more despotic and repressive in their administration and how they should play the part of irresponsible rulers. How the repressive regulations are and will be worked in Native States will be seen from the following story as related by the Advocate of Lucknow. The Home Secretary to the Hyderabad Government issued a certain circular. The Shoukut-ul-Islám commented on it in an unfavourable tone. Immediately an order went forth to sequester the goods of the paper. Says the Advocate:—"On Sunday week last, the office of the Shoukut-ul-Islám was besieged in open daylight by a strong posse of constables, headed by one Superintendent and some Inspectors of Police, to suppress the paper for no other fault than that of protesting against the orders contained in the circular. The police forcibly broke open the editor's private box containing manuscripts and in a most disgraceful way compelled him to sign a document against his will." We earnestly ask the Viceroy to consider whether His Excellency can contemplate with equanimity these proceedings, and whether His Excellency really thinks that the principles of constitutional government can be best introduced into Native States by resorting to such repressive measures. We hope that Lord Lansdowne will, in the interests of his reputation as a liberal and far-seeing statesman, hasten to withdraw a circular which is fraught with evil consequences to the right administration of Native States. In the meanwhile it will be well if something can be done to invite the attention of Parliament to this ill-judged measure.

2. The Bodh Sudhákar (9), in its issue of the 29th July, exhorts the people of India not to give up the movement of the Indian National Congress by reason of its having borne no fruit up to this time, but to persevere in it with redoubled efforts in the hope that Government, accustomed as it is to shape its policy according to public opinion as amply proved from the history of the Indian mutiny and other political events, will, in the long run, grant the persistent demands of the Congress, and, in approving of the resolution for holding the meeting of the Congress for the year 1892 in England, recommends that in 1893 it should be held in America, in 1894 in Germany, and so on with a view to get support to the Congress demands from the different civilized nations in the world.

Exhortation to Natives to persevere in the Indian National Congress movement.

3. With a view to make the Indian National Congress a permanent institution, the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 27th July, recommends that all people, including Government servants and the Native Princes, should contribute their quota, openly or privately as the circumstances may require, to a large national fund to be applied to the promotion and accomplishment of the aims and objects of the Congress, and says that there is no disloyalty in doing so, since the aim of the Congress is not to subvert British Indian rule, but to strengthen it by getting rid of such defects in the administration as are discreditable to the traditions and policy of the British Constitution.

The formation of a national fund for furthering the objects of the Indian National Congress recommended.

4. The Arunodaya (20), in its issue of the 26th July, while pressing on Government the necessity for the establishment of a military school for the well-to-do classes of the natives of India, says that Government is wrong in supposing that military instruction would make the Natives dangerous to the State, since being a quiet and religious people they will never think of evicting the English from the country though by their enormous numerical strength they are able to do it without much effort.

The establishment of a military school for India urged.

Remarks on Sir John Gorst's declaration of the motive of the Government of India in arresting the Jubráj of Manipur.

5. The Chhitsak (27), in its issue of the 29th July, says that the observation of Sir John Gorst to the effect that the Government of India wanted to arrest the Jubráj of Manipur, because he is very brave, far-sighted and generous, plainly shows what the English would think of the Natives if they showed the same heroism, talents and patriotism as possessed by themselves and what truth there is in their profession of a desire to entrust the administration of the country to the Natives in the event of their becoming qualified to conduct it, and that the Indians would get better instruction in politics from outspoken men like Lord Lytton, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Maclean and Sir John Gorst than from scheming statesmen like Lord Ripon and Mr. Gladstone.

Importation of stores from England through the Secretary of State for India disapproved.

6. The Jame Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 30th July, writes:—One of the unfortunate results of the dual government of India is that the revenue of this country is subject to no established and recognized system of control. By this it is not meant that the revenues of India are under no control whatever, for they may be interfered with, and are interfered with everyday, by new demands made by both the Government of India and the Secretary of State, and hence they are doubly controlled in the fullest sense of the word. The very tails of the horses of the European cavalry of India are shaped and regulated by the Horse Guards. The Horse Guards and the Secretary of State are irresponsible authorities for Indian finance, and hence the annual expenditure for European troops in India may be any figure whatever. It has no authoritative or regulation limit. This is one of the misfortunes of a dual financial control. In the matter of "stores" required by India from England the control is infinitely worse. While all the countries of the world have all the markets of the world open to them for Government stores or anything else, the only market open to India for Government stores is England and that England is practically confined to London. London may be an exceedingly large market, but it is quite possible that other towns and cities and other countries may be able to supply India with "Government stores" quite as well as London, and by agencies quite as good and a great deal better than the Secretary of State. But the "India Office" lives in the Indian vineyard and expects the privilege of being allowed to taste the Indian grapes. The Indian remittances for "Government stores" must all go through one channel and in that channel competition is unrecognized and avoided, and India pays "India Office" prices and accepts "India Office" goods.

7. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 31st July, writes:—It is an utter fallacy to suppose that the supply of "stores" is the proper or even the dignified duty of a Secretary of State. "Let the cobbler stick to his last" is a trite commercial maxim, and we say with all confidence, let Indian traders, be they white, black or brown, be allowed to do their legitimate work and supply anything and everything this country wants. There would be economy in adopting this principle, and what is of still more consequence, the remotest districts of India would get all they want and at the moment they wanted it, and not, as now, be compelled to send on an indent a year before the date of supply. Government servants are in charge of Government stores, and their mouths are necessarily closed to complain against the monstrous system that now prevails. By adopting the agency of the Secretary of State for the supply of all Indian Government stores this country is kept back a whole year. That misfortune alone must be a great loss to India. Many a work in India has been hatched, and many a work has come to nought, by following the grand-motherly system of placing the Secretary of State as the head shop-keeper and commercial agent for India. This is no question of Imperial policy like the European army question, the debt question, the railway question, or the defences question. It is purely a civil, a commercial and a national question which is, or should be, within the province of the people. When will the people of India memorialise Parliament to give them this national right?

Absence of Native element among the representatives sent by the Government of India to the Congress of Hygiene and Demography, regretted.

8. The Jáme Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 27th July, regrets that not even one of the representatives sent by the Government of India to the Congress of Hygiene and Demography should be a native of India, though the Secretary of State, at the recommendation of the leaders of the Congress movement, had asked the Government to send Native experts and the names of Drs. Bahádurji, Koláh, Sirkár and several others were mentioned in this connection. The Jáme is surprised to find that Dr. Bahádurji has not been selected as a delegate by the Government of India as announced by the local Anglo-Indian papers, and adds that such regrettable state of affairs must last so long as India has no voice in her administration.

An imaginary meeting of newspaper editors in India at which the question of pleasing the subscribers was discussed.

9. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 26th July, writes:—A meeting of newspaper editors in India was held very lately at the city of Please Everybody. The question of pleasing the subscribers was seriously discussed. Decisions to the following effect were arrived at. As the times are very dull, startling news should be invented. Every little incident on the frontier should be explained as the sign of the descent of the Great Bear. The arrival of a Russian merchant in Afghanistan should be construed into the fact that the Amir is in league with Russia. The chivalrous popular appetite to devour accounts of the slaughter of millions must be gratified. Prognostications of gigantic wars which will ruin Europe should be divined and explained. The expectant subscribers should be assured every time that war is to break out very soon. So much about foreign politics. As regards home affairs, there was a great division in the meeting. The majority of English editors decided that the best way to please subscribers would be to cry down all Native movements. The Indian National Congress should be represented as a collection of half-educated Natives, the object of which is to spread sedition. The Native press, as a whole, should be condemned as rabid, vulgar and disloyal and the Native officers as sneaks and cowards. The majority of Native editors held the opposite view. They decided that in their papers, from the first line of the first page to the last line of the last page, should be written the most heart-rending fact that the Indian subjects are groaning under the tyranny of the British Ráj, that the European officials are monsters of tyranny, that representative government is the only remedy for all grievances, that European civilization is a relic of barbarism, that everything outside India is unholy. The minority who had the courage to differ were boycotted.

The Madras Government congratulated on the appointment of Mr. Justice Mutu Swami Ayer as Chief Justice, Madras High Court, and the appointment of Natives to the posts of Collectors and Secretaries recommended.

10. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 27th July, expresses its thankfulness to the Madras Government for appointing Mr. Justice Mutu Swami Ayer Acting Chief Justice of the Madras High Court, and says that as Government are satisfied about the qualifications of Natives to do the duties of puisne Judges and Chief Justice of a High Court and make these appointments, they should also try Natives in the posts of District Collectors and Secretaries to Government and thereby remove the popular impression that Government have no confidence in the Natives, and that if the Natives did not stand the test successfully Government might revert to their present course of conferring these appointments exclusively on Europeans.

Remarks on the appointment of Mr. Slater as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

11. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 19th July, observes:—The appointment of Mr. Slater as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, shows that the memorial of the Bombay Presidency Association regarding Mr. Webb's appointment as Third Presidency Magistrate has produced some effect on the Bombay Government and that his appointment has been postponed for the present. We are, however, sorry that Mr. Hamilton's rights should have been overlooked. He is the ablest Magistrate on the bench and deserves promotion. It is also to be regretted that the claims of Natives in this respect should have been overlooked; whereas formerly it was the practice to have at least one Native Magistrate, while once there were two Natives on the magisterial bench, and the late Mr. Ryan before being made permanent had to declare that he was a Native.

Appointment of Mr. Van der Straaten as a Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court disapproved.

12. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 30th July, writes:—The long continued request has at last been granted, and the strength of the Bombay Small Causes Court increased by one more Judge. This in itself is evidence how popular the working of this judicial branch is on our side. Under the circumstances the Calcutta difficulty lies in the removal of the cumbrous procedure there followed. Be that as it may, Mr. Van der Straaten, the Registrar of the Bombay Small Causes Court, has been, we are told, elevated to the new Judgeship. As Registrar Mr. Van der Straaten might have done his work well, but we fail to see any special qualification for which he has been given so big a lift. Under a contingency, when men who have passed a law examination or have experience of the practice of the Court cannot be had, Mr. Van der Straaten's elevation could be permissible, but where men qualified in every sense are available by the score, the appointment partakes of the nature of favouritism rather than of judicious appreciation. That when the market is full of the best possible material awaiting a demand, the authorities without availing of it should go out of their way in the matter, cannot but cause surprise. Indeed, how could the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris pass over so many practising Pleaders, Barristers and Subordinate Judges of considerable mofussil experience, is not plain to us. We are surprised no less than pained at Government's leaving the beaten track in this connection. Within the last few days three big posts have been filled up with Europeans, as if no competent Native was available at all. In their educational and other discourses responsible parties strongly insist upon educational and other qualifications as the only door for entrance to high preferment, but in practice the professions are observed much more in their breach than in their observance. We think the new appointment is a subject that ought to be strongly protested against by the Presidency Association. Possibly we are coming to times when even reasonable Native claims might be ignored, and it is for this reason more than for anything else that the Native public is required to be watchful in this connection. To this post is attached a monthly salary of Rs. 800—remuneration quite worthy of the aspirations of some of our practitioners in these days, when many a competent practitioner has to be content with what little pecuniary grit may happen to fall to his share. If it be that the offer has been declined by them, then we have nothing to say; but we shrewdly suspect no such procedure has been adopted, Mr. Van der Straaten's appointment having been made the moment the sanction of the Secretary of State flashed upon the authorities. This is a third surprise to us, but in the interests both of the services and of the public we raise our voice in the hope that others also will support our protest. It is owing to the introduction of a troublesome procedure that the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce asked for a reduction of the pecuniary jurisdiction of their Small Causes Court, and it may be, if the efficiency of our Small Causes Court deteriorates by such appointments, the people of Bombay may at no distant date be tempted to follow suit. Of course, as at present constituted, our Small Causes Court is very strong, but the fear is that similar appointments may lessen the strength and the people may be left no choice, but either to ask for a reduction of its jurisdiction or for its re-invigoration by the infusion of fresh blood. But in the interests of Bombay, we hope such a contingency will never occur; at the same time we may impress upon Government the fulfilment of their real duty in the matter of selection in this connection. The field for selection from amongst our educated classes is large, and Government has only to entrust this vicarious task to the local High Court.

13. The Hindusthán (107), in its issue of the 26th July, observes:—The Government of India some time ago made certain changes in the Civil Procedure Code for the relief of debtors, but it is to be regretted that in the Small Causes Courts in the Bombay Presidency they are not properly observed, because excepting females all defaulting debtors are sent to jail as hithertofore. Those persons who borrow money without any intention of returning it do not feel any shame for being sent to prison, but in the case of those who though desirous of paying off their debts are by circumstances prevented from doing so immediately, it is hard that they should have to go to jail instead of getting the relief provided in the recent modifications in the Civil Procedure Code. The provision for sending debtors to jail should not be availed of except in cases of mala fide debtors, and the High Court should also see to this.

Imprisonment of honest debtors for not paying their debts by the Small Causes Courts in the Bombay Presidency disapproved.

14. The Kdeide Mumbai (110), in its issue of the 27th July, observes:—A scuffle ensued between some Hindus and some Mahomedans, on the 14th instant, at Rájápur in the Ratnágiri District, and though the Hindus were on the offensive the Hindu officials of the place showed partiality to their own race, exaggerated the affair and tried to give it the form of a riot and to prejudice the mind of high officials by sending garbled accounts of the scuffle to the Bombay English dailies. The Hindu officials have further charged the Chief Police Constable with having taken a leading part in the scuffle on the side of the Mahomedans, while they have altogether ignored the fact of his having been wounded in quelling the disturbance. They also wrote to the District Collector to take timely precautions to prevent a disturbance on the I'd holiday. Upon this the Police Superintendent and an Assistant Collector were despatched to Rájápur, but to their utter surprise they saw no signs of it. The Assistant Collector subsequently persuaded both the communities to come to amicable terms and made satisfactory arrangements.

Remarks on the disturbance between the Hindus and the Mahomedans at Rájápur in the Ratnágiri District.

15. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 26th July, writes:—The Jail reports show that the death-rate in 1890 in the jails of Sind is higher than in the previous two years. It is alleged by the jail authorities that extramural labour is more fatal than confinement within the walls of a jail. In 1889 there were 22 deaths and 160 admissions into hospital in a gang of prisoners working on the Nára Canal. There were high rates of mortality in the gang employed on the same canal in 1890. The majority of deaths in the Shikárpur Jail were in gangs working on the Radhan Canal. Is it simply extramural labour which is the cause of high death-rates? This is nothing but a departmental dodge. Are not the prisoners made to work whole day under a broiling sun and then exposed at night to malarious damp like so many brutes? Are they not made to work even on Sundays? The shelter provided for them is only a plea to feed fat the contractors and the immediate superintending officers. The bill of prisoners' fare is already very poor, and it is made poorer by the heartless greed of cruel guardians who never fail to make capital even out of the crumbs doled out to these miserable beings. We bitterly complain against Government for their indifference in not instituting departmental enquiry into the pitiable state of the wretched prisoners.

High death-rate in 1890 in the jails in Sind and its causes.

16. The Jdme Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 30th July, observes:—The Administration Report on the Joint Stock Companies in the Bombay Presidency for the year 1890-91 that has been recently published by Government gives some useful information, but the document could be made still more useful if the amount of dividend paid by each company and the proportion it bore to the paid up capital were also shown in it.

Remarks on the Government report on the Joint Stock Companies in the Bombay Presidency.

17. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 26th July, gives a cartoon representing the Bombay Police as marching through the streets with drums (triumph in the mock trial) and bugles. The letter-press, under the heading "The triumphant march of the Bombay Police street musicians: 'Do not halloo till you're out of the wood,'" runs as follows:—They play the music of "immense triumph"; but people of sense think their drum and Tásha and Dholak will burst with awful sound one of these days!—The Bombay Police has scored a victory in the mock trial of Mánekji Asláji, and is quite jubilant over the discomfiture of the Pársis.

The Bombay police represented in a cartoon anent the result of Mánekji Asláji's trial.

18. To the Ratnákar (61) of the 24th July seven persons of the Vaddar caste have written a letter under their signatures, attested by witnesses, stating that on the 29th of June last they were waylaid at Kaládgi by five police constables named Rámsing, Saidu, Imám, Amin and Bandgi while returning from the market after taking a little toddy at an entertainment given by the caste for settling a caste dispute, asked by the policemen to get them some toddy, and on refusing to do so, roughly handled, arrested and detained in custody for two days without food and drink, when they were compelled to obtain their release by paying Rs. 50 to the police.

Alleged extortion under violence by the police at Kaládgi in the Bijápur District.

19. The Gujarát Mitrá (84), in its issue of the 26th July, writes:—The cry raised by some middle class people against the existing narrow deposit limits in the Post Office Savings Banks is not to be altogether set aside without consideration. We do not ask Government to revert to the old limit of Rs. 500, but a compromise between the Government and the anxious depositors—say raising the present limit of Rs. 200 to about Rs. 350 or 400—would be quite welcome. The matter deserves a kind word from the Post Master General and the sympathetic consideration of Government.

Increase of the limit of deposit in the Post Office Savings Banks.

20. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 25th July, writes:—A complaint has reached us against the Karáchi postal arrangements. The attention of the Deputy Post Master General, Sind, is drawn to the very great delay that occurs in the morning delivery of letters, especially on the arrival of mail steamers from Bombay. It is not understood why the mail delivery cannot be made after the early morning delivery when the mails come in late. On Wednesday last the usual post was not delivered till after 10 o'clock, owing, it is presumed, to the late arrival of the Bombay mails in the post office. We think this delay could be easily remedied. The authorities need not be reminded how essential it is for men of business to receive their letters as promptly as they arrive. Moreover, the delay proves still more aggravating by the laxity of the postal peons themselves in the performance of their duties. We learn that letters are at times not delivered at their destination till about an hour or two after they have been disbursed from the post office. This is due to the postal peons delivering the letters to the servants of Native merchants who congregate on the Frere Road, and thus spending much of their time there. We doubt not it is the duty of the peons to deliver the letters either at the residence of the addressee or at his place of business, and no departure from this rule ought, we think, to be permitted.

A complaint against the postal arrangements at Karáchi.

Part II.—Education.

21. A correspondent, writing to the Bombay East Indian (1) in its issue of the 29th July, writes:—I should like to learn the public opinion for or against my suggestion as to the advisability of opening a new course of examinations in the various branches of knowledge separately, viz., English Literature, Mathematics, Science, History, Astronomy, Logic and Philosophy. The object of this will be to enable the heads of various institutions and colleges to procure with ease skilful professors in that particular branch of knowledge that will satisfy their requirements. Now, under the present curriculum, a number of graduates and men of high degrees may be found who can very rarely be expected to possess a thorough knowledge of each of the subjects noted above. As the University have fixed varied subjects in each of which a specified minimum number of marks is to be obtained by candidates, I think they cannot but cram to enable them to obtain what is called pass marks. Those who pass cannot be expected to be very proficient in each and every branch. For instance, if a successful candidate for the B.A. Degree be appointed as lecturer in English literature in any college, I think he will take at least a year, if not more, to be well qualified to perform the duties of the chair to which he has been appointed. Individuals are, as a rule, gifted with a peculiar aptitude for one particular branch. For instance, one is very likely to know much of history though he may not be very well up in literature. If such men are allowed to appear for a University examination in that particular branch in which they can distinguish themselves, India will be able to boast of distinguished professors in all branches. The present system, it is needless to say, gives us a sort of "Jack of all trades, but master of none" men who are not able to acquit themselves with ability in a branch where special knowledge of the subject to be dealt with is required. To remove this difficulty it would be well if a new course of examinations in the various subjects were held separately by the University.

Protest against the appointment of Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái as an examiner at the next LL.B. Examination of the Bombay University.

22. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 30th July, quite disapproves of the Syndicate of the Bombay University having appointed Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái of the Surat bar, a non-graduate, as an examiner at the next LL.B. Examination, expresses surprise that out of the 250 LL.B.'s that the University has hitherto produced the Syndicate should not have found even one fit to serve as an examiner, and says that appointments like the one in question must produce the necessary effect of appreciably lowering the value and prestige of the LL.B. Degree, and earnestly presses the members of the Law Faculty, in the interests of the University and higher education in this presidency, to take action in the matter before it is too late and get the appointment in question either reconsidered by the Syndicate or revised by the Senate.

Proposed transfer of the Veterinary College from Bombay to Poona disapproved.

23. The Jâme Jamshed (80), in its issue of the 1st August, disapproves of the proposal of the Bombay Government to transfer the Veterinary College from Bombay to Poona for the purpose of incorporating it with the Science College there, and observes:—Owing to a fall off in the number of students, without proportionate reduction in the expense, Government may naturally wish to transfer the college, but we recommend the authorities to allow the institution to remain in Bombay and to give it a further trial after making necessary changes in the curriculum of studies and by holding out to the graduates turned out from it better prospects than at present. It seems that at present a great deal of attention is paid to the treatment of the diseases of horses to the exclusion of other animals, particularly bullocks, and this has greatly disappointed the Natives. When the college was first started it was hoped that the successful students would establish themselves on their own account in different parts of the presidency and would reduce the death-rate among cattle. It is necessary that the students should be given a thorough training in the treatment of cattle-diseases, and with this end the native veterinary art should also be drawn upon.

Part III.—Railways.

Remarks on the refusal of Government to sanction the scheme of the Mátherán Tramway and Rope-incline Railway.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 26th July, writes:—In negativing the scheme of railway for Mátherán proposed by Mr. Wadia, Government has lost a splendid opportunity of relieving Bombay of a portion of its residential pressure. As to capital, we have always said the new scheme would have given a further impetus to investment and encouragement to similar other projects. Moreover, the line being entirely in Native hands, it would have created greater interest in the community, and as a consequence a fresh start would have been given to such industries among a class of people who in the matter of such enterprises have yet to learn their A. B. C. We are always taunted for our alleged inactivities, and are not ashamed to admit the truth of the taunt partially; but at the same time we cannot afford to forget that Government is often illiberal in these matters. Look at our growing cotton industry and the frequent attempts made for its suppression, and one need no further convincing proof of the immense odds that are thrown in our way. In our humble opinion Mr. Wadia ought not to give up the project. We think both he and the Government ought to meet half-way and give us a hill railway as an example for other investers to start other industries. Another appeal to authorities on the same subject may not be inadvisable, and the Government of Lord Harris and the Supreme Government may still feel inclined to look at it with greater favour.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

Comments on local self-government in Bombay and the influence of the Municipal Commissioner over the Corporation.

25. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 27th July, writes:—The boasted local self-government of Bombay is fast sinking into a local autocracy. The Municipal Commissioner is the one power in the Corporation, and he can generally get it to do his bidding. A large number of the members are such hopeless imbeciles or timid jo-hukums that they invariably vote for the executive. The Commissioner was at first somewhat weak, and suffered some defeats; but he gradually felt his way and is now so secure of the strength of his position that he leads the Corporation by the nose. There is a handful of members who are sensible of their duty and independent enough to speak plainly. But all the work of the opposition falls upon that small body, and their constant opposition makes their position very unpleasant. They are very obnoxious to the executive, and seem to the outside public very quarrelsome and perpetually fault-finding. It is the easiest thing to say an unquestioning benignant "yes" to all that the executive proposes. Those members who regard the summum bonum of their duty to consist in respectable conformity with all that the Commissioner says, have the additional kudos of being patted on the back by the Anglo-Indian press as being sensible, while the dissentient members have come to be looked upon as unmitigated bores. It is a very unequal battle the dissentient members have to fight, and all honour to them that they do not flinch from their duty in spite of all odium and unpleasantness. But what is to be said of those members who owning their seats in the Corporation to the vote of the ratepayers make themselves passive and willing instruments of the Commissioner's will? A report goes abroad that at every important vote word goes round to the jo-hukums to vote straight, and the Commissioner is sure of his serried phalanx. We have heard of members who, when asked if they would vote on the popular side, have either pleaded previous engagement to the Commissioner, or, to avoid the inconvenience, have quietly slipped out of the hall at the right time. Such an exhibition of weakness is a shame to the boasted independence of Bombay. The result is that almost invariably the executive carry their measures, and the attempts to bring the executive to book are frustrated. Government by the Corporation means government by the Commissioner, and for any good the Corporation does, it may as well be abolished and the Commissioner raised supreme as the uncrowned Municipal King of Bombay. As an instance of how submissive is the Corporation to the will of the Commissioner, the debate on Khetvádi surface drainage on last Thursday may be mentioned. Here is a filthy nuisance from which the inhabitants of the locality are suffering, and of which they have long been complaining. After repeated complaints the late Commissioner visited the spot personally and was so thoroughly convinced of the urgency of improvement that he ordered the work to be done immediately. This order was, it is said, pigeon-holed as soon as Mr. Ollivant turned his back on Bombay, and the nuisance remained unabated. The residents made a fresh endeavour to obtain redress, and are told to wait until the surface drainage scheme for all Bombay is undertaken. There is competent medical testimony that the nuisance is a certain cause of disease, and yet the Commissioner, and at his bidding a majority of the Corporation, would wait until a certain scheme which they have in contemplation is taken in hand, letting the people in the meanwhile suffer and die, if they choose. We trust the residents of Khedvádi will not accept the decision of the Corporation as the last word on the subject.

A suggestion to Government in connection with the building bye-laws passed by the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

26. The same newspaper writes:—In regard to the building bye-laws recently passed by the Municipal Corporation of Bombay a strange sheepishness seems to have come on that body. The fighting members of the Corporation made a great flutter in the beginning by quarrelling over certain more or less indifferent words and exposed themselves to ridicule and censure, and have now gone to sleep, so much so that they have quietly allowed the most objectionable part of the draft bye-laws to pass without a word of remonstrance. It was the regulations about the sizes of timber that were most onerous and likely to make the cost of building unreasonably heavy. There is, we are told, a certain amount of incongruity in the sizes prescribed of posts and beams. All these details required to be carefully scrutinized. The Corporation has bestowed no thought on the details and passed the rules proposed en bloc. These sizes, we learn, are at least half as much more as the sizes in vogue under the present rules, and the result will be an increase in the cost of building and eventually a rise in rents. It is treated in some quarters as a question of the landlords. But the tenants are as much interested in having the cost of building reasonable as the landlords. The subject is too technical to be properly discussed in a mixed assembly of seventy-two members. It is hopeless to expect the Corporation to bring to bear on the bye-laws that well-informed and intelligent judgment which engineering experts can alone bestow upon them. Now that there is no chance of the Corporation making the necessary corrections in the bye-laws, let us ask Government to refer them to an independent committee of engineering experts before it finally passes them.

A request to the Bombay Municipality to censure Mr. A. Hill, Engineer in charge of the Tánsa Works, for assaulting a municipal clerk.

27. The Surya Prakásh (90), in its issue of the 25th July, observes:—Mr. A. Hill, Engineer in the service of the Bombay Municipality in charge of the Tánsa Works, has been properly dealt with by the Judicial Courts for assaulting Mr. Shivlál Motirám, a clerk in the same department. Mr. Hill was fined five rupees by the First Class Magistrate, Thána, but the Bombay High Court subsequently enhanced the fine to Rs. 75 in its revisional powers and advised Mr. Shivlál to take civil action against him for damages. We now learn that Mr. Hill has paid Rs. 550 to Mr. Shivlál in settlement of the matter. There is now no doubt about Mr. Hill's guilt, and it is therefore desirable that the Bombay Municipality should also censure him.

Part V.—Native States.

The absolute power of the Government of India as regards the Native States requires curtailment and check.

28. The India Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 27th July, regrets that Parliament should be indifferent to the policy of the Government of India towards the Native States in India, as it seems to be in the case of the Government action with reference to the Manipur State, and says that the time has come when the absolute powers of the Government of India in this matter should be curtailed and restrained by Parliament, particularly because the attitude of indifference assumed by Parliament is being gradually considered by every Native who has a particle of patriotism in him to be disgraceful and beastly, and is in the long run likely to prove very dissatisfactory to the public and dangerous to the interests of Government.

Remarks on the employment of European officers in Native States during the minority of the Princes.

29. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 26th July, observes:—Whenever European officers are appointed by Government in Native States during the minority of the Princes they should be recalled as soon as the Princes attain majority, because if allowed to remain any longer they generally try to influence the Princes and aspire to posts like that of the Diwán, thereby usurping the rights of Natives.

30. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 23rd July, writes:—That the press in the Native States should be under control will be patent from the following correspondence published in the Eastern Herald of Indore in February last:—"It is surprising that His Highness, after having an Englishman exclusively to himself as a tutor for a number of years—and he has him with him yet—has not the slightest notion of civilisation. I fear that His Highness never had moral training. I leave the public to judge from the facts that have already transpired." The facts are such as cannot be published in a newspaper. The passages quoted directly defame the character of His Highness the Mahárája Holkar. In a country where the people look upon their Chief as the highest and absolute authority in the land, the open defamation of his character is sure to weaken his prestige. If once the idea gains ground among the uneducated people of Native States that the character and doings of their Princes can be openly vilified with impunity, it will be very hard to check the factious discontent which prevails in these States. So it is extremely advisable that the freedom of the press in the Native States should be regulated and controlled. It has been very wise and beneficent on the part of the Viceroy to enact a law controlling the press in Native States. But the right of control should not have been given to the Political Agents. It is very likely to be misused. The law should be amended and the right of control should be exercised by the Viceroy himself.

Approval of the order controlling the newspapers in Native States and a suggestion in the matter.

31. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 25th July, writes:—The Government resolution with regard to the publication of journals in Native States has already sealed the fate of one paper. The Deccan Times, a leading organ of Hyderabad, which had been in existence for a period of 22 years and which had recently acquired much prominence by its sensational comments on the policy of the Nizám's Government, will soon be no more. It is very likely that the severity of its strictures had inspired the Nizám with a mortal dread for a journal which apparently had such a stock of information at its command as to render His Highness' position somewhat uncomfortable. It is generally circulated that the Nizám, resolving to get rid of this "plague," has bought it himself—a rumour which, if true, would certainly not reflect much credit on the wisdom of the Nizám's Government. It is obvious that the journal is but a passive instrument in the hands of its inspirer, who is still at large to carry on his old pranks again. We think it is the Government resolution rather than anything else which would account for the suppression of the paper. It was an indiscreet step to place the press in the Native States under what might prove the arbitrary and despotic censorship of a Political Agent. "Politicals" themselves do not fall beyond the pale of erring humanity, and the journalistic lash is often requisitioned in their case as in that of any other mortal. Those who in the past have been vilified and calumniated will not be long in determining their line of action at present, and conscious of the immense power with which Government have been pleased to entrust them, they can exercise it effectually when they choose to draw within the closest limits the liberty of the press and render it in a great measure subservient to their own principles.

Government resolution with regard to the publication of journals in Native States commented upon.

1. The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 25th July, writes:—Authority has a debasing influence, and this is exemplified in these days in the case of Englishmen in India. Taken all in all, the Anglo-Saxon race is the finest in the world. Considering their desire for justice, freedom, good government, and their efforts in securing the advance of their subjects in material and moral welfare, there is no other race which comes up to them. But compare the Englishman soon after he lands in India for the first time with what he becomes after a stay here of some years. His devotion to liberty, his ideas of equality, his distrust of secrecy and privilege, are all materially affected. And the man who when he set his foot on Indian shore was perhaps uttering to himself Tennyson's words "Men my brothers," not rarely indulges in expletives like "D—d niggers."

Alleged change in the character of Englishmen as soon as they land on Indian soil.

2. The same newspaper writes:—The recently framed rules for gagging the press in tracts administered through Political Agents are already showing results which ought to send a thrill of delight to the heart of whosoever conceived the happy notion of fulminating them. The Deccan Times of Secunderabad has given notice to its supporters that rather than subscribe to those rules the proprietor has resolved to discontinue the issue of the paper. The Pioneer cannot understand why a respectable paper like the Deccan Times should be afraid of those rules! The Pioneer, which can violate even the Official Secrets Act without any risk, can hardly be expected to appreciate or realise the difficulties or delicate situation in this country of those who have not secured the favour of "the powers that be" by espousing their cause and singing their praises in season and out of season. Independence and plain speaking is not relished, exposure of official vagaries is disliked, and the man who does so must remember that he carries his head on his hand. Especially is this the case in those parts of India which occupy the anomalous position of being neither British India nor Native States proper. If there are any Englishmen in India in whom the exercise of arbitrary power and contact with oriental despotism have produced visible effects, it is the men in the Political Department. Intolerance of criticism, cynical contempt for all freedom of discussion, and a general dislike of liberal institutions form the creed of the majority of the political officers. Those who know this would never consent to lead a life dependent entirely on their mercy. It is better to immolate one's self than turn sycophant.

The recent rules regarding the newspapers published in territories outside British India and their alleged result.

Assistant and Extra Assistant Commissioners and their appointments as Judges of Civil Courts in Berár.

3. The same newspaper writes :—It is a moot question whether the introduction of the new Civil Courts law has proved beneficial in any way. In fairness, however, it must be stated that the law has not received a fair trial. The staff of Assistant Commissioners has been unprecedentedly weak during the last three or four years. Of the six District Courts only in two are the Judges Assistant Commissioners. Over the other four the Judges are Extra Assistant Commissioners. The Extra Assistant Commissioners, too, who hold these charges are not all of them seniors as the term is used in Berár. It may well be asked why dignity, position, high pay and precedence should go to one set of persons, while another set has to do all the drudgery and suffer all the anxieties of a serious responsibility. To put the matter in another form, why appointments to Assistant Commissionerships should not be made to depend upon previous qualifications and training. In this matter the local authorities are not responsible. It is at Olympus that things are ordained thus. Those, however, who have to conduct the administration here might well point to the Government at Simla the inconvenience (properly speaking, injustice) of making such appointments. But, perhaps, they are wise in not protesting. A Government which wants to stifle criticism will not permit its officers to express any opinion on its doings.

Mr. Obbard and his rumoured non-confirmation in the post of Civil and Sessions Judge.

4. The same newspaper writes :—If rumour is to be credited, we are going to have in Berár a very vivid illustration of that great policy or principle enunciated by Sir John Gorst which traces its course as far back as the days of Tarquinus Superbus. It is said that Mr. Obbard, who for two years held charge of the Court of the Civil and Sessions Judge, will not be confirmed, but somebody else put in his place. Mr. Elliott was at one time talked of, but he too is now considered as out of the running. If hard and conscientious work, an honest desire not to shirk it, patience, diligence and abilities are any qualifications in the eye of the Government, there is no reason why Mr. Obbard should not be made Civil and Sessions Judge.

A suggestion in connection with transfers of certain officers in Berár.

5. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 24th July, approves of the system in the Bombay Presidency of frequently transferring Mámlatdárs, Munsifs, Shirastedárs, Názirs, &c., from one place to another and the order laying down that officers in certain posts must be transferred after every three years, and requests the Judicial Commissioner in Berár to have similar arrangements in that province in the matter of Extra Assistant Commissioners, Tahsildárs, Clerks and Deputy Clerks of Courts, Shirastedárs, Sub-Registrars, &c.

Alleged encroachment on land belonging to the Amráoti City Municipality and the carelessness of the latter in the matter.

6. A correspondent, writing to the same newspaper, feels it his duty to bring to the notice of the responsible authorities that the Amráoti City Municipal Committee have not been very careful in preventing encroachments on municipal lands by unscrupulous people, and gives four instances in support of his assertion.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Issue of peremptory orders to journalists not to discuss the relative merits of the Russian and British Governments recommended.

1. The Kathiawar Times (3), in its issue of the 31st July, writes:—The reported activity on the frontiers of India has led some Anglo-Indian and Indian journals to discuss the respective merits of the Russian and British administrations, and some of the Anglo-Indian papers, which are considered to be of the most reptile type, attempt to overawe the Indians by declaring that the Russians, should they ever succeed in conquering India, would prohibit the Indians from practising as lawyers, from editing newspapers, from becoming bankers, and so forth, and would treat them as the unfortunate Jews are being dealt with. Is this the way to secure the sympathy of the people at a trying juncture? The Indian journals of the same class have proved more than a match for them. They retaliate by declaring that the Russians are not so black as they are painted; that if the Jews are treated oppressively it is because of their own fault, because of their practising usury and fomenting treason; that the Russians are very kind and very good, and so forth, quoting in support of their assertions some French travellers who have the best of things to say of them. It is advisable that Government should issue peremptory orders that Anglo-Indian or Indian journals should not discuss at all the merits of the two nations, and should desist from propagating discontent among the people. The people of India should distinctly remember that no Government is infallible; that with all its faults the British Government is the most benign Government upon earth; that if the administration in India is faulty it is because English rule here is not carried on by the best men, but by the general run of Englishmen, who often do not like to see their prejudices and purposes crossed by the Indians. On the whole, of all European people the English know best how to fraternize with alien races. At a time when English people are jealous, and very properly too, of the designs of Russia, the best thing for them to do is to preserve a vestige of independent spirit in the people of this country, for their independent energy would be the strongest of all bulwarks against Russian aggression. Government must secure the confidence of the people and then may rest assured that every true Indian will be ready to shed his blood in defence of India, for their own good and the good of the country, for the interests of the Indians are much more involved in the safety of the country than those of the British.

Comments on the rumoured intention of Government to gag the Native press in India.

2. The Gujarati (83), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—It is rumoured that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government intend taking some steps to gag the press in British India. As will be seen from the "Wanderer's talk of the town" appearing in a recent issue of the Times of India, some one either at Simla or the India Office is busying himself with devising measures with a view to curtail the liberty of the indigenous press. Lord Cross' unwarranted strictures on Native journals, in which His Lordship thought fit to indulge quite recently, also lend an air of reality to the rumours that have been afloat since the Manipur tragedy, and to the inspired articles appearing in the official organs on the other side of India. For our part we are disposed to think that the rumours in question are started by a section of the Anglo-Indian press which is ever burning with the desire of raising its own importance and prestige by throwing mud at their Native contemporaries. Besides, there is the Indian correspondent of the London Times who would like to make short work of all the critics of Government by resorting to drastic measures for their suppression. Whatever the blunders and failings of Lord Lansdowne's Government, we cannot persuade ourselves to believe that a statesman of his liberal views and sympathies will lend his sanction to a proposal which, instead of quieting the people, will breed serious discontent throughout the country. Such a repressive measure was discarded by Parliament after mature consideration of the subject, and we find it impossible to believe that Lord Lansdowne will think it a prudent course to deprive the country of a privilege restored to it by a Viceroy of Lord Ripon's foresight. But supposing it is seriously in contemplation to take some steps, we confess we cannot see on what reasonable grounds Government can proceed in the matter. Admitting for a moment that some papers abuse the liberty of the press, there is the all-embracing Penal Code and the effective machinery of Indian Courts to punish such prints. Recent cases have shown that the present law is amply sufficient to teach a sound lesson to the offending journals. It would be preposterous to say that the whole Indian press is guilty, because in that case Government would have seriously to consider why the entire press is opposed to their policy. It cannot be that the whole country is wrong and Government alone right. The probabilities in such a case are that the present machinery and policy of Government are out of harmony with the times, and the cry for reform and redress can never be despotically put down for any length of time with impunity. Again, the suggested intention on the part of Government impales them on the horns of a dilemma. Either the Native press is sufficiently influential and representative of public opinion in India or it is not. If it is not, there is nothing to be afraid of. Individual writers are at liberty to comment upon the acts of Government, provided they do not transgress the limits laid down by law. But if they do so, the present law is quite effective for all the required purposes. If, however, the press reflects the popular views and wishes, it is a suicidal policy to block the only available channel for conveying them to the ears of Government. But when the country asks for reforms in the administration through the medium of its public organs, it is told that the views appearing therein are the views of a section of the public and afford no reliable guidance to the authorities as regards the current of public opinion. This argument, reduced to its naked form, amounts to saying that the press is not influential and representative. If so, why should Government trouble themselves with devising unusual measures against the liberty of a press which commands no influence, nor reflects public opinion, especially when there is already the machinery of Courts provided by the Legislature for castigating the erring members of the press fraternity. In whatever light one views the question, he cannot but come to the conclusion that the suggested measure, instead of soothing discontent, will lead to needless irritation and friction and create dissatisfaction, which, however subdued, would be none the less real and dangerous. Lord Lansdowne assumed his dignified office with the best of credentials, and although serious mistakes have been committed until now, there are still hopes of his redeeming them, if he but now devotes himself to the accomplishment of one or two pressing reforms before his departure. We should be sincerely sorry, not only in the interests of the press but in the interests of His Excellency's distinguished past, if any ill-advised and mischievous piece of legislation were undertaken at the instance of short-sighted councillors, whose guidance has already cost the Viceroy not a little.

3. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 30th July, writes:—The prevalence of immorality amongst the English officials in Burmah is notorious. These officials marry respectable Burmese women according to Burmese law, which is very lax in matters of marriage, and cast them and their children off when they are transferred to some other station or marry an English wife. We know of an instance of a Burmese woman who came to Calcutta with her children to file a suit against one of the highest officials of Bengal who had deserted her. The police came to the rescue of this big official and packed her bag and baggage back to Burmah just as she landed. The Burmese wives of English officials are known by the name of "walking dictionaries," for the officials learn with greater ease the Burmese language by constant companionship with their wives than by keeping a tutor. During the régime of Sir Charles Aitchison these scandals were checked, for he insisted on the officials learning Burmese without having recourse to "walking dictionaries." Mr. Maurice Gregory, when he visited Upper Burmah some time back, saw five-sixths of the English officials, civil and military, living such scandalous lives as are shocking to the moral sense of man. How long is such a terrible state of things to go on unchecked?

Alleged immorality of the English officials in Burmah.

4. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—We hear that Lord Wenlock, the Governor of Madras, has abandoned his proposed visit to Poona to try conclusions with our sporting Governor. That is a sensible resolution, which will meet with universal approval in view of the distressing scarcity which has overtaken a portion of His Lordship's presidency. It would have been nothing short of a scandal had he carried out his original intentions. In that case it is easy to imagine how soon His Excellency of Madras might have been overwhelmed with the taunts and jibes of friends and foes alike. In all probability, Truth might have had another of its scathing satires for the Madras Government. Playing high antics as devils and angels and then rushing off 700 miles to indulge in the pastime of wood and leather like truant boys, are certainly not the means by which a Government could be carried on efficiently or by which a Governor could achieve a reputation. But, possibly, in these days of sporting and dancing administrators it is not expected that anything like reputation, unless it be on the cricket field or the dancing floor, could be achieved. Everything is for the best in the best of all possible Governments, notably under a Tory Government, which has a fixed notion that the more India is let alone and allowed to be considered the best of all the Sleepy Hollows of the civilised world, the greater the prosperity and contentment of the people. It is of no use Governors achieving brilliant reputation, or, for that matter, any reputation at all. For that noble achievement you require men of exceptional abilities. But exceptional abilities would be the bane of India according to Tarquinius Superbus Gorst. The settled policy of Government is to rest content with mediocrities all round—from Governors-General and Governors down to the youngest competitive Griffin in the Secretariat. Mediocrity of mediocrities is the order of the day. And what can poor mediocrities like their Lordships of Bombay and Madras do when time sits heavily on them and there are hide-bound and humdrum Secretaries to carry on the work of the administration, as auxiliary Governors, according to their own ideas, with the occasional pastime of a stray volley at "popular opinion" and a random "sneer" at popular institutions? With scarcity bordering on famine in Madras, the departure of Lord Wenlock to Poona to play cricket with His Excellency Lord Harris would have been characterized as out-Neroing Nero himself. Sir John Gorst might have been obliged to refer again to ancient classic history for an allusion, possibly to couple Nero with Tarquinius Superbus. Thanks to the common sense of Lord Wenlock, the public is spared the wrench that it might have otherwise received. Mr. Labouchere, too, will regret that he has lost the opportunity for another raillery at an Anglo-Indian Mogal of the nineteenth century.

5. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes :—It is well that the Governor of Madras has abandoned his intended visit to Poona to play a cricket match with his brother of Bombay. Everywhere the country is suffering more or less from insufficient or irregular rainfall, and parts of Bombay are not free from the evil ; but it is in the Madras Presidency that it is showing itself in the form of an impending famine. At such a juncture the spectacle of the two Governors with their staff engaged in playing a match, preceded by many days of practice, would have been humiliating enough, and so it is well that the plan has been abandoned, though it should never have been entertained. Statesmen may, indeed, enjoy their own favourite sports, but the indulgence must have its limits, especially when they are posted to onerous and high-paid offices to which they are expected to devote their best energies for the welfare of the people. The late Governors of Madras and Bombay did work in the way they were bound to do, but there is an unfortunate impression abroad that their present successors regard it as an invitation to rest and be easy. We cannot account for this impression, which would have been justifiable had the same personages continued in office, but the tenure is restricted to a limited period to allow fresh energy and continued activity being kept up. It is to be hoped, therefore, that no reasonable grounds will be afforded to the public by the authorities to take such a perverted view of things.

Mr. H. E. M. James' further memorandum regarding his proposal for the revival of the Cotton Frauds Act disapproved.

6. In noticing Mr. H. E. M. James' further memorandum in support of his proposal for the revival of the Cotton Frauds Act, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 3rd August, says :—In this memorandum Mr. James assumes that if inferior Indian cotton is so much in demand in England, the call for that staple must of necessity increase if its quality be improved. Experienced merchants, however, do not accept this assumption. It is a universally accepted dictum of Political Economy that the merchant should be left to produce such goods as he can afford to sell and that the State has no right to dictate to him what sort of goods he should manufacture. This seems to have escaped the attention of Mr. James. The kind of cotton produced in India is accepted by the manufacturers without any complaint, and there is no reason for Government interference. No deception is practised on the purchaser to induce him to buy the inferior Indian cotton, and it would not be right to bring in legal interference against his will. Under these circumstances Mr. James would have no cause to complain if the public should attribute his great anxiety for the revival of the Cotton Frauds Act to some other object than the one he professes, or to his desire to advance the interests of particular parties.

The same partially approved.

7. In writing on the same subject, the Jâme Jamshed (86), in its issue of the same date, observes:—Scarcely one-fifth of the total quantity of cotton exported to Europe is purchased by England, and hence the production of the Indian cotton ought not to be left to the tender mercies of the freaks and fancies of the Lancashire cotton manufacturers. Mr. James has admitted in his memorandum that, so long as American cotton is imported into England in large quantities, superior Broach in its purest state will not be in demand, which arises only when a supply of the former falls short of the requirements. This, however, does not justify us in overlooking fraudulent mixtures in our cotton, the purity of which ought to be maintained in the interests of trade by putting down the frauds. For the purposes of honest trade, every bale of cotton exported from this country ought to bear on its outside covering a description of the kind of article contained in it; in other words, cotton should be brought under the Merchandize Marks Act. Mr. J. K. Bythell is also of opinion that a short legal measure ought to be passed to put down the frauds. It is gratifying that the attention of the Bombay Government has been drawn by Mr. James to the necessity of its making due exertions to improve the quantity and quality of the cotton crop of this presidency. It is to be hoped that this recommendation will receive due attention and that good seeds for raising the staple crops of the country, such as cotton, wheat, &c., will be supplied gratis to the farmers. It should, however, be remembered that the desirable improvement in these crops will not be effected unless able Natives who have received proper agricultural education are employed in the Agricultural Department of Government.

The policy of the Bombay Government with reference to recent appointments of Presidency Magistrates and Judges of the Small Causes Court criticised.

8. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—One of the worst vices of an irresponsible bureaucracy, which is inflated by the power it wields, is its stolid persistency in its errors in statecraft, the more that such errors are mercilessly exposed by an enlightened public, be it ever so microscopic. These vices are most practised in Russia, and we read from time to time of instances which shock us all. India is the country where these are most to be discerned next to Russia. Here the insolence of authority rages rampant; and the more an error of omission or commission is publicly pointed out, the greater is the insolence of that authority to plunge itself headlong into the abyss of its own errors. The Webb job having been thoroughly unmasked and its true character laid bare, the angry Government of Bombay has given a fresh illustration of the vice we have alluded to. Who are the public? So it asks. Are they the responsible rulers of the land? Then, why should they come forward to teach it what its duties and responsibilities are? This pestiferous public must be put down and "snubbed." The resistless might of the administration should be brought down on it so that it may never again raise its head. This is very amusing. As if the hydra-headed monster called Demos could ever be crushed, despite the expenditure of all potential resources which may be at the command of even the most tyrannical government on the face of the earth! History from times the most ancient has taught the imperishable lesson that every autocracy exists only to dig its own grave. Every attempt to repress a people has the ultimate consequence of making them stronger. Thus repression only results in giving fresh strength to Demos, giant-like, to combat, till at last tyranny and autocracy and all kinds of despotism, pure or benevolent, die of their own exhaustion. The present administration of Bombay is determined to defy the public, the more that the public express their undisguised disapproval of recent magisterial appointments in the city. It has now taken into its head to gazette Mr. Slater, an absolute nonentity to the public, to act as the Chief Magistrate during the temporary absence on leave of Mr. Cooper. But it is to be presumed the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris will not stop in its obstinate career, but will continue to defy public opinion till that very opinion eventually overwhelms it. That that will certainly be the case, we see as plain as the noon-day sun. But governments all over the world never learn lessons in time, not until they are completely humiliated, made to sit on the stool of repentance and cover themselves with the hot embers of their hardened sins. The one redeeming feature of the recent judicial and magisterial appointments is the provokingly tardy justice rendered to one deserving claimant, one of marked ability and of large practice extending over a number of years, and, above all, one who had acted as a Judge off and on half a dozen times—we mean Mr. Hormasji Dadabhoy. It is satisfactory to note that the Fifth Judgeship of the Small Causes Court just created has been conferred on that able pleader. It would have been a grave scandal had his claims been overlooked this time too. So far we are free to approve of this nomination, the only sensible one which is in accordance with State regulations and which commands the entire confidence of the public, Native and European. We congratulate the Government and Mr. Hormasji alike.

9. The Kesari 43), in its issue of the 4th August, publishes a news-letter from Bombay in which the writer speaks of the appointments of Messrs. Slater and Van der Straaten as Acting Chief Presidency Magistrate and an Acting Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, respectively, as being irregular, improper and in opposition to public opinion, says that the latter gentleman is reported to be a relative of a Judge of the High Court and that influence has got the upper hand in the régime of His Excellency Lord Harris, and asks whether Mr. Lee-Warner is now busy in retaliating the recognition and justice which the claims of Natives got from Lord Reay in spite of his wishes to the contrary.

10. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—The Government of Bombay are faithfully carrying out its principle of making appointments without regard for public opinion or public interests. They have appointed a junior barrister to act as Chief Presidency Magistrate of Bombay during Mr. Cooper's absence on privilege leave for three months, even putting aside the claims of Mr. Hamilton, whose performance of work has so happily won the approval of the public. Seeing that a Presidency Magistrate has the right of sentencing offenders to two years' imprisonment and that there is no appeal in cases where he has inflicted a sentence of six months, we doubt whether the Government has properly consulted public interests in appointing to such a responsible post a gentleman who has been at the bar for not more than six years and who has not that knowledge of the habits and ways of the people which may be held essential for a proper discharge of magisterial functions. Not content with this, the same Government make other judicial appointments, which can scarcely be said to have the approval of those whose interests are concerned.

11. The Phœnix 6), in its issue of the 29th July, writes:—To enhance the dissatisfaction already widely prevalent and to revenge themselves on public opinion, evidently the Bombay Government has perpetrated another piece of jobbery by the appointment of Mr. Slater as the Chief Presidency Magistrate. What this gentleman has done to merit the favours lavishly poured on him ever since the day he set his foot in India, passes all comprehension. His life has been one of unparalleled series of windfalls. He has been successively a Professor in the Elphinstone College, a University examiner, Senior Government Professor of Law, and now, to crown all, he has been appointed Chief Presidency Magistrate, which carries with it a monthly emolument of Rs. 2,000. Though called to the bar ever since 1882 he has never shown any exceptional ability in the practice of his profession to entitle him to such responsible posts. No reasonable man would, we think, envy Mr. Slater his lucrative post had not his appointment established an invidious distinction, inasmuch as the claims of older and abler men who combine in themselves all the qualifications necessary for a Presidency Magistrate have been deliberately ignored. This system of appointment which prevails very widely must lead to a deal of heart-burning and secret discontent. In almost all departments promotion is very often made to depend on back-stairs influence. He is a fortunate candidate who can bring an amount of influence to bear on the "dispensers of gifts." Ability is but faintly recognized and numerous are the instances where men of acknowledged ability have to content themselves with the most miserable pittance and the most miserable posts; whereas men in the most deplorable state of ignorance and without a spark of any intellectual brightness lord it over them. Frequent complaints arise of the partiality and unfairness of officials, who dispense employments under their patronage without the least regard to the intrinsic worth of a man. Money and social status form the only tests to judge of a man's fitness for a post. The sad effects of such a deplorable system, which is daily acquiring wider dimensions, will soon reveal themselves and will, we are afraid, seriously retard intellectual progress in India.

12. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 3rd August, writes:—Government has bestowed the honour of the permanent post of Fifth Judge in the Bombay Small Causes Court on a worthy recipient. The appointment which was first announced in the dailies did injustice to the Government. It was, indeed, considered a piece of the most unmitigated jobbery that a man who was merely an attorney's clerk, who later on spent some years in the Sheriff's office, and was thence promoted to be Registrar of the Small Causes Court should be at once raised to a seat on the bench of the Court. Even now it is no less a job, to be greatly deprecated, that he has been appointed Acting Judge. Mr. Van der Straaten may be a clever man and may efficiently manage an office, but we doubt whether that is enough qualification to fit him for a Judgeship. As Registrar he fills a judicial office, since he has powers to dispose of claims up to Rs. 20, and having regard to the discharge of that function we wish a man with better judicial experience had been appointed Registrar. A Judge's post surely requires a superior training, and a Small Causes Court Judgeship especially is reserved for men of the ripest experience. In the mofussil a Small Causes Court Judgeship is generally the highest prize attainable by Subordinate Judges. In Bombay the jurisdiction is much higher and the litigation more complicated. Here, therefore, it is all the more necessary that a Judge should have mature experience of judicial work. A Subordinate Judge or a Pleader of experience could easily have been found to fill up the acting appointment. But if an acting appointment is to be strongly deprecated, it may well be imagined with what consternation the people received the news that Mr. Van der Straaten was appointed permanent Fifth Judge. Here is another job perpetrated by the Government, the people began to say; and such is the temper of the people towards the Government at present that the news at once found ready credence. As events have proved, the choice of the Government as regards the permanent incumbent is, however, quite unexceptionable. The choice has not only been eminently worthy in itself, but makes amends, however tardy, for a long course of injustice. Mr. Hormasji Dadabhoy, who now becomes confirmed as Judge, was for long the unquestioned leader of the Small Causes Court bar. He gave up a lucrative practice for the honour of an acting appointment as Judge of the Court, and served as Acting Judge off and on on many occasions. He had the best title to be confirmed as Judge when on two previous occasions there occurred permanent vacancies on the bench. We are glad that now at last justice has been done to a deserving public servant.

The appointment of Mr. Hormasji Dadabhoy as the permanent Fifth Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, approved.

13. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—Mr. Hormasji Dadabhoy has at last been appointed Fifth Judge of the Bombay Court of Small Causes. Mr. Hormasji might have been Second or Third Judge by this time; but he was often passed over, though he held acting appointments on the bench for over a dozen times we believe, and by his soundness of judgment, knowledge of the law, and experience of the Court's routine he was able to give the utmost satisfaction to pleaders and suitors alike. Justice has come very tardily to him, but it has been done at last, and that is some satisfaction. His appointment is an accession to the strength of the bench, and, as such, it is a public gain.

14. The Nyáyadarshak (115), in its issue of the 27th July, observes:—

Ráo Bahádur Lálshankar Umiáshankar, First Class Subordinate Judge, Ahmedabad, and his work.

Since the appointment of Ráo Bahádur Lálshankar Umiáshankar as First Class Subordinate Judge at Ahmedabad, the monthly number of new suits filed in this Court has been greatly reduced together with that of decided cases, and the reason is that he does not appear to go carefully through the cases which come before him and that parties are put to much inconvenience and expense by frequent adjournments. For example, in suit No. 750 of 1890, in which the editor of the Nyáyadarshak paper was summoned as a witness and there were nearly 50 other witnesses to be examined, the Subordinate Judge, on the 1st day of April, which was fixed on for a hearing of the case, attended the Court at about 4 P.M. and had therefore merely to postpone it. It had on two other days to be adjourned again. The parties were kept unnecessarily waiting in Court from 11 A.M. to 6 P.M. from the 1st to the 3rd July, when it was again postponed to the 5th July, and was afterwards referred to arbitration. We recommend Government to transfer Ráo Bahádur Lálshankar, who is a native of Ahmedabad and who devotes some of his attention to the affairs of the local Prárthana Samáj and other similar institutions.—In alluding probably to the same subject, the Hindusthán (85), in its issue of the 2nd August, observes:—Owing to the scurrilous writings of a certain local paper against an officer who is held in high esteem for his impartiality and integrity, much sympathy is felt for him and there is no doubt that the paper will soon suffer in its reputation. It is reported that this officer's predecessor had left nearly 350 undecided cases in arrears, while there are now only 200 such cases.

15. The Praja Mat (117), in its issue of the 1st August, observes:—Mr. James, when Commissioner, N. D., had issued a circular that the transfers of Deputy Collectors and Mámlatdárs would be made every five years, but in the time of Mr. Spence it seems to have remained a dead-letter. As the Deputy Collectors and Mámlatdárs have frequent occasions to come into close contact with the people, it is but right that they should not be allowed to remain at one station for more than five years. We direct the attention of Government to the fact that in some districts in the Northern Division people have got so sick of some officers who have been long at one place that they are heartily wishing for their immediate transfer. We also request Government to transfer Mr. Carvalho, Native Assistant to the Commissioner, N. D., who has held his present post for a number of years, in order to give an opportunity to other Deputy Collectors of acquiring experience in that post.

A request to Government to make frequent transfers of Deputy Collectors, Mámlatdárs, and the Native Assistant to the Commissioner, in the Northern Division.

16. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—Far be it from us to speak against the Government and its officers; but we are so jealous in respect of its dignity and purity that we cannot tolerate the least deviation from the established principles on the part of its servants. Though painful, yet it is a bounden duty of journalists to expose the misdeeds of Government officers. But surely this is a very hard job. There are insuperable difficulties in the way. We are often reminded of harems of old days when we think of the Government and its various departments. In the apartments of the harem reigned voluptuous beauties, whom the wistful public gaze could not reach, where no one durst approach for fear of the fearful eunuch guards. In the various departments of the Government reign vicious bribery, chicanery and barter of justice, which the wistful public gaze cannot reach, where no one dare approach for fear of the fearful and heartless guard of the law of "Libel." Let us see if we can elude the vigilance of this "Libel" and have a peep into a department. The Medical Department first comes to our view. We see a medical officer in the province of Sind who is a horrible bribe-taker. He signs the certificates for sick leave with his right hand and with his left receives his "fee," as he calls it. Poor Munshis and clerks are worried by him very much. A man may be on his death-bed, yet he will not get a certificate recommending him for sick leave, unless this notorious doctor is paid his "fee." He has been carrying on this nefarious trade with impunity for years together. He knows very well that no Government servant from whom he has extorted bribe can expose him. Moreover, he has got many friends. If any one is in the bad graces of his superior officer or is transferred to some distant or unhealthy station, this greedy doctor is ever ready to help him out of the difficulty by giving him a false certificate for sick leave, provided his appetite for gold is satisfied. What mischief is not being done by this inhuman doctor? But what is the remedy? There is no legal proof. The bribe-givers are all Government servants. They will never give out the fact, for they are as guilty as the bribe-taker in the eye of the law. The guard "Libel" also is dinning into our ears "Beware, beware, do not be over-bold." No remedy. Let us only cry in the wilderness.

Suggestions to remove inconveniences to passengers while embarking on and disembarking from the steamers in the port of Ratnágiri.

17. The Jagan Mitrá (39), in its issue of the 3rd August, writes:—Every year passes without any effectual means being adopted for remedying the evils from which the passengers have been suffering while embarking on and disembarking from the daily steamers in the Ratnágiri port. Several complaints have from time to time been made to Messrs. Shepherd and Company, but apparently they seem to have taken no notice of the matter. Amongst the several ports the company's steamers have to touch on their voyage from Bombay to Goa, Ratnágiri is the most troublesome, and the difficulties are enhanced by the mismanagement in the company's administration. In touching at other ports like Revdanda, Bánkot, Dábhol, Jaygad, Málvan and others, the steamers have to spend nearly one hour simply for going into and coming out of each of the ports, but at Ratnágiri this trouble is not at all required. The port is on the open sea-coast and the steamers have only to anchor very near their main passage on the sea, do business and start. There is therefore no injustice in compelling the steamers to wait for a sufficient time in quietly and conveniently doing their business at this port. All the steamers that ply on the coast have more gangways than one on each side; they should be compelled, therefore, to open at least two of them, one for embarking and another for disembarking the passengers, marking on the outside in bold characters "the way in" and "the way out" and showing a red lantern at the one and a green at the other. So soon as passenger boats go near the steamer they have to touch at "the way in," discharge their cargo and slide to the other door of disembarkation, where they will receive passengers and start back to the shore. The boats must touch like that and slide in succession one after another, so that no confusion of any sort will take place and the passengers will find an easy way of getting into and out of the steamers. The owners of the passenger boats should be kept under a strict check, so as not to infringe any of these rules. They ought not, as they do now, to go out into the sea half-way to meet the steamers while they are in motion. The place of anchorage for a steamer should be fixed and a floating anchored buoy should be kept there. All steamers must come to that spot and should not stand out in the wide sea, as they sometimes do. The passenger boats ought on no occasion to move forward from a particular distance behind the place of steamer anchorage until the steamer has stopped and anchored at the appointed place. When steamers arrive during dark nights in the port the passengers have to experience an amount of trouble and have very great fears about loss of life and property. Many a time have people lost their things and received bodily injuries in the hurry of embarking and disembarking. In fact, to take a family of women and children along with one on the voyage is highly dangerous and many mishaps take place. Even the European officers of Government at the station have had very sad experience of these things. Why these evils cannot be remedied we cannot see. Government should frame rules for the guidance of the boats and steamships and the responsible officers should be directed strictly to enforce them. In this matter there seems to be no expenditure of any sort except for keeping a floating buoy, which will not cost much.

Religious agitation by certain Brâhmans to revive the old religion at Poona.

18. While writing on the agitation set on foot at Poona by some orthodox Brâhmans for excommunicating certain persons alleged to have taken tea at a tea-party given by a Christian missionary gentleman in that city, the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 3rd August, says:—

Quite frantic efforts are being made in Poona by the defenders of orthodoxy in support of, to borrow a famous phrase, "a divided and decaying creed." There is a vigorous agitation kept up, which, though aimless and ineffective, unsettles the minds of the people. What with the Age of Consent Act and the disclosures of proceedings at a recent tea-party, there seems to be a feeling abroad that the community must be purged by excommunicating those who have offended against caste rules. Yet such is the feebleness of caste organizations that the excommunication is found to be impracticable. It is felt that if the work of excommunication is carried to its logical sequence all Poona would have to be excommunicated, for there is probably not a house in the city where a black sheep, according to the old way of thinking, could not be found. The offended excommunicators met in solemn conclave over and over again, and dispersed each time discomfited and undecided as to what should be done. At last the lay portion of the community have given up participation in the tea-party as a casus belli and have hit upon a novel plan of organising the community, re-adjusting the limits of religious observances, and laying down the basis for future excommunications. There are papers issued with six articles of faith. Members of the community are asked to subscribe to the articles, and if the signatories depart from the terms of the articles in future they are declared liable to expulsion from caste. But by whom, and under what authority, these articles are issued does not appear, nor is anything stated as to what is to happen to those who may not subscribe to the new propaganda. Everything is left in the most delicious uncertainty. There are some busybodies who are putting themselves forward as leaders in this work of re-habilitation of caste, but their title to such leadership is highly questionable. In any case their credentials are disputed by a number of people, not a few of whom are orthodox. The articles are as follows:—(1) Not to partake of food or water touched by a person not a Bráhman; (2) not to eat prohibited food or to drink prohibited drinks; (3) prohibition of flesh and spirituous liquors; (4) not to go to a foreign country; (5) not to marry a widow; (6) not to have social communion with those who are or will be excommunicated. Another party working from a different direction has issued a paper with five articles: (1) That those who partake either of food forbidden by the Shástras or of liquor of any sort be excommunicated; (2) that girls be permitted to marry at the age of twelve and boys at that of eighteen years; (3) that any person who may have spent a portion of his life in any foreign country be not deprived of his caste privilege; (4) taking into consideration that all Bráhman girls are married at about the age of twelve, that no man past the age of fifty be permitted to marry a virgin girl; (5) that polygamy should be entirely discouraged, no man, unless urged by necessity, being permitted to take to himself a second wife. These are the essentials of the Hindu religion according to its Poona champions. How far they are truly essential, we leave it to our readers to judge. But whatever their essential character, it is obvious they overlap one another and are very indefinite. How are (2) and (3) in the first set to be distinguished, unless by the latter is meant preaching prohibition to others? What is the extent of the 4th? Is going to Ceylon forbidden? But these questions are probably out of place in the case of persons who are not conspicuous for consistency or reason. Nor is the other set of articles, which is supposed to be a counterblast from the reformers' side, any better as regards discrimination or principle. A more serious question for consideration is what is the punishment for a breach of observance by those who now subscribe to the articles? Even the mandates of Shankaráchárya, the commonly recognized spiritual head of the community, are disregarded by the orthodox people themselves, when they are not in consonance with their own notions of right. Supposing on any of these points, say foreign travel or widow-marriage, a Shankaráchárya is enlightened enough to grant his permission, the men doing these acts would be strictly within their rights, and yet these non-descript guardians of the orthodox religion would pronounce the acts irreligious and refuse to be bound by the Shankaráchárya's mandate. There is thus, spiritually speaking, a complete chaos of authority and opinion. Every one is a law to himself. It is a most dangerous condition to be in. There is prevailing unbelief and hypocrisy all round. Those who pose as the champions of the ancient religion are often its greatest offenders. Heaven knows where all this is to end. While the lay public is thus tossed about without a helmsman or a rudder, the priestly class, who ought to be the guides of the lay public in these matters, are engaged in an internecine war among themselves. They have taken the law into their own hands, and are subjecting to a degrading penance and a fine every member of their class who may have had any social relations with any supporter of the Age of Consent Act. Fancy the support of the Age of Consent Act set up as a spiritual offence! And what is the consistency of these holy defenders of the faith? The lay members of the public have perfect freedom of communication among themselves and the priests have free access to the lay opponents of the Bill even if they may have had communication with the lay supporters, but the priests are not themselves to go direct to the lay supporters. The truth is, the Hindu religion is reduced to a condition of hollow professions. The priests and a portion of the lay public have a faith of some sort, but it is all faith in the shell of the religion, the kernel has long gone out. As we have said above, it is a most deplorable state to be in. Nothing short of a revolution will set right this confusion. We are afraid our nation must pass through a severe ordeal before our national faith is set firm on a reasonable basis.

19. While writing on the same subject, the Sudhárak (18), in its issue of the 3rd August, says that the agitation is fomented by some busybodies who have, though free from the trammels of superstition, assumed orthodox views in order to secure a sort of leadership and popularity, and that though it considers that the abolition of idolatry and sacrificial rites and ceremonies, freedom to dine and intermarry with persons of any creed or caste and to study any religious books, female education and similar other things imply religious reform rather than religious degeneration, it is willing that some mild restraints may be imposed on the Hindu community in general until the wide spread of modern education should remove all absurd scruples from their minds. But who, asks the paper, should determine and enforce such restraints?—A correspondent, writing on the same subject and in the same paper, regrets that the vices of drinking and concubinage should be very rife at present in Poona as they were in times gone by, and says that the people should first try their best in eradicating the latter vice, which obtains even in some high, old and orthodox families, and then devote their attention to the sins of eating flesh, drinking wine and travelling in foreign countries, which are not so heinous. The same writer blames the so-called friends and advocates of reform for doing nothing beyond preaching what should be done, and tells them plainly that if they really wish to taste the happy fruits of religious and social reform, they must be prepared to undergo public and private persecution and must act as they preach without waiting to see who or how many persons would follow and support them.

An appeal to Shankarácharya, the religious head of the Hindu community.

20. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 6th August, publishes a letter purporting to be addressed by a Hindu to Shankaráchárya, the spiritual head of the Hindu community, in which the writer draws his attention to the alleged neglect of the Vedic religion in India at this early stage of the Kaliyuga (the iron age), on account of the country being under rulers who are said to have usurped the sovereignty of the land, who are foreign in language, manners, customs, religion, &c., whose avowed principle is that all castes are equal and in whose régime cows are killed every day, and on account of the stepping in of English education which has supplanted the study of the Vedas and which has, by its all-pervading, liberalising, inquisitive and enlightening tendencies, explained several phenomena which were once supposed to be beyond the pale of human knowledge, divested some of the objects, such as the sun, the moon, &c., of their divine character, and brought about much slackness in religious faith and neglect in the observance of old practices, and requests that Shankarácharya may be pleased to take early steps to prevent the Vedic religion from losing a hold on the mind of the Hindus and to sanction such modifications therein as will make it respected and followed without reluctance.

Approval of the notification issued by the Collector of Kaira under the Land Improvement Act and a request to him in the matter.

21. The Kaira Vartamán (109), in its issue of the 29th July, is glad that Mr. H. R. Cooke, Collector, Kaira District, has notified that Government will advance loans at a reasonable rate of interest to cultivators in his district under the Land Improvement Act, and that he has asked the various Mámlatdárs to explain fully the object of the notification to the agriculturists of the different villages under them in order that the cultivators may take full benefit of the measure. The paper requests Mr. Cooke to give every facility to the cultivators, accepting their lands as security for the advance. The Vartamán adds that if after the notification no money were lent to the cultivators it would be a breach of faith on the part of Government and the poor cultivators would be ruined.

An assault by a European Constable at the Poona Cantonment.

22. In the issue of the Kesari (43), dated the 4th August, one Pándurang Daulatráo Gunavare complains that while he was passing on the 3rd idem at about 12-30 P.M. by the office of the Cantonment Magistrate, Poona, a European Constable named Jucks gave him a push with a strong stick on the plea that Pándurang had intentionally trodden on his foot, and that on his being asked rather loudly why he did so he caused the complainant to be taken by a Police Náik to the police station of the Cantonment Chief Constable and there knocked him down with a violent kick, abused and belaboured him with blows, told the clerk at the station to take down his name, and drove him away after telling all the men present there to keep a strict eye over him. The complainant adds that this assault was made in the presence of Native policemen named Hari Páthére, Bábáji Shipái, Bháu Khadále, Israel Jamádár and one Bráhman Náik, and prays for redress. Below the complaint the editor of the paper makes a footnote to the effect that if the complaint be well founded it is a disgrace to the police and deserves to be enquired into by the higher authorities.

A request to the Bombay Police to trace out persons of bad character residing in the Grant Road locality, Bombay.

23. In alluding to the case of Harya Govind and several other bad characters, which recently came before Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, the Pársi Tikákár (116), in its issue of the 1st August, regrets that the Bombay Police could not trace out these badmáshes till they were discovered quarrelling among themselves about the division of their spoil, and observes that the Grant Road locality is much infested with these pests and that at night it is dangerous for respectable people to pass on that road. The Tikákár continues that the locality has been a favourite resort of badmáshes owing to the vicinity of several worthless theatres, liquor-shops and coffee-houses, and requests the authorities to bring the badmáshes to book and to restore order.

Death of Sir Henry Morland regretted.

24. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—Captain Sir Henry Morland is no more, and Bombay feels the loss very keenly. A man of impressive personality, marked tenacity of purpose and conspicuous abilities, Sir Henry was destined to be a prominent figure in any society in which he cast his lot. Apart from the services he rendered to the State as a naval officer, his talent for organization and grasping the details of business helped him to make a very useful member of the local Municipal Corporation. It was but fit, therefore, for that body to place on record its sense of loss by his sad demise and its appreciation of his personal exertions for enhancing the usefulness of the municipality. He brought always independent judgment and good sense to bear on municipal discussions. Truly does Mr. Acworth, therefore, remark that his removal from the Council was a deduction from the power of the Corporation and the Standing Committee in dealing with public affairs. Allied to these many qualities of mind were his suavity of manner and lively sympathy, and especially in the free exchange of social amenities with the Natives may be said to lie the secret of the esteem and regard in which he was held by his colleagues. But of all, to Lady Morland the loss is, indeed, very heavy, and we join others in the sincere expression of condolence and sympathy for her in this sad bereavement. [Many other papers of the week express similar sentiments.]

PART II.—Legislation.

Condemnation of Sir Raymond West's conduct in connection with the prime movers' inspection section in the Boiler Inspection Bill.

25. After regretfully alluding to the denial by the Mill-owners' Association of their having in their memorial anent the Boiler Inspection Bill stated that an inspection of prime movers was necessary as asserted by Sir Raymond West, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 3rd August, says:—The public have been much disappointed at the change that has come on

Sir Raymond since his transfer from the Bombay High Court to the Executive Council. While he was on the High Court bench he had, both as a Judge and a savant, impressed the public with such high opinion of himself that at his transfer to the Council it was expected that he would prove of greater service to the public as a councillor to His Excellency. It is, however, to be noted with regret that this expectation has miscarried. The replies to public memorials drafted by him, or in which it is believed he had a hand, divulge principles that are inconsistent with the conduct of an impartial Judge, and his public writings and speeches disclose wilfulness and absence of that impartial weighing of justice between the interests of Government and those of the public which so much marked his career as a Judge. The public have, moreover, of late begun to believe that whenever Sir Raymond has to justify an improper act of Government he adopts the course of putting into the mouths of the opponents such words or sentiments as they never expressed. Sir Raymond West has thus taught the public a lesson that a final opinion about an Anglo-Indian should not be formed until he leaves these shores, because there is no telling when he might change his course.

26. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 8th August, says:—To punish the impertinent Mill-owners' Association for contradicting Sir Raymond West in regard to the necessity of inspection of prime movers, the latter has come forward to discard the report on the Bill submitted by the select committee under his own guidance. This conduct on his part raises the presumption that Sir Raymond has been the leading spirit of the several replies to public demands that have been issued of late by Government, attributing to the memorialists words or sentiments they never expressed or intimidating them. The public have already learnt that during the leadership of Sir Raymond under the administration of His Excellency Lord Harris little is to be expected in the shape of concessions, but the public ought not to care in the least for the tone of self-importance, arbitrariness and dogmatism adopted by Government. This conduct is sure to tell against Government itself in the long run.

27. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—

The objections of the Mill-owners' Association to the Boiler Inspection Bill and remarks thereon.

The Mill-owners' Association have acted wisely and promptly in emphasizing their objections to Section 37 of the Boiler Inspection Bill by their supplementary memorial of last week. It is to be hoped that the legislators will take a practical view of the grave objections urged therein against the retention of that section which, the reader need scarcely be reminded, refers to the periodical inspection of prime movers. The petition of the mill-owners is extremely logical and prays for a perfectly reasonable request. Either the section, which for all practical intents and purposes is utterly useless, should be omitted or the necessity or expediency of putting prime movers under examination should be proved by Government. The onus of the proof certainly lies on those who support the Bill. In a matter of this kind the majority of the legislators know next to nothing, though it is possible to conceive that the author of the Bill may consider himself quite competent to legislate on it just as he may consider himself competent to command the Channel Fleet or cook a cutlet. It would be preposterous for a body so unqualified to speak with authority on this matter, to defy the opinion of experts and force on users of steam power a measure which, it is a foregone conclusion, would be fraught with the utmost mischief. It is therefore to be hoped that wiser counsel will prevail at the third reading of the Bill, and that Government will see the propriety and justice of complying with the prayer of the Association.

Part III.—Education.

28. The Gujarati (83), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—

Appointments of the Bombay University examiners.

The Syndicate of the Bombay University have, in our opinion, committed a serious mistake at this juncture in allowing the advocates of improvement in the present system of conducting University examinations and selecting examiners an opportunity for renewing their cry for reform. Junior European barristers seem, as it were, to possess a prescriptive right to become examiners at the LL.B. Is it not a very strange thing that the Syndicate hardly finds Native barristers to examine candidates for this examination? If one of the old Calendars were consulted, it would be found that a senior High Court pleader and a senior barrister conducted the examination in byegone years. But now everything is changed. Every fresh barrister who comes from England has the first claim to become an examiner in the LL.B. or the District Pleaders' Examination, a Professor in the Government Law School, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court or the colleague of the Advocate-General in conducting criminal cases at the Sessions Court or the happy recipient of one of the many sinecure appointments in the High Court. This generous tendency to give a lift to English barristers, it be seen, is rapidly manifesting itself in all directions, and unless checked, it is likely to assert itself in many more directions. Another appointment of a Native examiner for the LL.B. is likely to be shortly challenged and we therefore refrain from commenting upon the nomination. There are some who think that if the Senate is to be moved on the subject, it would not be quite just to object to one appointment alone, however objectionable some people might think it. We do not think inexperienced barristers or mofussil pleaders are the fittest examiners for the LL.B., and if there is to be a protest, there should in justice be a protest all round.

Remarks on the appointment of a non-University gentleman as an examiner for the coming LL.B. Examination of the Bombay University.

29. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 3rd August, writes:—The University is the last place where jobs of any kind should occur. But a recent appointment to an examinership greatly shakes one's faith in the judgment of the University authorities. They have appointed a non-University man, a pleader from Surat, and one not much known to fame as a lawyer, to examine at the LL.B. Examination. It seems, indeed, very odd that the Syndicate should have gone so far afield as Surat to find an examiner for the LL.B., when several eligible High Court Pleaders could be found to do the work, especially as their choice has fallen upon a gentleman by no means specially deserving of the honour. The University examinerships are already a matter for dissatisfaction, and if they have to be brought into contempt no surer way could be found than the present appointment.

30. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—We are not at all surprised to find that the appointment of Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái, a pleader of Surat, as one of the examiners for the ensuing LL.B. Examination of the Bombay University has given rise to a great deal of indignant criticism among those who take interest in University matters. We have heard of the appointment in question being spoken of as a job, and it is impossible to characterise it otherwise. Mr. Kálábhái's only qualification is that some years ago he passed the High Court Pleaders' Examination and has been practising for several years in the Surat District. But what on earth could have led the Syndicate to ignore the large number of more distinguished and cultured lawyers in Bombay, some of them LL.B.'s themselves, and to go in for a pleader in the mofussil, who can have no pretensions whatever to legal culture in the real sense of the term? The LL.B. Examination of the University is not an ordinary examination in law. It tests not merely a man's knowledge of law, but of the science of law, and it is little less than a scandal to appoint as one of its examiners a mofussil pleader. Such appointments are calculated to bring the examination into contempt and to lower its value. We are glad that some of the Fellows of the University have sent in a protest to the Syndicate and are determined to bring up the matter for discussion at an early meeting of the Senate. It is to be hoped that the Senate will refuse to sanction the appointment in question. Undoubtedly the Syndicate is primarily responsible for the selection of examiners, and the Senate ought not to interfere lightly with its discretion. But in the present instance there are reasonable grounds for supposing that the Syndicate has exercised its discretion in a grossly careless manner, and the dignity of the University no less than the important character of the LL.B. Examination requires that such an injudicious appointment as that of Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái of Surat should be vetoed.

Part IV.—Railways.

31. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 1st August, writes:—We have frequently brought to the notice of the railway authorities through the columns of our paper instances of harsh treatment the travelling public receive at the hands of railway subordinates. The third class passengers are chiefly the butt of the subordinates, and an illustration of the treatment received by a passenger only a few days ago at the Karáchi Cantonment station is given by a correspondent, who in a letter to this paper states that he was compelled to leave the compartment in which he was seated, only with a view to give him annoyance as desired by a "beardless boy." It behoves the district officer to take serious notice of this complaint and mitigate as much as possible the hardship and inconvenience experienced by passengers travelling on this railway. Some of the employés seem not to know what the word "civility" means, and some of them go to extremes and use indecent language. It appears to us strange that the compartment in which our correspondent was seated being not, on starting from the city station, considered necessary to be a "reserved" compartment, but only at the cantonment station where the passenger was required to shift out of it, the station master should have thought about the "reserved" board being put on to compel the passenger to move out. It is to be hoped that the district officer will not allow the conduct of the "beardless boys" to pass unnoticed.

Alleged misconduct of a servant of the North-Western Railway Company at the Karáchi Cantonment station towards a passenger of the third class.

Part V.—Municipalities.

32. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—Lord Salisbury has declared himself against the illiterate vote and in favour of female suffrage. Here in India we are not very deeply interested in these questions, except in connection with municipal and local board elections. Under the Acts governing these elections female suffrage is already allowed, and allowed, in one respect, with a vengeance. All persons paying income-tax are eligible as voters, and in some mofussil elections a strong posse of prostitutes paying income-tax has not seldom turned the scale. Government does not appear to be aware of the scandals caused by the extension of the franchise to the most degraded of the female sex. Respectable voters do not like to be in such company, and respectable candidates not seldom see themselves outvoted, because they do not condescend to dance attendance on the inmates of brothels or to curry favour with those who frequent these hot-beds of vice. Some nymphs of the pavé have been known to voluntarily apply for the insertion of their names in the income-tax list, in order to reap the advantages of voting at municipal elections and securing a cheap advertisement. May we ask the Government to put an end to this form of female suffrage? The rules regarding male suffrage are also similarly defective. The other day a witness in a curious civil case was asked as to the sources of his income and whether he paid income-tax, and the reply was that his income was derived from gambling and that the tax was assessed on that income. The gambler was, of course, a municipal voter. He admitted he had been once convicted of gambling and fined. He mixed with the lowest of the low and his chosen companions were thieves and whore-mongers. Nevertheless, he was in the enjoyment of the franchise. We think that males or females admittedly and notoriously vicious, or convicted of such criminal vices as gambling and adultery, should not be allowed to vote or to be voted for. We are not so far advanced as to put an end to the illiterate vote, but morality and decency demand that we should not encourage open vice by admitting the outlaws of society to the franchise. While on this subject of amending the Local Self-government Act, we may as well note that the experience of the last six years has conclusively proved the unwisdom of having enacted no provision against corruption in elections. If Government will send for reports on this subject from its district officers, we feel nearly sure that a vast amount of evidence will be forthcoming as to the nefarious means resorted to for influencing municipal voters. The evil is not so rampant in local board elections or in small municipalities, but in large municipalities bribery is not seldom resorted to, and it is high time, therefore, that some new clauses should be inserted, at least in the Municipal Act, to prevent such disgraceful conduct. As the law stands, the voters and the public cannot fail to perceive that bribery, wenching and gambling are in no way discounted or discountenanced by it; that at the election booth at least a flaunting whore may stand shoulder to shoulder with the most virtuous of her sex, a vile gambler and adulterer may reckon himself equal to the very best citizen, and a dishonest bought vote may be counted as good as an honest independent vote.

Disapproval of the payment of fees allowed to Surgeon-Major Nariman, Chairman of the Sanitary Committee, Surat Municipality.

33. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 2nd August, disapproves of the sanction given by the Surat Municipality on the 1st instant to the payment to Surgeon-Major Nariman of a fee of Rs. 30 per day for giving evidence in a certain case in a Civil Court on behalf of the Corporation, and says that the case was originated by the Sanitary Committee of which Dr. Nariman was chairman, and that his evidence was necessary as he had personally visited the spot in that capacity.

A request to Mr. Lely, President of the Surat Municipality, in connection with the bad condition of roads in that city.

34. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 30th July, complains that the condition of the roads at Surat is very wretched and that no one authorised in that behalf takes any care whatever to improve it, and requests Mr. Lely, President of the Municipality, to personally visit the different parts of the city in order to get a correct idea of the state of things with a view of remedying it.

Part VI.—Native States.

Comments on the resolution of the Government of India about newspapers published in quasi-British India.

35. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes:—The effects of the Government of India's resolution about newspapers published in quasi-British India will be very demoralizing. It is feared that both the Vernacular and the Anglo-Indian press of British India will suffer. It is also feared that it will help the degeneration of the political branch of the State service. There are fears that the Government of India itself will regret the day on which the resolution was issued. We see that the resolution has attracted public attention in England, and it is not quite improbable that it may soon form the subject of a debate in Parliament. We are sorry for the resolution, because it is one more act of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government which will lower the prestige of England in the eyes of the whole civilized world and will destroy the confidence of the public of the neutral territory in British justice and prowess. There are enough acts already for which Lord Lansdowne's administration stands condemned in the eyes of the British public and His Excellency need not have added this to his other difficulties. There is, we think, yet time to modify the resolution and make the orders consistent with the law that regulates such publications in British India. We are not at all opposed to healthy control. We do not fight for license. We admit that the intentions of Government may be really benevolent. Rulers of Native States do require to be protected from the mischief of those for whom the resolution is intended. But we fail to see how the resolution can give such protection. Permission to publish a newspaper might for some years to come be insisted upon in the case of such areas as the resolution refers to. Before giving permission the Agent to the Governor-General should make all necessary inquiries. But when permission is once granted it ought not to be within the power of the grantor to discontinue it. It is here that abuse of power is possible, and in the interests of personal liberty it is necessary that Government should provide reasonable safeguards. Let it be provided that before the proprietor of a paper can be asked to leave the territory bag and baggage, an opportunity shall be given him of showing that he did not make a bad use of his privilege. The political officer should submit his report and Government should obtain an explanation from the publisher, the ultimate decision resting with Government. The political officer will be the accuser and he ought not therefore to be the judge. As the orders at present stand they leave room for people to say that Lord Lansdowne is changing the fundamental principles of British rule. By passing the Official Secrets Act he showed that he did not trust the valuable staff of State servants; by passing the Consent Act he declared to the world that he was not prepared to put faith in his subjects; and by the recent resolution he wants to destroy the confidence which people have in the principle of personal liberty. His idea may be that of asserting the strength of Government, but in making that assertion he is only admitting the strength of the nation because he uses repressive measures. What he ought to show is moral strength, and not force. By his Manipur policy he has only spread a feeling of insecurity in the minds of Native Princes and by his recent resolution he has taken the surest means to keep the Native Princes ignorant of their shortcomings. So that in good time the Government of India may become possessed of facts, or what they may look upon as facts, and a repetition of the Malhárráo tragedy may not be an unlikely thing. This view of the matter is generally held, and strongly held too; because, as we are informed, the immediate causes of the resolution are the exposure of certain shortcomings alleged to exist in the administration at Indore. They say that the trial of the editor of the Eastern Herald afforded Mahárája Holkar the best opportunity of giving a lie to the scandals spread about him. If such a trial had not given them a lie these would have remained uncontradicted in the Secret Department, and nobody knows when or how they would have been used against the Mahárája. This view of the matter is further strengthened when we see that the resolution is not of the seeking of any Native State. It is a gift voluntary and gratis, given by an administration which has done much to shake public confidence, especially in regard to its policy about Native States.

What course should Native Princes follow?

36. In an article, headed, "What policy should be adopted by the Native States?" the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 3rd August, observes:—It is but natural that we should feel for the loss we have suffered in consequence of the annexation of several of our Native States to the British Empire, which was effected with a view to give stability to and extend British rule in India. It is, however, some consolation that the few Native States that have escaped the fate have, by contact with the British Government, learnt to manage their affairs in a fairly satisfactory manner and to follow the wholesome lesson set to them by that Government. The publication of administration reports by Native States is one of the good things they have learnt to do after the fashion of the British Government, though these reports do not always make unvarnished statements, but exhibit only the good points of the administration and withhold the dark side of the picture, as is said to be done in the various departmental reports of the British Government. Despite these drawbacks the system of publishing such reports is a laudable one and is fit to be readily accepted, as it has been, by the Native States. We have, however, to tell the Native Princes one thing, and it is that they should not follow the British policy in every respect. The English, though they are excellent rulers, are foreigners and have come over here only to earn money. The interest which they have in the welfare of their Indian subjects is not genuine, but is like that which a step-mother has in the well-being of her step-children for the sake of public opinion. They wish to promote the interests of the Indian subjects, but not at the sacrifice of their own. For a proof of this look at the administration reports of the different departments. The head of each department wishes to be able to show an increase in its income and in the net profit to Government every year. Even the Educational Department, which is really a charitable department, thinks that it must show an increase in the fee receipts and the schools to be paying to Government. This system tells hard on the poor subjects, leaving hardly any stuff in them and making them discontented. To a minute observer this result of the system even under the present régime is visible enough. Such a policy should not be adopted by our Native States. When the subjects of Native States are convinced of the fact that their Princes rule over them for their welfare and not for extorting money from them, then and then only a tie of affection will bind them to their Princes and they will be ready to hazard even their lives for their rulers. From the Administration Report of the Nizám's Government for the Faslí year 1298 we learn that the income of the Stamp Department has increased by half a lakh, but how the increase has been brought about we are unable to know. Surely, the system requiring stamp to every complaint in writing in order to secure a hearing and redress by British officers is very hard and cruel. We therefore caution our Native Princes not to follow the British policy in respect of increase of revenue in the different departments of A'bkári, Stamp, Forest, &c.

37. The Samsher Bahádur (119), in its issue of the 31st July, observes :—

Remarks on the appointments of Mahomedan Kárbháris at Pálanpur and Rádhanpur.

The present Mahomedan Kárbháris of the Pálanpur and Rádhanpur States were appointed at the suggestion of Major Nutt, the then Political Superintendent, Pálanpur, and we request Government to inquire into their management, because in appointing them the rights of the old Bania Kárbháris, who had a hereditary right, were overlooked, and if the new Kárbháris have not been able to do substantial good, it is no use keeping them in service any longer and saddling the States with the salaries of both the new and the old Kárbháris. [The Ahmedabad Times (91), in its issue of the 5th August, expresses similar sentiments and adds :—The States of Pálanpur and Rádhanpur were managed for a long time by Bania Kárbháris and it was not fair to have removed them. If the Political Superintendent desired that some new buildings should be erected and new roads made according to English ways, these Bania Kárbháris would do it. Banias are best fitted for the posts of Kárbháris ; next come Nágars, but Mahomedans are certainly unfitted for the work. But the old times have now changed and good administration consists in pleasing European officers only.]

38. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 2nd August, writes :—

Imposition of a panchari tax on the pinjrapol cattle by the State at Porbandar and the consequent displeasure of the people.

Animal hospitals, or pinjrapols as they are called, have been specially favoured by the Hindu Princes since the time of Emperor Asoka. Such being the case, we are much grieved to learn that the Porbandar authorities have offended the Mahájans by depriving the pinjrapol trustees of their right to graze their cattle free of charge in the pasture lands belonging to the State. When Mr. Lely, while in charge of the State, introduced the Forest Act of British India into it and imposed a tax called panchari on every head of cattle grazing in the State lands he exempted the pinjrapol cattle from its operation. But now under instructions from his superiors Mr. Shankar P. Pandit has issued a proclamation imposing panchari on the pinjrapol cattle. The Mahájans have objected to such a tax being levied on the cattle. But four horses belonging to the pinjrapol were attached and threatened to be sold by auction. The people struck work to mark their displeasure and the Political Agent, Káthiáwár, was requested by telegraph to countermand the order of the Administrator. The Bombay trustees of the Porbandar pinjrapol have shown their resentment in a resolution passed at one of their meetings and intend taking further steps if the Káthiáwár authorities do not give a satisfactory reply to the request of the Mahájans. Before passing any remarks we shall wait to know the reply. But we may say that the vested interests of charitable institutions ought to be the first care of the British authorities when they administer a Native State. [The Nydyadarshak (115) and the Ahmedabad Times (91), in their issues of the 3rd and 5th August, respectively, express similar sentiments.]

Rendition of Berár wished for.

The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 3rd August, writes :—A chance thought occurs to our mind that we are subjects of the Hyderabad State. His Highness the Nizám has given us, with everything that belongs to us, over to the entire care and trust of the paramount British Sovereign. The question springs up whether we shall ever revert to our old position as subjects of that State. The late Sir Salar Jang had opened the subject of the rendition of Berár some ten years ago, but then it was declared by the Secretary of State for India in the House of Parliament that until His Highness the Nizám should come of age the matter should remain undecided. The time has come already and it is for the British Government to prove itself worthy of the time. But it appears that nothing is said or done in regard to this important point. We do not know how many years will elapse before some decisive measure is taken. The death of that able and distinguished statesman was a death-blow to the topics of political interest of that State. His loss is most urgently felt in this subject. It was he who first mooted the point, but he had to remain silent till his master the Nizám could ascend the gádi. It is nearly forty years that Berár has been under the British Government. The province has wonderfully progressed in all its departments. The administration of justice has been grounded on a firm footing of high and noble principles with an able and efficient staff at the head. The land system has been thoroughly revised on an impartial survey of the land, with a regular and graded assessment of rents. Local self-government has been extended to municipal institutions. Education has advanced with rapid strides. Commerce with the extension of railway communication has been greatly facilitated. Political life, too, is not without its activity and the Indian National Congress movement has found strong champions in Berár. In short, this province will testify to the intrinsic good which British rule has conferred in such a short time as the duration of one generation. If this province be at all restored to its original ruler it is sure to stand as a pattern of good government to the rest of the Nizám's dominions. We more or less wish for the rendition of Berár, because we have in our ideal the notion of raising this first class State in India in its grandeur and of presenting to the world abroad the blessings which the British Government has bestowed upon our province. The institutions which are English in their origin will continue to thrive and will set an example to the Nizám. We reserve further remarks for a future issue and call upon those who can move in the matter to enlighten the public of the province with their views on this point, which is of deep interest and general concern.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

British rule in India as it is.

1. In giving a rough translation of a communication by Mr. Charu Chandra Mitra, B.A., of Calcutta, published in the July number of India on the "British rule in India as it is," in which the condition of the people of India is described as being, on the whole, worse under the British régime than under the Mogal or Marátha rule, the Vijaya (74), in its issue of the 7th August, exhorts Government to keep the people of the country contented if they want to rule over them for a long time.

The policy of the Russian Government compared with that of the British.

2. The Sind Sudkár (160), in its issue of the 8th August, writes:—The relations between the Russian and the English Governments are always complicated. The policy of the English Government is to secure peace and alliance, while the Russian Government places no confidence in friendship. Only lately, when the Crown Prince of Russia visited India, he was received very courteously by the officers as well as the subjects of the British Government. But the Russian Government shows no appreciation of these things. On the contrary, its unbecoming designs are growing stronger day by day, and the danger of a war between England and Russia about India is increasing daily. Uncivilized Russia is engaged in constructing railways and telegraphs and in extending its territory. By this means it is coming nearer and nearer to India. The English Government is also endeavouring to fortify its frontier. We are thankful to God for His having placed the crown of India on the head of the English Sovereign. Under no former rulers was the country so free from foreign invasions as it is at present. Everything is regulated by laws and rules. The strong cannot oppress the weak. Murders and robberies are not committed to that extent to which they were committed in old times. People enjoy comforts of which they could not even have dreamt. Although all the conveniences which the British Government have provided for us have been effected with the money of the people, the subjects should be thankful to and co-operate with the Government. The English Government should also try to win the good-will and confidence of the people.

The introduction of the Indian Budget for 1891-92 in Parliament late in the season, and the remarks of the Under Secretary of State for India at the debate over the budget.

3. The Arunodaya (20), in its issue of the 9th August, blames the Secretary of State for India for introducing the Indian Budget in Parliament at a time when there were few members present and when the session was about to close, and calls it a downright falsehood that Sir John Gorst should have represented during the Indian Budget debate the country to be in a prosperous condition and free from any signs of famine when weekly weather reports from Madras were regularly sent to him and when they distinctly showed that the agriculturists and their cattle were dying for want of food and fodder and that the danger of impending famine was imminent.

Comments on Sir John Gorst's speech on the Indian Budget in the House of Commons.

4. The Mukritta (5), in its issue of the 9th August, writes:—Turning to the Budget statement of Sir John Gorst, we are glad to learn that the financial prospects have so far improved as to lead Government to estimate the surplus at Rs. 3,90,000. But we cannot join the Under Secretary in his self-gratulating mood in connection with the threatening famine. The danger of famine has not entirely passed away, at least in Madras and the North-Western Provinces, as he has deluded himself into supposing. The reports from these provinces are as alarming as ever. The distress in Madras is very great and the dreadful monster is still threatening a part of the North-Western Provinces. The utterances of Sir John Gorst remind us of the story of the Rája who believed that in a famine-stricken state the people should maintain themselves on rice and milk if they could not get bread. But the subject is too grim to joke about. In making the remark above referred to Sir John Gorst has shown the most culpable indifference to the well-being of Her Majesty's subjects in India, whose interests he is paid specially to watch.

5. The Gujarâti (83), in its issue of the 9th August, writes :—The solemn farce of introducing the Indian Budget at the fag end of the session has again been re-enacted this year as usual in a vacant House. If we are to believe Sir John Gorst the Superbus, who is ever happy in his optimism, the financial outlook in India is as promising and satisfactory as it is possible to be. When in Southern India cattle are dying by hundreds and famine is staring people in the face, nothing could have been more cruel on his part than his statement that all danger of famine has now passed away. But that is only a fresh illustration of the reckless cynicism of the modern Tarquinius. One is almost overwhelmed with the melancholy thought that Mr. Bradlaugh is no longer to raise his powerful voice on behalf of poor India. The discussion, therefore, of the whole subject of Indian finance was more than a disgustingly tame affair. But our Lancashire philanthropists had their spokesman in Parliament, who, like Mr. Holt-Hallet, knows next to nothing of this country and yet would like to hamper its mill industry. Sir George Campbell did well in declaring that there were no abominations in Indian factories as alleged by the interested mill-owners of Lancashire, and that these, at any rate, were not the proper persons to deal with them. This was, indeed, a merited rebuke. Mr. Maclean's motion is a little too vague, as cabled to India. It is, however, plain that his advice to extend the frontier railway to Kandahar is fraught with mischief and was rightly rejected. Any forward move on the part of the Indian Government is being promptly met by a counter-move on the part of Russia in Central Asia, and we are strongly convinced that if ever Russia seriously thinks of attacking India, it would be because of the mischievous movements of our Government on the frontier. Mr. Samuel Smith had given notice of an important motion bearing on the reform of the Indian Legislative Councils; but, as fate would have it, it was dropped on account of some technical objection to its being discussed. We are thankful to Mr. Smith for the increased interest he is taking in Indian affairs, but it is noteworthy that Mr. Bradlaugh never allowed himself to be thus over-reached by Sir John Gorst through his own negligence on such important occasions. The Queen's speech on the prorogation of Parliament is, of course, silent about India, though even Russia is loudly proclaiming to the world that but for India England would look small in the gallery of mighty nations. Poor India, thou art nowhere!

6. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 10th August, writes :—In spite of all promises to bring on the Indian Budget at an earlier date it was driven quite to the end of the session, and the usual lifeless debate followed. The improvement in the rules of procedure, permitting the discussion of other subjects than the Budget on a motion by any member that the speaker do leave the chair, had raised expectations of a general Indian debate, but as events proved it was a very tame affair after all. Sir John Gorst made a most roseate speech about the prosperity of the Indian finances. The estimated surplus stands at Rs. 3,96,010. The receipts show an improvement all round except opium. The expenditure, too, is increasing. But, on the whole, the position is pronounced to be prosperous and hopeful. This complaisant and cheerful view is strangely at variance with facts. Sir John Gorst says the fear of a famine has ceased. Famine may have ceased in Downing Street or in Parliament House. In fact, it never reaches there. But in India it is a living reality. In Madras and the North-Western Provinces famine is rampant, and there are relief operations in full swing. A minister who shows such gross ignorance of facts on such a vital point, and gives the British public an entirely erroneous idea of India's condition, commits, in our view, a breach of duty. The figures of receipts during the last four months may have been high, but in the rest of the year there is no guarantee that they will be equally good. The indications are all the other way. In the event of a settled famine, of which there is a growing anxiety in two provinces, the receipts must fall off, and the expenditure on the other hand must increase. In other provinces, too, although there has been plentiful rain, it has been so untimely and so profuse in a short time that the prospect is not free from anxiety. In view of these circumstances the financial outlook is more gloomy than otherwise. Even if the revenues are abundant, that is not an unerring sign of prosperity of the people. The people may be starving or dying, and yet the Government demand may be exacted to the last pie, as was, in fact, done under Sir Richard Temple's administration during the last famine.

7. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 9th August, writes:—We do not quarrel with Sir John Gorst's view of India's financial condition, so much as with his startling assertion that the danger of famine has now ceased. Surely, the Under Secretary ought to have known better than that. In parts of Northern India and throughout the greater portion of Southern India there is now great scarcity, and the distress is acute and widespread. Cattle are dying off by hundreds for want of fodder. The situation must be very gloomy, indeed, when a sporting Governor like Lord Wenlock has had most reluctantly to forego the pleasure of bringing out a cricket team to try conclusions with that of his brother sportsman in Poona. It is not only that the distress is great and widespread, but no change in the weather can now effect much improvement in the regions which have suffered from the drought. The flippant statement of Sir John Gorst will create an impression which may prove mischievous in its effect. The machinery of Government moves very slowly, and should circumstances call for the immediate sanction of the Secretary of State to large measures of relief, it will, perhaps, be some time before he and his slow-going advisers at the India Office can divest themselves of the notion that all was well in India. Even if this dilatoriness were no more than a mere possibility, we cannot but condemn the failure of a responsible officer of Government to realize the gravity of the situation and to keep the mind in readiness for eventualities. We agree with the Bombay Gazette that this ill-considered assertion of the Under Secretary of State is even more reprehensible than his cynical reference to Tarquinius Superbus and the tall poppies.

8. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 9th August, writes:—

Circulation by the Government of India of the speeches of the Native members of the Supreme Council in reference to the Age of Consent Bill.

The Government of India at their own expense are circulating abroad the speeches of the Native members of the Supreme Council in reference to the Age of Consent Bill. We do not know what benefit their circulation is expected to bring. At the most they will place before their readers individual opinions and nothing beyond. If the circulation be expected to make the Act popular, Government are much mistaken in their calculation. The inutility of the enactment was proved even before it was passed, and if further proof be necessary, the Government have to look only to the proceedings of the two cases, one in Rangoon and the other in Bengal.

9. The Surya Prakásh (90), in its issue of the 8th August, writes:—It is said that the Panjáb Government proposes circulating pamphlets in English and the vernacular containing the principal speeches made in the Supreme Legislative Council in connection with the Age of Consent Bill, amongst the Native population of the province. No doubt, the circulation of these pamphlets, especially in the vernacular, will fully explain the aims and objects of the new Act to the Panjábi population and will remove any misunderstanding as regards the working of the Act which may have been instilled in the minds of the ignorant people. The Bengal and Bombay populations had taken more serious and active part in opposing the Bill than the population of the Panjáb. It is, therefore, highly desirable that the Governments of the former provinces should also acquaint the ignorant masses with the noble intentions of the Act in the same way as the Panjáb Government proposes.

Circulation of the principal speeches in the Supreme Legislative Council in connection with the Age of Consent Bill by the Panjáb Government.

10. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 15th August, says:—

Alleged exhibition of angry feelings by Government towards the Natives.

It is a misfortune to the natives of India, a majority of whom are illiterate and poor, that their powerful Government should get angry with them and should show signs of anger. This state of things is disadvantageous to the rulers as well as the ruled. The criminal prosecution commenced against the Bangabasi newspaper and that attempted against the Indian Mirror by the Government of Bengal bear witness to that Government being displeased with the people. The statement made by the Pioneer that well-known Barristers-at-law have expressed their opinion that they are doubtful as to whether the prosecution commenced against the Bangabasi will succeed, and the hurry and bustle made in connection with the attempted criminal prosecution of the Indian Mirror, prove that the Bengal Government is much disturbed and has lost its temper. Instead of taking these steps it would have been better if it had given an expression to its sentiments and a hint to the people as to how they should act in future. It is also to be regretted that when the Calcutta High Court decided that the Indian Mirror was not guilty of contempt of Court the editor of that paper should have been called upon to give a guarantee not to make any comments on the Bangabasi case until its conclusion. Under the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris, whenever the people of this presidency have approached it in connection with matters beneficial to them, they have been either openly or silently treated with scorn. The application of the Indian branch of the Temperance Association against the undue restraints placed on toddy, the memorial against the proposed appointment of Mr. Webb as one of the Presidency Magistrates, the petition of the Native cricketers against the use of the Esplanade by the polo-players, the memorial in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, the representation made by the Mill-owners' Association against the clause for the examination of prime movers in the Boiler Inspection Bill—all these have met with scornful replies. Thus Lord Harris' administration has sadly disappointed the public. The Government of the North-West Provinces has, in discanting upon the defects of local self-government within its jurisdiction, condemned the educated and other Natives taking an active interest in public matters as a set of untruthful men.

Remarks on the administration of His Excellency Lord Harris, Governor of Bombay.

11. The Samsher Bahádur (119), in its issue of the 7th August, observes :—If the régime of Lord Reay had not been partly occupied with the Wilson and the Crawford cases and the discussion of several intricate questions of administration it would have resulted in more good to the people of this presidency. They were, however, glad that he left a clear atmosphere to His Excellency Lord Harris, and were in expectation of much good accruing from the latter's administration. But they are disappointed to find him occupied with cricket and other sports. They would not, certainly, grudge if His Excellency devoted a reasonable part of his time to physical exercise. They are much grieved to find that he allows himself to be led away by some Anglo-Indians. The replies of the Government to several recent public memorials have shown what its policy is, and have caused a wide discontent amongst the people, who are anxious to know the real motive of the persistent scornful treatment of the Natives. They do not know whether His Excellency wants thereby to show that he is not a mild Governor like Lord Reay and that his Government is desirous of taking revenge upon the Natives for having ruined Messrs. Wilson and Crawford. We think Lord Harris has been giving disappointing replies to public memorials, so that the Natives may not be encouraged to ask new concessions. The protest of the Pársis against Mr. Ommanney's note in the Crawford case has been probably avenged in the sharp reply they received to their memorial anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy case. This is surely a regrettable state of things and we would advise His Excellency the Governor to use his own judgment in important matters, to take the Natives into his confidence, and to acquaint himself personally with their real condition. Governors have mainly to rely on the advice of their Councillors, but, unfortunately, Sir Raymond West, who has greatly changed for the worse since his elevation to the Executive Council and has become a politician, has proved a failure as a Councillor. His predecessors in office, the late Honourable Mr. Gibbs and Sir M. Melvill, who had been similarly raised from the Bench to the Council, acquitted themselves very creditably, and the Natives eagerly await the retirement of Sir R. West.—The same paper in another place regrets that the Bombay Government should have latterly ignored the opinions of the vernacular newspapers including those published in Bombay, some of which are well-conducted, being edited by able and respectable gentlemen who are held in high esteem even by Government, and that it should be misguided by the two Anglo-Indian papers of Bombay. The Samsher adds that probably His Excellency Lord Harris is unaware that the Anglo-Indian papers do not represent the views of the Natives and put forward those of some of the European officers of Government.

12. In alluding to the report of the Madras eleven playing cricket with the Ganeshkhind eleven, captained by His Excellency Lord Harris, at Ganeshkhind, on Saturday the 15th instant, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 15th August, says:—The public wish less attention were devoted by His Lordship in future to sports, and more would be given to important matters of the administration and satisfying the people. His Lordship is new in this country and has not performed any work worth recording, and hence his devotion to sports has become distasteful to the public.

13. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 9th August, observes:—A firm under the name of "West, Lee-Warner & Co." has recently been started in Bombay with a view to threaten people and foist on them unsolicited and unpleasant things. It has succeeded very well in these objects with the local municipality, upon which it has thrown the burden of the maintenance of the city police. This company has also fathered approval of the Boiler Inspection Bill upon the Mill-owners' Association though the latter body did not approve of all the sections. It attributed inconsistency to the Presidency Association in connection with the Webb memorial, but the Association was expeditious enough to give a prompt reply repudiating the charge. The principal tactics of this company consist in misrepresentation and putting a false interpretation upon things, as was shown in connection with the reply to the Rájábái Tower tragedy memorial. But what is the motive of all this? Does it mean to keep the 'niggers' quiet and in perpetual terror? If so, the motive is, no doubt, very laudable! But still we would recommend the 'niggers' to gird up their loins and fight out their contentions to the bitter end, no matter if they fail in combating successfully with this company.

An attack on the Honourable Sir Raymond West and Mr. Lee-Warner.

14. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 10th August, advises the Indian National Congress to take into its own hands, as far as possible, the work of educating Indian children by opening schools in which, along with other subjects, instruction should be given in political economy as applicable to Indian matters, and the fact of the disappearance of enterprise and national industries among the people of India should be vividly impressed upon the minds of the pupils, and they should be taught the natural rights of man, how they have been lost by the people of India under the present circumstances, and the means of recovering them, they being distinctly given to understand that although philosophically or according to the doctrine of universal love it is just the same whether administrative posts in the country are in the hands of the Natives or foreigners, or whether the revenues of India are in the Indian or English treasury, the case is otherwise in practical or everyday life. The work of giving this instruction, says the paper, is very delicate and must be done with great care and circumspection, not merely by precepts but by examples as well.

Advice to the Indian National Congress.

15. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 10th August, has a paragraph headed "Oppression of the Income-tax," in which it complains of arbitrary and malicious assessment of the income-tax by ignorant subordinates and of the indifference of the appellate authorities to the appeals of the tax-payers, and says that while the agriculturists are shedding tears on account of unprecedented oppression by the Forest Department, the trading communities are weeping on account of the tyranny of the taxing officers, giving thereby rise to ominous outcries all round under the régime of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress. With a view to remedy this state of things, the paper advises the people to rely on themselves and never to cease exerting themselves to the utmost for obtaining redress of their hardships by submitting memorials to Parliament, saying that as the Indian Government overlooks the conduct of its subordinates there is no other alternative.

Alleged oppression of the income-tax.

16. The Sind Sudhár (160), in its issue of the 8th August, writes:—About twelve years ago it was brought to the notice of the Government of India that owing to the sudden death of some subordinate officials of Government their families were reduced to property. The Government of India being struck with compassion thought of devising a plan which might prevent similar hardships in future. With this object in view, the Government of India proposed that one anna per rupee should be deducted from the pay of every Government servant and that the sum thus accumulated should be given to the heirs of the servant after his death, or to him during his lifetime only in cases of urgent necessity. The Government also proposed to add bonuses to these deposits. This proposal was forwarded to the local officers for opinion. It appears that they did not approve of it and hence it was dropped. Now we beg to bring to the notice of the Government of India that the families of several Government servants are in distressed circumstances for want of a provision of the above nature. The Government of India should cast an eye of pity on the circumstances of poor families without means of support. If the Government cannot afford to add bonuses to these deposits, it will still be a great boon to the poor families if something is deposited for them by deductions from the pay of the Government employés.

A request to the Government of India to make provision for the families of the Government officials after their sudden death.

17. The Vijaya (74), in its issue of the 7th August, speaks of Mr. Satyendranáth Tagore, District Judge of Sholápur-Bijápur, as a very patient and popular Judge, and says that if he had not been superseded by several junior officers he should have been by this time a High Court Judge. The recommendation made by the Pioneer for his appointment to the Executive Council of the Governor cannot, says the paper, be serious, since there is no chance of the recommendation being accepted as the Secretary of State for India considers the Natives to be of very little account and the Government of India has not at its head a gentleman of Lord Ripon's wide sympathies for the natives of the country.

Mr. Satyendranáth Tagore, District Judge, Sholápur-Bijápur.

18. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 10th August, writes:—Our contemporary of the Rást Goftár differs from us as regards the fitness of Mr. Van der Straaten for the post of the Fifth Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court. Our contemporary extols his ability and talents, which he displayed in organizing the Sheriff's office and the Registrar's office in the Small Causes Court. We have never questioned that ability, but we say that the talents which make a man an excellent head clerk are not enough to make him a good Judge. Our contemporary speaks of Mr. Ván der Straaten's reputation in "official and judicial circles" and his "great knowledge and experience of law and procedure of the Courts of Justice." Our contemporary has, perhaps, more information than we have, but, as far as we know, Mr. Van der Straaten does not possess any of the qualifications which are commonly accepted as tests of legal knowledge, namely, being a Barrister, an Advocate, an Attorney, or a Pleader of the High Court. If he has any qualifications irrespective of these tests we are not aware, but we doubt whether Government would be right in recognizing them, when there is abundant scope to make a choice out of qualified men. We are not particular whether a Native or a European is appointed. All that we insist upon is fitness for the post; and, as we have already observed, service as clerk in an attorney's office or as Deputy Sheriff, or, for that matter, as Registrar, is not in our judgment enough qualification for a Judgeship. If Mr. Van der Straaten deserves promotion he may get it in his own line. He may, for instance, be made one day Prothonotary of the High Court on a salary of Rs. 2,000 when Mr. Orr retires, but a Judge's post is surely not the right promotion for a Clerk of the Court. We have often noticed a tendency in Government appointments to make convenience of the service by appointing a Clerk of the Court in place of the presiding Judge or Magistrate. It is against this tendency that we want to protest as a matter of principle.

The Rást Goftár's opinion as to the fitness of Mr. Van der Straaten for the post of the Fifth Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay, impugned.

19. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 8th August, writes :—We understand that a petition on behalf of the Hindu communities of Kandiaro, Naushahro, and Moro has been presented to Mr. A. F. Woodburn, the Collector of Hyderabad, complaining of the conduct of Khán Bahádur Kádirdád Khán in showing favour to the Mahomedans in the said táluka and his general behaviour to and treatment of the Hindus, causing them much annoyance and loss, and asking that an enquiry may be made respecting the truth of the several allegations set forth in the petition. This petition has been supported by the affidavit of three Hindu gentlemen and gives the names of 85 persons whom they wish to call as witnesses in support of the statements in the petition. The affidavit states "that the contents of the application have been read over to us and that the facts stated therein are true to the best of our knowledge and information, and the allegations made therein are bonâ fide and are not made from any malicious motive, and that we are prepared to prove the same by oral and documentary evidence and by the inspection of certain localities." Here follows a list of witnesses, and, lastly, "we pray that the said witnesses may be summoned and an opportunity granted us of proving what is stated in the petition." The petition, which we publish elsewhere, was forwarded through Mr. Leggett. It is very lengthy and complains of many distinct acts of alleged oppression and injustice on the part of Khán Bahádur Kádirdád Khán. We are not in a position to say whether these alleged grievances really exist or not, but from the circumstance of a petition of this nature being addressed to the Collector of Hyderabad, backed up by an affidavit with an earnest and straightforward appeal for an enquiry to be held as to the truth or otherwise of the serious allegations brought against Mr. Kádirdád Khán and the number of witnesses named, the conclusion is irresistible that the Hindu communities of Kandiaro, Naushahro and Moro are dissatisfied with that officer's administration of these tálukas of which he has been in charge for about seven years, which fact alone may suggest the advisability of a change being made. We trust the authorities appealed to will not refuse the enquiry which is now solicited, the result of which we shall anxiously await.

Suggestion regarding the petition of the Hindus to the Collector of Hyderabad complaining against the conduct of Khán Bahádur Kádirdád Khán, Deputy Collector, Hyderabad.

20. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 9th August, writes :—The Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine is certain to prove a valuable accession to the strength of the Bombay High Court. His Lordship's patience and assiduity, his anxious desire to deal justly by all, and intense love of constitutional principles and his positive aversion to anything like high-handed procedure on the part of the subordinate magistracy, cannot fail to exercise a restraining and sobering influence on the criminal administration of this presidency. One of the most disastrous tendencies produced by the union of the judicial and executive functions in the subordinate magistracy, is to act upon its own common-sense view of things and considerations of expediency. The combination of the two functions in one and the same officer is, besides, fatal to the growth of that judicial and calm temperament which is so absolutely essential in the administration of criminal law. Ponderous volumes of High Court reports are not of special value in some of the lower Courts. Criminal rulings of the High Court are the learned puzzles woven by learned Judges, writing at their ease. A feeling akin to this is not rare in some mofussil Courts. A careful examination of the judgments of the First Class and District Magistrates will disclose how judicial work can be conducted with the help of that divine light with which every one is blessed. Executive work is growing so rapidly that we believe that alone would absorb the whole time of Collectors, Assistant Collectors and Mámlatdárs, if it were to be thoroughly done. Judicial work imposes a serious burden and has, besides, to be done with due regard to the principles of the Indian Codes. This means care and trouble and delay in one business or another. So in some Courts the presence of pleaders is not specially welcome. Hearing both sides takes time. Acting upon one's own sense of what is right and legal is easier and less troublesome. Something of this spirit is gradually growing, and as a check to this increasing tendency it is well that the High Court should keep a vigilant eye upon the magistracy in the mofussil. That this function is being most satisfactorily performed by the Honourable Mr. Justice Jardine is plain from the careful and learned judgments in which His Lordship has revised the high-handed or erroneous proceedings in some recent cases. We recently dwelt upon the astounding disregard shown by a Cantonment Magistrate of the most rudimentary principles of criminal jurisprudence. We also commented upon the harshness with which a poor woman was punished in a vaccination case. Quite recently the High Court has very usefully revised the proceedings in certain cases in which the punishments seemed to be more or less inadequate in view of the gravity of the offences of the prisoners. That the High Court should of its own accord have called for the records in these cases strongly corroborates our view that District Magistrates have not sufficient time to perform the work of general superintendence partially entrusted to them by the Legislature.—Then the paper refers to the judgment of Mr. Justice Jardine on a case decided by Mr. Lucas, First Class Magistrate, Khándesh, and concludes as follows:—The concluding portion of His Lordship's observation strengthens our opinion based on experience that bulky High Court reports and subtle rulings are not of special importance in the mofussil. There is that unfortunate tendency to decide matters offhand, and there is no hope of radical improvement, despite the beneficial interventions of the High Court, unless the judicial and executive functions are completely separated. [The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 9th August, expresses similar sentiments; while the Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 13th instant, observes that mere censure is not sufficient in the case of an officer committing same error more than once, and recommends the High Court to order such officers to pay some compensation to the aggrieved party.]

Criminal administration in the mofussil and remarks thereon.

21. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 11th August, disapproves of the criminal prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper by the Government of Bengal for seditious writing as being undignified to British Government, and says that the British rule in India not being based on so weak and slippery a foundation as to be shaken by the carpings of an insignificant newspaper like the Bangabasi and the punishment of one newspaper-writer being of very little avail in either preventing people from complaining of the shortcomings of the British rule or altering the favourable views of the people regarding its goodness, Government was ill advised to take the trouble of prosecuting the newspaper, and that it is better that Government should gag the whole Native press than harass it for its slightly strong writings here and there by calling the provisions of the Indian Penal Code into requisition.

The prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper by the Government of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal disapproved.

22. The Dnyán Prakásh (13) of the 13th August also disapproves of the action taken by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in prosecuting the Bangabasi, and says that though the foreign British Government is productive of some happiness to the subject people in some matters, no man can justly say that it never gives rise to their misery, and that in this state of things it is quite unbecoming to shrewd and wise statesmen that they should not overlook writings more or less strong anent such exciting subjects as the Age of Consent Act and Manipur affairs, and allow agitated public opinion, if it be wrong, to get cool and correct itself in course of time.

23. In noticing the telegram communicating the criminal prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper of Calcutta for the publication of seditious articles, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 10th August, says:—Some of the charges brought against this paper, as described in the telegram, do not appear to be unusual with rabid vernacular journalism and worthy of serious consideration. Considering the position of the writers of such rabid effusions, it sometimes becomes a difficult task to admit the necessity of taking them into serious consideration. It is true that there arises a fear of bad effects being produced by such worthless writings, but so long as there exists genuine and honest journalism to counteract any prejudicial effects likely to be produced by them, the Governments of none of the civilized countries care for them in the least. Even in the far advanced countries of England and America there exists seditious journalism, whose libellous and treasonable writings are not even dreamt of by the rabid portion of the press in India; but the respectable section of the press frustrates their evil results and the Governments of those countries conduct the administration in such a way as to deprive the rabid attacks made on them of all venom. The discerning portion of the public in India desire that similar conduct should be adopted in regard to rabid writings of the nature that have appeared in the Bangabasi newspaper and other journals of its kind, and are much perplexed at the criminal proceedings adopted against the Bangabasi. This puzzle is solved to some extent by the supposition that in addition to their rabid writings the other conduct of the persons connected with this journal was of such a nature as to have led the authorities to resort to law, because much speed was made in obtaining warrants for search of the newspaper office and securing some of the papers found in it. The objectionable writings are said to have appeared in the issues of the Bangabasi of March last and subsequent dates, and the commencement of the prosecution has been made at a time when Parliament is not sitting in sessions. [The Jáme Jamshed (86) of the 11th August expresses sentiments to the above effect.]

24. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 11th August, is glad to find that the Times of India of the same date expresses sentiments similar to the above, and observes:—The Pioneer states that the best legal authorities are divided in opinion as to the provisions of the Indian Penal Code being effective law for seditious libel, and the proceedings against the Bangabasi are merely of the nature of a test case. This statement shows that Government is not certain about the result of these proceedings. The question then arises, why have the proceedings been taken. The reply is that it is intended to pass a press gagging Act before the re-assembling of Parliament, after convincing the public that there is no workable law of seditious libel. Considering other acts of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration this supposition is not far-fetched.

25. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 13th August, writes:—If the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has grown so thin-skinned as to be roused into a passion by the insipid writings of the Bangabasi, we take it to be a good augury, not for the peace of the mind of Government, but for the surety that prompt attention will be drawn in future to popular wrongs even by the mild exhortations of the press, when formerly very strong writings fell flat on unwilling ears. Government has to lose, and the press to gain, in every way by the unusual step which the former has taken in directing criminal proceedings against the Bangabasi, and so we do not think Government has been well-advised in its action. The articles of the kind complained against by Government, which are no doubt senseless, do not seem uncommon in the Irish press and in England too. The larger section of the Indian press does not go to a wild extreme, and although if it went, the liberty would be excusable on account of a want of authentic information. The inflammatory character which it is sought to attach to the Bangabasi newspaper is difficult to prove, because it appears that the paper in question has discussed the stock grievances of the people in rather too strong a language and too ignorant a manner. Probably it is as a test case that the proceedings have been taken. It looks as if Government want to know whether the Indian papers can be taught a lesson even in the absence of a gagging Act which has been often contemplated, but shelved lest the English public opinion might be offended. The Consent Bill agitation has split up Bengal in such different camps that a large section of the Bengali press has gone into histerics and put baseless charges on Government and the reform party. The Bangabasi, representing the most orthodox opinion and opposing the Congress, has always been intemperate, and since the passing of the Act has lost its head altogether. Its present trouble is due to that. Sir Charles Elliot in a recent speech forewarned his subjects against the discontent caused by the passing of the Age of Consent Act, and we suppose that the Bangabasi as representing the most notorious opponent has been selected to set an example.

26. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 9th August, observes:—The Bangabasi prosecution has been the first of its kind in the history of the British Indian administration, and we think that Government have lowered themselves in public estimation by stooping to such a course. There is no fear whatever of such newspaper writings producing any bad influence on the Native mind, and they ought, therefore, to be left unnoticed. If, however, Government fear serious consequences from them, they ought to make the people contented, who are generally in favour of British administration, and if Government think of setting an example to other Native papers by their present action, they are sure to be disappointed.

27. The Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 13th August, observes:—From the policy adopted by the Government of India as regards the Kashmere and Manipur States, the frontiers, and some other matters, there seems to have been a revival of the old ways and means of Lord Lytton. Riots also broke out during the present régime at Benares, Calcutta, Gaya and some other places. While Lord Lytton introduced the Press gagging Act, Lord Lansdowne has passed the Official Secrets Act and has issued an objectionable circular regarding the publication of newspapers within the bounds of Political Residencies. But the recent prosecution of the Bangabasi under Section 124, which was inserted into the Indian Penal Code at the suggestion of Sir James Stephen, who is an opponent of the Native press, is calculated to cause dissatisfaction throughout the country. This section had remained a dead-letter till now. It should be enforced only in very extreme cases, when the State is expected to be in danger. We think with the rest of the press that Government have been misled in taking this action. Whatever the result, Government are sure to be the losers, for, if the prosecution does not end in conviction Government will certainly lose in public estimation, and even if it succeed it will give a stimulus to Native editors to write with greater vigour, as it is considered by them an honour to suffer pain or to die for one's country. If the Anglo-Indian press represented the grievances of the Natives the Native papers would be spared from exposing them, and if attempts are made to stop the legitimate course followed by the latter the Natives will resort to cabalism. No Native is opposed to the continuance of British rule in India, but he only clamours at the way in which certain of its officers are behaving. The present case against the Bangabasi will decide as to whether it is sedition or not to ventilate in the newspapers the just grievances of the people and their feelings about them.

28. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 6th August, disapproves of the present practice which obtains in the Bombay Presidency of resurveying and reassessing lands at the end of every 20 or 30 years, says that the cultivators would not have been reduced to their present impoverished condition if there had been in existence the system of permanent land settlement, and observes:—A revised survey and assessment of lands in the Ahmedabad District were made in 1868, by which the land-tax was nearly doubled in some cases but was generally enhanced 60 per cent. This tax has again been increased by 50 to 100 per cent. or even more by the revised survey and assessment which were made about two years ago. Owing to loud complaints against the latter increase nominal remissions have been authorized by Government in the Daskroi Táluka, but though they are small it is unfair to have them for only 52 villages to the exclusion of the rest. It is also unfair to make no distinction between lands with wells and those without wells and to suppose that the heavy tax will indirectly compel the owners of the latter lands to sink wells since they cannot afford to do so. We request Government to take pity on poor cultivators, as otherwise a large area of land will remain uncultivated.

Remarks on the revised survey of lands in the Ahmedabad District.

29. The Pratod (58), in its issue of the 10th August, states that a new arrangement has been made by the officers of the Forest Department in the Sátára District in connection with reserved forests which has deprived the people of pasture lands for their cattle and has created a consternation among the agriculturists in general, and that the latter have gone in large numbers to the head-quarter station of the district to seek redress, and recommends the pleaders and other leading persons in the district to take prompt steps in the matter by sending a memorial to Parliament, praying that the rigor of the harsh rules of the Forest Department may be slackened.

A new arrangement in connection with reserved forests in Sátára complained against.

30. A correspondent of the Svadesh Bandhu (128), in its issue of the 5th August, requests the Commissioner, N. D., to transfer elsewhere those who have been holding the appointments of Chitnises and Deputy Chitnises in one and the same place for five years or more, as these officers are likely to have too much intimacy with the people, which is fraught with evil.

A request to the Commissioner, N. D., to make frequent transfers of Chitnises and Deputy Chitnises in his Division.

31. The Bakul (22), the Belgaum Samáchár (23) and the Jagadhitechchhu (38), in their respective issues of the 9th, 10th and 8th August are of opinion that the Chief Constable of Rájápur in the Ratnágiri District, who since the recent affray between the Hindus and the Mahomedans of the place has become very unpopular in the former community, should be transferred to some other place, and recommend the authorities concerned to pay due attention to this suggestion.

Transfer of the Chief Constable of Rájápur recommended.

32. The Vritt Sudha (78), in its issue of the 11th August, regrets that many affrays should take place, as they have done for some years past, between the Hindus and the Mahomedans, and is of opinion that they were not so frequent even under the Mahomedan rulers of India. All these riots, says the paper, are due, in the first place, to the fanaticism of the Mahomedans, and, secondly, to the instigation of Government and their officers and to the weakness of and absence of self-respect among the Hindus, and that several instances may be cited to show that the Mahomedans being physically strong and ever ready to be aggressive Government seldom do anything to displease them, and that, consequently, the Hindus have to suffer a great deal on account of their patience and forgiveness. In conclusion, the paper takes the Hindus to task for taking part in the Mohoram festivities, and advises well-to-do Hindu gentlemen not to give alms to those poor Hindus who assume disguises during these festivities.

Affrays between the Hindus and the Mahomedans and their causes.

33. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 13th August, writes:—Hinduism has no standard of morality. It is a religion without a single perfect example for men to follow. Its representation of God is most imperfect. No man could follow the example of the ten or more incarnations and be a good man. Not a single god has a character that can claim human respect; the Rishis, who are supposed to have acquired the highest attainment of moral perfection, are every one unworthy of being followed. This is very sad, for if men have no high standard they will of necessity take a low one. Men are imitators; they will take some ideal and shape their lives accordingly. If it is a high ideal they will find their characters elevated; if a low ideal they fall to its level. The great god whom the Hindus worship is Vishnu, but how very far from the ideal of a pure and holy life is his, as depicted in the Puráns! If any Hindu should pray and say, "O Vishnu, make me like thyself in character," he would be making a request which, if granted, would make the suppliant a worse man than he was before. What if any one should say within himself "I will take Shiva as my pattern of life. He is my god and I must be like him." Such a man would give himself up to all forms of filth, lust and obscenity. As an example to be imitated Brahmadeva is not much better, for the stories that are told of him in the Puráns are such as to make the pure-minded blush for shame. Not one of the three, Brahma, Vishnu or Shiva, can be thought of as an example for any one to follow. It is a well recognized fact that the Hindus are morally better than their gods. This is to be accounted for from the fact that Hindus are taught that they must not follow the deeds of their gods but their teachings. As would be expected, the lives of the so-called incarnations are no better than the lives of the gods from whom they are said to have emanated. We may exclude, to begin with, the earlier ones in the list of the ten incarnations, such as the fish and boar, as not human. The Váman Avatár is known especially for his deception of Bali. Parashuráma for his killing of Kshatriyas. Ráma is one of the best of the Avatárs, but it does not take a very critical spirit a long time to discover in the accounts of his life very many defects which make it impossible to accept him as a worthy example for any one to follow. When considering his character the question, of course, is not whether the accounts of his character do not contain good points, but whether or not they contain faults. We can excuse faults in men, but not in the gods or incarnations. Of Krishna the less said the better. The impossibility of following his example has always been felt, and Hindu moralists have been careful to teach that only his teachings are to be regarded as the law for men. All readers of the Puráns are familiar with the characters of the great Rishis. Men and gods feared them. They were looked upon as very holy men, but the descriptions show many of them to be sensual; almost all of them hot-tempered, and given to cruel cursing whenever they were irritated. They were intensely selfish, with little that is lovable in their natures. There is not a single Rishi in the long list contained in the Puráns who can possibly be taken for an example in these days of enlightenment.

A paragraph published in a former issue disavowed.

34. The Sind Times (8), in its issue of the 6th August, writes:—The Managing Directors of the Sind Times have seen with great regret the insertion of a paragraph in the issue of that journal of the 2nd instant reflecting on the character of a "medical officer in the province of Sind." They disavow any participation in the opinions and sentiments expressed in that paragraph, which was inserted by the editor, Mr. B. C. Bánerji, without their knowledge or consent and upon his own responsibility. Mr. Bánerji has ceased to be editor of the Sind Times.

A complaint against the Mámlatdár of Junnar in the Poona District.

35. A correspondent, writing from Junnar to the Shri Shivdji (65) in its issue of the 7th August, complains that much inconvenience and hardship are caused to those who have business in the office of the Mámlatdár of the Junnar sub-division of the Poona District on account of that officer holding his office till a late hour in the evening.

A postal complaint.

36. The Dnyán Ságar (32), in its issue of the 10th August, draws the attention of the postal authorities to irregular and dilatory delivery of letters in the Panála subdivision of the Kolhápur State, and recommends them to verify the complaint by means of "test letters" and to remedy the cause of dissatisfaction, if there be any, as alleged by a correspondent of the newspaper.

Part II.—Education.

A protest against the appointment of Mr. Kálábhái as an examiner in the University of Bombay.

37. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 9th August, writes:—Friends seem to have come to the assistance of Mr. Kálábhái Lallubhái to raise him once more from the abyss 'abhorred of blank oblivion' by getting him appointed as an examiner in the LL.B. Examination of the University. There are symptoms in the appeal which the Bombay bar has made to the Faculty of Law and the protests that are raised in the press, that the reward which these worthy gentlemen will possibly get for their trouble will consist of an exclamation from the object of their favour to save him from his friends. We on our part should have considered the nomination of Mr. Kálábhái an honour to Surat and its bar, had it come six or seven years ago. We would not have then considered his not being a University man a disqualification or his practising in the mofussil courts a sufficient reason to debar him from enjoying the honour. However, as the favour of the Syndicate has descended on Mr. Kálábhái in 1891, when the latent qualities of his nature having got their fullest development have entirely shrouded him in a cloud of unpopularity and disgrace, we are bound in the interests of the public at large, and more particularly of the candidates for the examination in question, to speak out our mind. We quite plainly and unequivocally declare in the words of the Bombay appeal, though on grounds altogether different from those mentioned in that document, that such an appointment "must have the necessary effect of appreciably lowering the value and prestige of the LL.B. Degree." An examiner as well as a teacher must possess a thorough knowledge of the subject for which he is appointed, an unblemished character, an honesty of purpose, impartiality, a freedom from perversity, erroneousness and wrong-headedness in judgment, and, lastly, if he be a public man, an untarnished public record. The list is necessarily incomplete. But the task of an examiner who has to pronounce certain persons to be either fit or unfit for exercising the functions of a judge or a lawyer, and whose whim may make or mar the fortunes of promising young men, is full of responsibility and requires in him the presence of very exceptional qualities. Mr. Kálábhái will be found wanting in many of these, and in the light of his antecedents we consider the action of the Syndicate a very cruel and inconsiderate one. We do not undertake the thankless work of unearthing them, for they would edify none. A few samples, however, drawn from them are sufficient to show their kind. A few years ago a client of his was unkind enough to place him before the High Court, alleging that his Vakil had gone to the length of offering his service to the highest bidder of two antagonistic parties after having enjoyed the confidence of both. Though the matter was eventually compromised, it was enough to lower him in the estimation of the public at large. Candidates passed by such an examiner would scarcely stand high in their own regard. But the most apposite example showing his complete want of the qualifications of an examiner is supplied by the fact that when a few years ago he was appointed an examiner in the law examinations of the High Court he committed such a ruthless slaughter of the innocents that he might be charged with a desire to show his knowledge in the question paper rather than to test that of the candidates in their answers. Should the appointment of such an injudicious examiner pass without a protest? Now as to his public acts. They are local and the locality best knows them. The latest of them in their enormity of guilt far overtop any good ones of his earlier days. To covet and get the honour of managing a large public institution and then to muddle its affairs in such a way as to raise grave suspicions, to be hated, hooted and yet not to hand over its management to better men, but, on the contrary, to make himself liable to prosecution on a criminal charge and then yield ignominiously, - such a series of mistakes was possible to be made only by the would-be examiner of the LL.B. Examination. It would be a fatal mistake on the part of the Syndicate to confide such a serious trust to such a wrong-headed man. Let us take his latest act. He is a municipal commissioner, and the oldest one at Surat. But incredible as it may be, he committed the same offence for which he had voted the pulling down of people's houses. Happening to build a house, he encroached upon the land belonging to the municipality. How he was asked to remove the encroachment, how he had the effrontery of filing a suit against the municipality, what remarks the First Class Subordinate Judge made on him in his judgment, how he was condemned to pay costs, how he submitted to the arbitration of Mr. Lely and how Mr. Lely ordered the extensive encroachments to be removed, are facts still fresh in the memory of readers. It is, therefore, very natural and proper that the members of the Bombay bar should feel themselves aggrieved by being passed over by a gentleman of Mr. Kálábhái's antecedents. We hope that either the Syndicate will reconsider the appointment or the Senate veto it.

Intended transfer of the Bombay Veterinary College to Poona disapproved.

38. In noticing the Government resolution on the working of the Bombay Veterinary College during the past year, the Bombay Samáchár (93), in its issue of the 11th August, says :— The decline in the number of students appears inexplicable. The number of Veterinary Surgeons turned out by this College is not large, while those who have passed its test are either employed or have set up on their own account. The market is not overstocked at all and an extensive demand to be urgently answered is still before us. A complaint has been made in the report from the Principal of the College about the insanitary surroundings of the institution, and on that account the Principal of the College of Science has been called upon to report on the possibility of transferring the College to Poona. It is to be hoped that the intention of transferring the institution to Poona will be given up, since it is not likely to enjoy at that station the advantages which it possesses here, and the insanitary condition of the neighbourhood of the College may be improved. [The Jáme Jamshed (81), in its issue of the 10th August, observes :—Government believes that there is considerable field for the employment of veterinary surgeons, but this is a doubtful point that ought to be solved by a committee of enquiry composed of experienced men, which should be charged with the work of ascertaining whether the prospects afford sufficient encouragement to students who have had middle education to undergo a training for becoming veterinary surgeons, and whether sufficient instruction is imparted at the College for treating the complaints of cattle in general, for which there is an extensive demand in the districts. A settlement of the abovementioned two points alone is urgently needed to place the institution on a satisfactory footing.]

PART III.—Municipalities.

Police charges and the Bombay Municipality.

39. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 9th August, writes :—The relations between the Bombay Municipal Corporation and the local Government are gradually growing more and more strained, and the memorial which the Corporation have resolved this week to send to the Supreme Government, protesting against the gross iniquity of saddling the municipality virtually with the whole cost of the police, will unhappily tend to embitter those relations. The protest against the threatened wrong is couched in firm and vigorous language, which in parts rises to indignation. And there is ample reason for indignation, if it be true, as the memorial has stated, that not only the present increased burden which the Bombay Government seek to cast upon the Corporation, but the whole sum which is levied from them for the cost of the police, is levied unjustly, inequitably, unequally and in a manner to excite feelings of just and angry discontent in the rate-payers of this city. This is very strong language, indeed, which nothing but gross injustice can justify; and assuming the correctness of all the facts stated in the memorial, it is clear that gross injustice has been done and still grosser injustice is in contemplation. Once more the Government flaunt the Municipal Act in the face of the Corporation and make their demand in compliance with a cruelly strict interpretation of its provisions. They must have their pound of flesh because the law allows it, but whether the court of the Supreme Government will award it remains to be seen. In the resolution with which the Corporation were surprised in the middle of last year, the local Government were pleased to observe that under Section 62 of the Act they were empowered to levy from the municipality "such proportion of the annual expenses of the police of the city as Government shall from time to time determine" and that "it imposes on Government the duty of considering, from time to time, what is a fair contribution to demand." In the performance of this duty the Government have come abruptly upon the Corporation with a demand for Rs. 1,91,711 beyond the sum of Rs. 2,68,752 hitherto paid by them. To make matters worse, the Corporation has been required to raise this money in the middle of the financial year, after all the budget arrangements for the year have been completed and settled, and, as if to fill the cup of bitterness to the brim, they are told that Government will only continue to pay their annual contribution of Rs. 90,000 towards the cost of the police for a period of two years further. So two years hence the Corporation will be confronted with the problem of providing Rs. 5,83,000 every year for what will virtually be the whole cost of the police, without having the least voice or responsibility in the control and management of that body! Government may be perfectly within the four corners of the Act in making their demand, just as the inexorable demand of the immortal Jew was in conformity with his agreement in its strictly literal interpretation. But the claim is neither fair nor equitable, and Government can only press it, if they want to make their might do duty for right. There are prior arrangements and understandings which must be taken into account in determining what would be a fair proportion to demand. But Government show utter disregard of the justice and equity of the case when they dismiss these considerations altogether from their mind. After reading the statement of the prior arrangements and understandings which is given in the memorial, we do not consider the language too strong which characterizes the present action of Government as "no less than a breach of faith." Neither the Calcutta nor the Madras Municipality is made to pay for their police. Bombay alone of all the cities in India is singled out for the honour of paying for the police, and paying the whole cost.

40. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 9th August, writes:—The memorial addressed by the Bombay Municipal Corporation to the Indian Government regarding the demand made by the local Government for an increased share of the police charges of the city, is such a weighty document, full of undeniable facts and irrefragable arguments, that it is difficult to believe how they can be got over either by the Indian or the Bombay Government. The historical review, as embodied in the memorial, of the relative position of the municipality cannot but leave an impression on the mind of a reader that the Bombay Municipality has been treated by the local Government in a most arbitrary manner and with the grossest injustice, which would be unworthy of even a less 'benign' and less enlightened Government. While they are ever ready to press their claims to the utmost limits possible and even to swallow up several lakhs of strictly local revenue, they are, at the same time, not only most reluctant to disgorge the same but even bold to make preposterous demands upon the municipality against the specific provisions of law on the subject. No rational man who is not perversely obstinate and self-conceited requires to be told that Government cannot so exercise their discretion as to ask the municipality to bear the whole burden of the police charges, when they are entitled to demand only a reasonable proportion in accordance with law. This attempt to impose unjustifiable burdens on the shoulders of the municipality, which it is evidently unable to endure and which it cannot justly be called upon to bear, would be more becoming to a less constitutional Government, enriching its exchequer, Shylock-like, regardless of all considerations of financial ethics. The whole course of municipal legislation is opposed to the claims that are now being made. The declarations of the Secretary of State and the past conduct of the local and Indian Governments only demonstrate the injustice and iniquity of the contemplated raid upon the municipal purse, and the question is whether the Bombay public ought to sit silent and suffer while the screw is being mercilessly turned on by the local Government. Important works of paramount importance to the health and well-being of the city are on hand. Quiet submission to the grossly inequitable demands now being made by Government would lead to their suspension and indefinite postponement. The only other alternative is increased taxation, which has already reached its furthermost limits. Government, with the power of making and unmaking laws uncontrolled by the voice of the representatives of the people in the Legislative Councils, makes and unmakes them according to its sweet will, gives liberal promises, and revokes or ignores them altogether in course of time just as it finds convenient. This is one of the lessons which the memorial teaches. How long will the public submit to such treatment? The thing has now become wholly intolerable and the people ought no longer to put up with insults that are being continually added to standing wrongs. The municipality has already entered a strong protest against the iniquitous treatment that is being meted out to them, and we are inclined to ask if, with a view to check the growing tendency that is now perceptible to defy popular opinion and do anything that Government deem proper in their omniscient wisdom, a public protest should not be forwarded to Government against the fresh wrong that is attempted to be inflicted upon the City of Bombay. Perhaps, it would be prudent to wait for further developments, but we are almost inclined to think that matters are reaching a crisis, and if better counsel do not prevail that crisis cannot long be delayed.

The proposed increase of the Bombay Police force and comments thereon.

41. The same newspaper writes:—The building bye-laws are being pushed through the Bombay Municipal Corporation with unseemly haste, and we trust a word of caution will not be out of place at this moment to our Municipal Councillors. The bye-laws are two score and odd in number, and represent the cumulative wisdom of the Municipal Engineering Department and the Corporation Committee which has sent them on to the Corporation. They were long in coming, even Government having asked more than once about them, and two disasters with terribly fatal results having given a rude awakening to the Corporation. It was expected that the Engineering Department, in preparing the draft bye-laws, would take Bombay as it is, just sufficient to check jerry building, but so as not to prevent legitimate trade in house building. Instead of that, the universal complaint among rate-payers at present is that these bye-laws will render legitimate building almost a financial impossibility, unless Bombay residents are prepared to pay proportionately increased rents. We say now is the time for the Councillors to be careful of their votes. Each vote means a sacred trust reposed by rate-payers, and we trust every Councillor will remember while giving his vote in the matter of these bye-laws that the rate-payers and residents of Bombay have a great stake in these bye-laws, which should have the one object of ensuring "public safety" without being cumbrous, without leading to difficulties or litigation, and which, while summarily checking jerry-building of all kinds, should not render the housing of the poor an impossibility or even a difficulty by insisting upon ideal standards of quality, strength and thickness in buildings. All the tall talk in which the Times of India indulges about Government applying the bludgeon clauses is pure moonshine, the result of a diseased imagination. Government knows well the practical common-sense of the Bombay Corporation and will not easily insult the same when such highly experienced experts as Messrs. Gostling and Morris, for themselves and as spokesmen for Messrs. Campbell, Hewson and Stevens, are also having their say in the matter with valuable suggestions. The Municipal Act of 1888 is now found to be a piece of sulum by both rate-payers and residents. Major Selby and the late Sir Mangaldás knew this, and the gallant major fought in the best way he could. But the Municipal Councillors of the day were easy with their votes, and the present Municipal Act is the result. Similarly these bye-laws are penal; any breach of them means heavy fine and imprisonment in default. We beseech Councillors to be careful of their votes.

A word of warning to the Municipal Councillors of Bombay regarding the proposed building bye-laws.

42. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 9th August, gives a cartoon of an ogre with a sweeper's broom in its left hand representing the Bombay Municipality as the breeder of fever, cholera, &c., and is surrounded on three sides by three charmers, viz., Drs. Bhálchandra and Blaney and Mr. Kábráji, who are attempting unsuccessfully to drive away the harbingers of death infesting Khetwádi owing to its inefficient drainage, and the ogre is, as it were, exulting at their defeat. The letter-press runs as under :—Grim Yama's (Death's) Senápati in Khetwádi. (Read debate on the Khetwádi drains in the Bombay Municipal Hall, on July 23rd.) The army (1) of Yama having invaded the nether region of modern Lankápuri, a charmer of high caste and great fame, (2) was employed to perform propitiatory rites and to use spells to win over an ogre who exercised some influence over Yama's Senápati. Another powerful charmer (3) assisted in reciting hymns of praise, and a third (4) exhorted the sufferers to burn incense and pray. The ogre, fully inflated with the spirit of his inexorable god, at last delivered himself thus: "Patience, ye sinners, the siege must continue till Gabriel sounds his trumpet! Faithful Ogre! Potent Senápati of Yama!" The editor of the newspaper explains the cartoon as follows :—The Senápati (commander-in-chief) of Yama (Death), is the head of the Municipal Department that permits the filth to accumulate in the Khetwádi gutters without improving the gradient so as to allow the sullage to flow off into the principal drain.

The Bombay Municipality represented in a cartoon anent the debate on the Khetwádi drains.

43. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 9th August, writes :—Government, we are glad to understand, have entirely withdrawn from the very untenable position they took in January last about the administration of the Poona Municipality. Our readers probably recollect that the Poona Municipality was asked to submit a scheme for the appointment of an executive officer. This scheme, it was ordered, was to be submitted within six weeks from the date of the receipt of the orders. This looked like a threat to put into operation the control clauses of the Act. The consequences of such a course are very plainly stated in the Act. The clique of the enemies of self-government in Poona were every day expecting a Government resolution superseding the Poona Municipality. The whole storm has, however, disappeared and there is once again normal temperature. Government has under consideration the subject of revising the Municipal Acts, and the scheme of the Poona Municipality has been referred to the Divisional Commissioners for their opinion and will be taken into consideration along with other suggestions for amending the Acts. We thank Government for their exceptional liberality and fairness of mind. We hope all concerned will now forget and forgive.

A suggestion to the Surat Municipality.

44. The Gujarát Mitrá (84), in its issue of the 9th August, approves of the two bye-laws recently proposed by the Surat Municipality, namely, that commissioners violating the municipal rules or possessing questionable character be expelled from the corporation on the verdict of two-thirds of the total number of commissioners. The Mitrá suggests an additional bye-law to the effect that if a majority of two-thirds of the total commissioners veto the election of any member, his nomination should be vitiated. The paper adds that such a bye-law is necessary in order to prevent rate-payers from returning barbers and other low-caste people to the corporation.

Part IV.—Native States.

Remarks in connection with the sentences passed on the Manipur princes.

45. In noticing the commutation of the sentence of death passed on the Regent and Angao Seva of Manipur for waging war against the Queen-Empress to one of transportation for life and forfeiture of their property, and the confirmation of the sentence of death passed on the Senápati and the Tongal General for similar offence and for ordering the murder of European officers by the latter and for abetment by the former, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 12th August, writes:—Considering the almost unanimous verdict against the Supreme Government recorded by the English press in the matter of the embroglio made in sending an expedition against Manipur, it may be said that the decision of the Supreme Government will not be readily approved of by the English nation; nor will it be acquiesced in by the people of India. The Manipur subject was discussed in Parliament on several occasions, and those discussions show that if Parliament were sitting at this time a great difficulty would be experienced by the Supreme Government in carrying out the sentences passed by it on the Manipur princes. The publication of these sentences and the commencement of criminal proceedings against the Bangabasi newspaper of Calcutta for alleged seditious matter published by it in March last, after the prorogation of Parliament, show that the Supreme Government stands in dread of Parliament. It is not afraid of the strictures passed upon its work by independent Parliamentary members, but it is at the same time not disregardful of them. When the few Parliamentary members who discuss Indian questions in real earnestness can produce so much effect on the Indian authorities, it will be a great comfort to India if their number appreciably increases. [The Jáme Jamshed (85), in its issues of the 13th and 14th August, also observes that the English press will not readily approve of the sentence of hanging passed on the Senápati and the Tongal General, but the Jáme itself approves of the sentence and expresses a hope that the Manipur State will not be annexed to the British territories but will be made over to the ex-Mahárája or one of his brothers under the strong control of the British Government.]

46. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 13th August, writes:—As regards the charge of waging war against the Queen-Empress, the Government of India have very properly held that the Regent and all the rest were mere tools in the hands of the Jubráj, Senápati, who was also the real author of the bloodless revolution at Manipur in September last year. As regards the fixing of the responsibility for the massacre of the British officers on the shoulders of the Jubráj Senápati, the Government of India would appear to have been guided by his antecedents in arriving at that conclusion. It may be further remembered that all the British officers, except Mr. Grimwood, were beheaded by the public executioner. This fact strongly supports the belief that the action was the result of the deliberate orders of the de facto ruling authority at Manipur on that memorable day. If the British officers had been massacred by the excited soldiery flushed with victory, it would have been otherwise. As it was, we are inclined to think that the Government of India was justified in fixing the responsibility for the massacre of the British officers on the shoulders of the Jubráj Senápati. The same cannot, however, be said of the Tongal General, who may be said to have carried out the orders of his youthful chief. There is nothing in his antecedents to justify any other belief. And looking to his advanced old age the Government of India would have done well if they had in his case also commuted the sentence to one of transportation for life. The fact that from a period anterior to the Manipur treaty he has been a hater of the British Government should not have been allowed to influence their decision in the present case, as it appears to have been.

47. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 13th August, approves of the commutation of the sentence of death passed on the Manipur Regent and his third brother into one of transportation as being an act of generosity on the part of the Government of India.

The Manipur muddle and the Native press.

48. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 9th August, gives a cartoon representing a fox (Indian Government) standing on the 'Manipur muddle,' surrounded by geese, meaning the following newspapers:—The Amrit Bazar Patrika, the Indian Mirror, the Tribune, the Indian Spectator, the Bombay Samáchár, the Phœnix, the Native Opinion, and the Indu Prakásh; and these geese are represented as pecking at the fox from all sides. The Punch, under the heading of "The poor fox and the cruel geese," comments as follows:—The criticisms in the Indian press on the Manipur muddle have not ceased yet, but it is feared they will be continued with double force if, as announced by an Anglo-Indian paper, the Government of India follows the policy of either annexing Manipur and preserving the lives of the Senápati and the other Manipuri offenders, or hanging the prisoners and not annexing the country.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 8th August, writes :—We congratulate Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick on his selection by the Viceroy for the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb. No other nomination could have met with equal approval in all quarters. One of the ablest of Indian administrators, Sir Dennis is particularly noted for his solicitude to do justice to all and act fairly towards all with whom he is brought in contact. His strength of character and scrupulous fairness have enabled him to avoid the snares and pitfalls which beset the path of those who have worked as political officers in a place like Hyderabad. It is not known who will be his successor, but Mr. Cunningham was talked of at one time.

Approval of the selection of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick by the Viceroy for the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Comments on the address of Sir J. Gorst, Under Secretary of State for India, at the Cooper's Hill College.

1. The Jâme Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 20th August, takes exception to the observation made by Sir J. Gorst, Under Secretary of State for India, in his address to the students of the Cooper's Hill College at the recent annual distribution of diplomas and prizes, that India is governed by England entirely for the benefit of the subject-people, observing:—Though India is benefited by British rule, it is wrong to assert that England derives no advantages whatever from her Indian empire. It was only about a year and a half ago that, in addressing a large congregation, Lord Dufferin explained the important advantages derived by England from India and tried to prove the necessity of every Englishman exerting himself to preserve British rule in India. It is, therefore, to be regretted that the Under Secretary of State should have impressed on the inexperienced young students of the Cooper's Hill College false notions about the Indian administration, as they are likely to make these students look upon the natives of India with contempt and unconcern when they come here on service. It is also to be deplored that the burden of maintaining the Cooper's Hill College, which ought to have been closed long ago, is still to be borne by India when competent Natives can be had for service in the Public Works, Forestry and Telegraph Departments in India.

Observations on the British administration in India.

2. The Gujardt Mitrâ (83), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—The rather despotic autocracy of British officials in India has of late been such a marked feature of our administrative system that Lord Lansdowne's recent resolution prohibiting the publication of newspapers and periodicals in Native States without the permission of the Political Resident, and the charge of sedition which the authorities have brought against a Calcutta print, will not come upon the reading public as matters for surprise. We are at a loss to see how a Government pretending to rule the very hearts of the people can, with justice, impose restrictions upon an institution whose main object is to expose the evils rampant in the land and to suggest to the authorities a conciliatory course of policy in the interests of both the rulers and the ruled. The fact cannot be disguised that of late years the policy pursued by the Government of India in the fiscal administration of the country has been of so objectionable a character that the newspaper press, as a recognised estate of the realm, would be simply defeating the very end and aim of its existence if it did not cry out against the evil. Our judicial tribunals, in which the Indian rayat reposes greater confidence than in any other administrative machinery, present at times such a characteristic weakness that nothing but distrust and discontent are the result. We need not assure the British Government that a crest-fallen, mild and placid people like the Indian nation, that has passed through successive sovereignties of different despotic denominations, and ultimately has come under the sway of a just and benign Government, must be and actually is loyal to the backbone. For the nation is not quite blind to its own safety and comfort. It is in the stability and permanence of British rule that the happiness and welfare of the people chiefly depend.

3. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 16th August, writes to the Punch of Fleet Street, London:—Your existence has been co-eval with the reign of the noblest Queen who ever wielded a sceptre or graced a throne, whose sway we, too, are proud to own, and whom, equally with you, we delight to love, honour and obey. Like an indulgent mother, Her Majesty has been good and kind and merciful to us, but if you will know the truth, we are not a little annoyed at the scanty attention which is paid to our affairs on your side; and we certainly expect better treatment at the hands of the Parliament than a summary dismissal in stereotyped form, at the fag end of the Session. To be left in the hands of a Ripon or a Reay is of all blessings conferred on us by the benign British rule the highest, and with such men over us, willing and ready at all times to grant our just prayers, we could put up even with your chilling indifference. But Ripons and Reays are, "like angels' visits, few and far between," and there are times when Sir John Gorst's "mediocrities" are mercilessly let loose upon us to revel in this land of milk and honey at their own sweet will and pleasure; men whose politics and ideas of responsibilities are bounded on the north, south, east and west by cricket, lawn-tennis, balls and devils' dances, and goodness knows what else besides. It is true that "all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." A little harmless play now and then, to vary the monotony and tedium of work, we certainly should not object to; but when it comes to all play and no work, the matter wears a serious aspect, indeed. To cite only one case out of many. Not so very long ago as the end of April last all Bombay was rudely startled out of its sense of real or fancied security by a double crime, committed with unusual boldness, in broad daylight, within almost the precincts of our High Court of Justice. At the end of only a few hours after the occurrence of the appalling catastrophe, the men entrusted with the unravelling of the dark mystery which then enshrouded and to this very day continues to enshroud it, stopped all enquiry in the direction indicated by certain unmistakable marks of violence on the bodies of the victims, and, while the circumstances of the case clearly pointed to murder, doggedly sought to account for the loss of two innocent lives by the preposterous alternative of suicide or accident. The most absurd nonsense was poured into our ears about unsophisticated young girls being suddenly fired with the "intrepid spirit" necessary to mount a giddy height, for the fun of the thing; and the result is that audacious thieves of woman's honour and destroyers of human lives remain at large to this very day, while innocent blood goes unavenged! Did our respected Governor, only 120 miles removed from the scene of murder, run down to comfort the afflicted by his presence, or to fire the flagging zeal of the myrmidons of the law? Did he so much as flash by wire a message of sympathy (if only of the most formal kind) to an entire community buried in unspeakable grief? No fear; and yet only the other day His Lordship came down from Poona on purpose to witness a cricket match in front of our local Gymkhana! Against such indifference and against the "motley forces of oppression, obscurantism, hypocrisy and humbug," which now and again rise up in arms against us, from here, there and everywhere, I have been trying, ever since my birth, to wage war, after your manner, though necessarily a very long way after, and in my own humble fashion.

A complaint against the manner in which the income-tax is assessed and the appeals against the assessments are disposed of, and objectionable comments on the British administration.

4. The Bodh Sudhdkar (9), in its issue of the 19th August, publishes an article said to be communicated by "a well-wisher of the nation," in which the writer makes at great length a complaint about the levy of the income-tax and the manner in which appeals against the assessment of the tax by subordinate officers are disposed of, saying that persons not eligible to be taxed are made to pay the tax in amounts incommensurate with their incomes and that appellate authorities confirm the original assessments without going through the evidence adduced by the persons taxed. The writer puts his complaint in the form of a dialogue in a dream with a European officer, which concludes as follows:—

Writer.—Is it not a great sin to dispose of appeals indifferently and without looking into the merits of each case?

European Officer.—Rulers have hell in store for them after their administration, which will fall to the lot of the Queen. We are mere servants.

Writer.—What will be the consequence if the minds of the subjects are disaffected?

European Officer.—We have fear on this score in Europe. In India, however, there is no brave man left. Who is afraid of your displeasure here? If there appears to be any agitation or disturbance here, we will blow away four persons from the mouth of a cannon in each district and there will be an end to the matter.

So saying, observes the writer, the European officer went away and I got up to see him off and awoke. What sort of dream is this? It is no dream, but merely a reflection of what passes in the mind. Our loyalty is really unlimited. Bravo! O Hindus! You are a noble and simple-minded people. For your welfare you must have a ruler who is virtuous and of a good disposition. If he be otherwise, and if after plundering you he lays you prostrate and commands you not to raise your head, you will obey him and remain prostrate. A National Congress of such people is of no use. If a proclamation be issued to the effect that persons visiting the National Congress will be criminally prosecuted the people will lose their courage then and there. What remedy have we, I ask, if Government are oppressive in the manner alluded to by the European officer spoken to in the dream? O wise politicians in the country, I think the whole administration is after the fashion described in the dream. Do not then let the Congress be slow like a snail. As it is at present it is a mere farce. What can a Bradlaugh or a Wedderburn do? Let us invite the Prince of Wales to be the President of the Congress this year, and if he accepts the invitation we are sure to have our grievances soon redressed by Parliament.

The influence of the civilising West on the regeneration of India.

5. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 15th August, writes:—History tells us that the conquest of India was not undertaken by the English from any high motive. Neither Clive nor Warren Hastings was a man of very high principles. Some historians have condemned them, but the people of India hail with thanksgiving the fruits of their aggressive policy. The pretext for the conquest of Sind cannot be defended on honest grounds, but who will regret the conquest itself? That, perhaps, which some deem a piece of mercenary policy has been converted into incalculable good for India. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that the British Government is an honoured instrument with which Providence is working out the regeneration of India. We should, therefore, look upon it as a gift from above. However much the selfishness and domineering air of some of its little lordlings may retard the fulfilment of its mission, let us not doubt for a moment its divine function and authority. It behoves us, therefore, to try our best to preserve its high prestige and supremacy. Let us agitate for rights and privileges, let us claim our share in the government of the country, but let us bear in mind that it is high treason against the Highest Sovereign to try to compromise the dignity of the British throne. If the East requires regeneration she must be united with the West. The West has come to impart life to the East. Let no one stand in the way. There are some servants of the Crown who think that India is to be governed for their own interests and not for the welfare of the people. There are also many among the Natives who are carried away with the impression that the only mission of the British Government here is to plunder India. Both these classes of people are greater enemies of the British Government than any external foe.

Sir Charles Pritchard in the Viceregal Legislative Council.

6. The Gujardt Mitrd (84), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—When Mr. Nugent was elevated to a seat in the Viceroy's Council lately, the nomination was approved of by the entire public without, perhaps, any dissentient voice. But the antecedents of Sir Charles Pritchard of the Bombay Civil Service preclude us from entertaining any hope that much good will come out of his elevation to that august seat. With all due deference to his shining abilities as a revenue expert, and some of his amiable personal qualities which have endeared him to many an individual heart, his ábkári policy is the most valid point of contention against his nomination. However, after rising to such a goal of legitimate ambition, if Sir Charles is able to see his way to recommending a relaxation of the present ábkári policy of the Bombay Government he will have conferred a great boon upon the people, or else his present elevation must forebode a gradual extension of the mischief throughout India.

Comments on the absence of a Pársi gentleman in the Bombay Legislative Council.

7. In alluding to the nomination of Mr. J. B. Naylor, C.S., C.S.I., in place of the Honourable Mr. Navroji Nasarvánji Wádia to be Additional Member of the Legislative Council of this presidency, the Jame Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 21st August, says:—This is the first time within the last twenty-five years when the Pársi element has been eliminated from the Legislative Council of Bombay. The different Pársi gentlemen who have sat in the Council one after another have rendered ample service to Government and the public, but at present there is not a single gentleman of this community in the Council to duly represent the interests of this important class. The Bombay Legislative Council contains at present seven European officials, including His Excellency the Governor, and one non-official European, while there are only four Hindus and one Mahomedan to represent those large communities, and no Pársi. This state of things makes it plain that the constitution of the Council needs reformation.—A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (35), in its issue of the 22nd August, writing on the same subject says:—The Pársis ought not to be greedy and uneasy about getting into the Legislative Council with the desire of becoming "Honourable," because none of this class who were in the Council have been able to do anything beneficial to their own community. On the other hand, take the case of Sir Dinsháw Mánekji Petit. While he was in the Imperial Legislative Council he sided with the Government in imposing a new tax on kerosine oil and enhancing the salt duties, and subjected himself to the unfavourable criticisms of the entire public. Mr. Phirozsháh Merwánji Mehta, while in the local Legislative Council, allowed such defective law to be passed for the Bombay Municipality as he himself frequently condemns in his capacity of a member of the local Municipal Corporation. Mr. Navroji Nasarvánji Wádia gets a share of the blame for passing a defective Boiler Inspection Act. Of course, his opposition to the strong phalanx of Government officials in the Council would have mattered little, but he ought not to have placed himself in a wrong position at all. Pársis can and do serve the public better when they are out of the Legislative Council than when they are in it.

8. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 20th August, writes:—"An inquest was held yesterday by the Coroner, Doctor Blaney, touching the death of Rahim Abdulla Mahomed, a Mahomedan child about four months old. On Sunday the deceased mother gave her infant a small opium pill to encourage sleep, but the pill proving too strong, the poor infant died at the Gokuldás Tejpál Hospital, where it had been taken by the mother in an unconscious state. The jury returned a verdict to the effect that the cause of death was opium, which was administered to the child inadvertently by the mother." The question now is who poisoned that child? Was it the mother or the wrong opium policy of Government? The responsibility, without doubt, falls upon the Government opium policy—a policy that makes opium so free that any ignorant mother can buy any amount of it on the street, and as freely as she would buy articles of food. The poor mother can plead ignorance as her excuse, and the opium-seller can plead the compulsion of Government. The only party that is without excuse is the Government of India, who can plead neither ignorance nor compulsion from outside. For the sake of revenue it makes a rank poison a free article of sale. Its restrictions are on the side of preventing the fall of sales, and not the prevention of its baleful effects. The death of this child is but one of the hundreds that are constantly occurring on account of this wretched policy, to say nothing of the thousands upon thousands who are mentally and physically injured by constant doses of opium through the ignorance of their parents. The policy of the Government of India stands fairly convicted of the poisoning of Rahim Abdulla Mahomed, and his blood cries out from the ground for a change of policy whereby infant life in India may not be so much at the mercy of ignorance and love of unholy gain.

The death of a child by opium ascribed to the present opium policy of Government.

9. Several newspapers of this week disapprove of the action taken by the Government of Bengal in instituting criminal proceedings against the Bangabasi newspaper, and say that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government seems to be very impatient of newspaper criticisms and wants to gag the press. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 17th August, says that though the Bangabasi was guilty of writings which a cautious editor would not write, the criminal prosecution instituted against the editor, manager and publisher of the paper is derogatory to Government, and that a mere resolution of Government would have been sufficient to caution the paper. In concluding its comments on the action of Government, the Indu adds that it does not become a wise and just Government to start untoward projects at a time when measures ought to be taken to allay public discontent caused by the passing of the Official Secrets and the Age of Consent Acts and the issue of rules concerning the publication of newspapers in Cantonments and Residencies in Native States.—The same paper, writing on the same subject in a paragraph, headed, "A misunderstanding between public opinion and Government," observes:—We are not at all surprised at the action of the Bengal Government with reference to the Bangabasi newspaper; on the contrary, we are at a loss to know why proceedings were not taken before this. When Governments become wanton they are quite impatient of comments on their doings and there are constant quarrels between them and the leaders of the popular side. In such contests people like the English sacrifice everything for the sake of success. Such a crisis is now threatening us and it remains to be seen how we acquit ourselves in it. It is not only in Bengal that a struggle is going on between Government and public opinion, but even in Bombay the same state of things is observable. It is well-known how Government quarrelled senselessly with the Poona Municipality and had to withdraw from the contest. Now the Government is contesting with the Bombay Municipality and is trying to burden it with police, primary education and other charges. The stiff reply which Government recently gave to the Presidency Association is also well known. On the whole, there is a gloomy outlook for the future.

10. The same newspaper, in another place, writes:—The Government of Bengal seems to have entered upon a perilous course of policy. The officials there have obviously thinner skins than in other parts of India. A local vernacular paper called the Bangabasi, which distinguished itself for the most rabid, uncompromising opposition during the late Age of Consent Bill controversy, has written something in the same strain against the Government. The Government of Bengal thinks the writing seditious and has prosecuted the proprietor, editor, manager and printer of the paper under Section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code. The prosecution is pending trial in the Sessions of the High Court of Calcutta, and we shall not say anything at this stage how far the writing is within the law. The Government of Bengal seems to have armed itself with the opinion of several leading counsel of Calcutta, and seems to be quite sure of its ground. But whatever the legal aspect of the case, we cannot commend the wisdom of the policy. The Government is too strong to be affected by any silly writing of ill-informed vernacular papers, and it can afford to treat such papers with contemptuous silence. The only circumstance of moment in the present case is that the paper enjoys a circulation of 30,000, and being in the vernacular reaches a class of people not very discriminating. Nevertheless we think Government would have done well to let it alone. Prosecuting such a paper gives it an importance which it does not possess, and writing as it does as a champion of religion, it gets an opportunity of posing as a martyr. The Government seems to be determined to make an example of the paper. The Advocate-General, Mr. Paul, observed in the High Court in the bail matter that "the Government was determined with the assistance of the law to put such writing down." How zealous the Bengal officers are in putting down such writing may be seen from the fact that the editor of the Indian Mirror was hauled up before the High Court for contempt, but the Chief Justice happily ruled that the writing in the Mirror was proper criticism and refused to commit for contempt, although the editor was made to enter into a recognizance binding himself not to refer to the case again until it is decided.

11. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 20th August, writes:—A State trial has commenced in Bengal, and though we shall say nothing about its merits just now, we are constrained to say that Government have taken a step which they might as well have avoided. It is the Judges and the Barristers of the Calcutta High Court who will decide whether or not the articles of the Bangabasi fall under the sedition section, but if those in power had taken a wider survey of the times and circumstances under which the said articles appear to have been written, possibly they might have felt convinced that they were the outcome of a heated imagination that, perhaps, owing to a bitter controversy about the Age of Consent Bill, had lost all balance. At that time Government and the people happened to be ranged on two sides, and naturally when people believed their religion was in danger and that Government was determined not to show them consideration, nothing but excitement could be the result. We do not wish to justify the conduct of the Hanyabasi; on the contrary, it was the bounden duty of that paper, so far as the then circumstances required, to exercise moderation. But under exciting circumstances very few are sober and the Bangabasi could be no exception to the general rule. If the Government wills it a number of other papers in addition to the one now prosecuted might be sent to jail, but where the very power of a Government enables it to laugh at other people's mental aberrations, it could afford to pass by and bury them in the limbo of oblivion. What was merely an effervescence, and nobody cared to mind it, would now carefully be read and re-read with undue alacrity for a stupid blunder of judgment. Government is too strong to be shaken by such brag, and it might as well have spared itself the trouble of a prosecution. The Bangabasi may be crushed, but the action of Government will give that paper the dignity of martyrdom in the sight of the outside public.

12. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—The fears that the recent circular of the Government of India forbidding the setting up of newspapers within Residencies and Cantonments, except with the previous permission of the Political Agent, is but a prelude to graver dangers ahead, do seem to be but too well founded. The ill-advised prosecution of a certain vernacular paper in Bengal for alleged sedition and libel may be taken as an indication in that direction. Apart from the question whether the writings in question are calculated to create disaffection towards the Government of India on the part of the subjects, which is sub-judice, Government certainly lays itself open to the charge of weak-mindedness in having undertaken such a prosecution. That a mighty Government like ours, with its foundations deep in the affection and loyalty of the people as a whole, should mind such careless and mad attacks is, indeed, a great misfortune. Though we are far from agreeing with a Bombay daily in the opinion that either way the result of the step will be unfavourable to Government, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that such measures have a fatal facility towards weakening the prestige of Government and towards creating unnecessary uneasiness in the minds of the respectable portion of the Anglo-Indian as well as the Indian press. Rabid and thoughtless writing is to be found here and there in a few journals of both the classes; but they soon find their own level. Government, certainly, need not go out of their way to precipitate that natural operation at the inevitable cost of its own dignity.

13. The same, in another place, writes:—For ourselves we have grave doubts as to how far the words of newspapers have any effect on the public mind. The Indian press is yet in its infancy. It touches only a moiety of the population. It is read by those who have received some education and whose wild nature has been subdued. The martial races, the people likely to be stirred up by idle words, very rarely, if ever, read the newspapers. Hence even when the words are positively inflammatory (we must again say we are speaking on general grounds without any reference to the particular charge against the Bangabasi), they can do little harm. As the Statesman says, a wise Government, conscious of its own strength and rectitude of purpose, should have quietly passed by momentary outbursts of pent-up feelings without any serious notice. Whatever may be the result of the Bangabasi prosecution, the action of Government will be condemned as unwise and ill-advised. In fact, it would aggravate the evil by creating a sort of sympathy for the accused and directing attention once more to the objections to the Consent Act. This measure of Lord Lansdowne's will certainly not add to his popularity, which has been considerably shaken by his policy with regard to Kashmere and Manipur. The eyes of all India will now be fixed upon the trial, and the result will be waited for with anxious interest.

14. In noticing the statement made in a recent issue of the Times of India that the criminal prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper has been undertaken as a test case to see if the existing law furnishes adequate means of dealing with sedition, and that in the event of the failure of the prosecution the law will be altered, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 20th August, says:—If this statement be true, the execution of the alleged intention of Government to modify Section 124 of the Penal Code would be the worst of the several objectionable acts of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration, and would deserve to be strongly protested against. For some time past the policy of His Lordship's administration has been to deal harshly with the vernacular press without possessing the courage to touch it in a direct way. The higher Indian authorities and their Conservative patrons in England are anxious to gag the vernacular papers by passing a law, but are dissuaded from doing it by a fear of the English people, who are as proud of the liberty of the press as they are of the British Constitution, and who know from experience that no other thing than their free press has been so useful to hold the Ministry in its proper course for the welfare of the people. This experience has created a strong desire in them that every country subject to the sway of the British Sovereign should be blessed with a free press. The Indian authorities have tasted the bitter fruits of having once gone against this desire of the English people, and, not willing to be treated similarly, Lord Lansdowne's weak Government is afraid of gagging the vernacular press by direct means, and has, therefore, commenced to adopt indirect ones. A commencement was made in this direction by investing Political Agents with powers to permit or stop newspapers within their jurisdiction, outdoing even the powers of a press-gagging Act. Instead of trying to revive the gagging Act His Lordship wants to improve Section 124 of the Indian Penal Code, and probably this improvement will serve the object His Lordship has in view. The public ought not to tolerate this thrust on the back, and should explain to Government that the proposed suppression of the press would prejudice the interests of the people as well as of the Government.

15. The Gujarâti (83), in its issue of the 16th August, observes:—The Government of India has been committing a series of blunders and some of its recent acts are passing strange, but the latest act has exceeded all bounds. It should be the real policy of the British Government always to respect public opinion, to take people into confidence and allow them to speak out their mind freely. The press is one of the principal factors in the constitution of English administration and has come into importance as the fourth estate, and its duty is to awaken the Government in harsh, strong and unrelenting tones to a sense of its duty when the Government trips. If such criticism the Government here consider as seditious writing, it is sure to fall in the estimation of people and, really, it does not redound to the credit of Government. Natives have the utmost regard for the British administration and think it better than any past or present dominion on account of the great security of life and limb, but still it is not perfect; yet, if any one were to say that the British Government should cease to exist he would make himself the laughing stock of people. Similarly if Government were to charge any one with sedition for criticising its acts it would only bring to light the utter ignorance of its officers, whose advice, if followed, would some day cast an indelible stigma upon the fair name of British administration. The recent acts of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, viz., the restriction on the publication of newspapers in Native States, the Age of Consent Act, the Manipur muddle, and, lastly, the prosecution of the Bangabasi, have made the Government of His Excellency very unpopular and made people suspicious and apprehensive. The Government has committed a great blunder in taking up the prosecution of the Bangabasi and we do not think the English public will support its action. It should be the part of a good Government to always treat with indifference the calumniating remarks which people may make about it, if it is satisfied that it is doing its duty; but if it finds that there is some particle of truth in the grievances and clamours raised against it, it should immediately try to attend to them. But is it good policy to stop people from making complaints by calling it sedition? Does Lord Lansdowne know that he may be called upon to render an account of his stewardship to the British public? Although the people and the Native press do not approve of some of the acts of the British Government, still no one has been so foolish as to wish for the extinction of British dominion in India and to incite the people to sedition against it. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne passed the Age of Consent Act in spite of overwhelming opposition, and the Bangabasi paper, which has been decrying Government interference in social matters, made harsh comments on it, but these certainly do not amount to sedition. In prosecuting the paper the Government has only helped to revive the agitation against that inquisitional Act. If the Bangabasi is charged with seditious writings, may we ask if the Government of Lord Lansdowne has not been guilty of a grave offence by passing the Age of Consent Act and thereby wounding the religious feelings of the people? This has given rise to a fear that the British Government will continue to interfere in the religious rites of the people, and such a feeling is doubtless not conducive to the safety of British Government, and ought not the English nation to prosecute Lord Lansdowne for arousing in the popular mind such feelings of discontent? It is but natural that such conservative papers as the Bangabasi should forget themselves to write in very strong language under these circumstances. If Lord Lansdowne thinks that by the prosecution of one or two such vernacular papers he will be able to silence the rest of the vernacular press he is doomed to disappointment, for they know that he is responsible to the British nation, who can in one moment repeal his arbitrary acts. We merely re-echo the sentiments of the Indian Mirror that we do not care for the result of the Bangabasi prosecution and will continue to criticise the actions of Government as fearlessly as before.

16. The Gujardt Mitrá (84), in its issue of the 16th August, observes:—The extracts quoted from the Bangabasi and relied upon as seditious show that there is nothing disloyal or seditious in them, and the writer has merely censured Government in rather strong language, or at the most abused it; but, certainly, Government has nothing to fear in these days of tranquillity. His Excellency the Viceroy seems to be strongly opposed to the liberty of the Native press because it has been criticising his acts and none expressed its regret at his rumoured retirement. He will probably be glad to know that the Deccan Times of Hyderabad has ceased to exist on account of his recent circular restricting the publication of newspapers in Native States. We cannot imagine what further steps will be taken for the annihilation of the whole Native press before Lord Lansdowne leaves India, but if he really wish to do so we must tell him that the existence of a Government depends on that of newspapers and that the sooner he retires from India the better. Unfortunately, Parliament has been prorogued at this moment, or else the prosecution of the Bangabasi would have excited much adverse criticism. But in order to acquaint the English public with the whole circumstances of the case some Bengali gentleman should proceed to England and hold public meetings, or after the close of the trial publish the whole proceedings of the case in pamphlet form and get them freely distributed in the streets of London.

17. The Rájyabhakta (118), in its issue of the 18th August, observes:—The present policy of the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne will hardly make him popular. It is proved by history that the more a Government tries to curb its subjects the more unruly they get. People might remain quiet for a time on account of the great strength of Government, but a day may come when the smouldering fire would be kindled into a big blaze. This is known from the past history of France, America and other States. America was once governed by England, but on account of the oppression of the rulers she rid herself of England. A rigorous policy has not proved successful in England, Russia, Germany, or even in India in the time of the Moguls. It is true that the policy of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government is not so rigorous as that of some of the States named above, but there is no doubt that he has become unpopular. The Kashmere muddle may date from the time of Lord Dufferin, but Lord Lansdowne's Government has been stigmatised with dethroning the Mahárája. His Government has also come into bad odour for declining to make a reduction in the income-tax although the revenue has increased under that head. His Government has also been the cause of the disturbances at Manipur which resulted in the slaughter of several European officers and the execution of the Manipur princes. The Official Secrets Act and the Age of Consent Act were passed in his régime. His Government recently issued an objectionable circular regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States. All these acts were more or less unpopular, but the recent prosecution of the Bangabasi has greatly increased this unpopularity, and, above all, the action of his Government against the Indian Mirror, which resulted in favour of the paper, has made him most obnoxious. We fear that if this policy continues, it will result not only in making the people miserable but also in jeopardising Government. People seem to look with suspicion upon the conduct of Government on account of its strictness, and in order to show their discontent they have begun to have recourse to unconstitutional measures such as the recent disturbance at Benares. We wish that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne would change his policy in the interests of both the rulers and the ruled.

18. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 16th August, writes :—

The appointment of Mr. Van der Straaten as the Fifth Judge of the Small Causes Court, Bombay.

We notice that two or three of our Native contemporaries have been discussing the recent acting appointment of Mr. Van der Straaten, Registrar of the Bombay Small Causes Court, to the Fifth Judgeship of the same Court. Now, for aught we know, that lucky individual may or may not have in him the germs of turning out a good Judge in the natural course of events. He may be a very able man. He may have conducted his duties as a Registrar of the Court with ability and energy. But the question is whether such qualifications are sufficient for a Judge. We should like to understand the principle on which the appointment is made. If Mr. Van der Straaten could be pitchforked into the position of a Judge, we do not see why Government should not appoint Mr. Watkins, who is a Registrar in the local High Court, to an acting appointment on the bench of the High Court till Mr. Justice Bayley returns from furlough. What is more pertinent, again, to inquire is whether the Bombay Government cared to look into the several applications for Small Cause Court Judgeships, which have been pigeon-holed in some dark recesses of the Judicial Department of the Secretariat. Are there or are there not among those applicants qualified and competent persons who have filled judicial offices before and who could have more fittingly been selected? And have or have they not a prior and juster claim to the acting appointment than Mr. Van der Straaten? We think we can safely say that there are such applicants, and that any one of them could have been fairly selected if the Government had been above perpetrating a job. As an instance, we may mention the name of the Assistant Prothonotary to the High Court. Apart from his position as a barrister, he has more than once acted as a Judge. Some years ago he sat on the bench of the Ahmedabad Small Causes Court for nine months. At another time, only recently, he acted as Fourth Judge of the local Court. How is it that the claims of such a qualified person were ignored? Similarly there are half a dozen other names which we could give. Any one of those persons might have been fittingly employed as Fifth Judge, even temporarily, if the authorities had so chosen. But there is a strange perversity of late in the local judicial appointments which it is amazing to account for, save on the assumption of patronage abused. That is all we can say.

19. In alluding to the powers of a First Class Magistrate recently conferred on Ráo Sáheb Kirpáshankar Bhagwán, Mámlatdár of A'nand, the Praja Mat (117), in its issue of the 15th August, complains that the claims of Ráo Sáheb Náráyanshankar Manishankar and several others, who claim priority both on account of their seniority and their having passed the Higher Standard Examination earlier, have been overlooked, and observes :—Mr. Carvalho, Assistant to Mr. Spence, Acting Commissioner, N. D., should have brought these facts to the attention of his superior, who is new in the office. But it seems that either Mr. Carvalho did not pay proper attention to his work on account of being tired of remaining in the same office for a number of years or that his memory has begun to fail him. It is also unfair to ask Mr. Máneklal Gokuldás to revert to his original post of Chitnis when his junior, Ráo Sáheb Gopálji Gulábbhái, has been appointed Mámlatdár of Mehmadabad. We bring the above facts to the notice of Mr. Spence, who seems anxious to see that the claims of his subordinates for preferment are properly considered, and shall be glad to have an explanation from him on the subject.

A Hindu's view of Christianity, being a reply to the Dnyánodaya newspaper.

20. With reference to the attack recently made by the Dnyánodaya on the Hindu religion and its gods, the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 17th August, retorts as follows:—The Dnyánodaya in finding faults with the Hindu religion behaves like one who while his own house is on fire goes to see the fun of another man's house in flames and to mock at him. Strangely enough, the Dnyánodaya or 'the rising star of knowledge,' in proclaiming, rather vainly, that the religious prejudices of the Hindus are doomed to vanish under the influence of the Western education which they are receiving, forgets that the same good education is undermining Christianity also. Is the Dnyánodaya born to propagate the dogmas of that religion which is the butt of constant attacks by men like Herbert Spencer, Tindal, Huxley and others? Or is its object only to earn a livelihood, which it could hardly earn at home, by telling credulous men a variety of falsehoods and converting a few persons of low castes by holding out hopes of pecuniary gain to them? Do all learned men of America or Europe believe in the resurrection of Christ? Remember the assertion of Saint Paul in which he says that if "Christ be not risen, then is our preaching in vain"! None but credulous people believe that Christ rose after death. Seeing that Christianity has very little influence in civilized countries in the nineteenth century, missionaries are resorting to barbarous African and other countries for the propagation of Christianity. Is it possible that that Western education which is exploding many of the beliefs of the Hindus will make them believe that Christ is the son of God? Are all the gospels at one on the resurrection of Christ and other subjects? They differ from each other because they were written at different times and contain much spurious matter. Look how absurd is the Christian idea of God! Will any man desire that his children should not acquire knowledge but should remain in ignorance? But the most merciful, just and generous god of the Christians leaves his son naked in a garden and tells him to taste the fruit of the tree of life and not that of the tree of knowledge, and when Eve tastes the forbidden fruit and gives a little of it to her husband he becomes red hot with anger and dooms the first pair and its offspring to perdition. Such is the mercy and the justice of the Father in Heaven! If it is objected to this that the curse is not for tasting the forbidden fruit but for disobedience, how can he be called just who for the fault of one condemns his offspring? Look also at the absurd and amusing ideas about the antiquity of the universe and its creation. First there was darkness everywhere and God said "Let there be light" and there was light. Then He created the world in six days and took rest on the seventh. God took rest like men after six days' work! Will any enlightened person believe such stories now that a large number of persons are renouncing Christianity? The Dnyánodaya must remember that Hindus can ridicule Christianity just as the Christians ridicule the Hindu religion. We are firmly of opinion that no people should laugh at others for their religious beliefs, because every religion is more or less faulty. The Dnyánodaya should not, therefore, find faults with the Hindu religion, and if it disregards this warning we shall have to return 'tit' for 'tat.'

A strike of the Ghariwallas at Hyderabad, Sind.

21. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 15th August, writes:—Rather disquieting news comes from Hyderabad. A correspondent writes to say that the Ghariwallas there have struck work and have petitioned the Collector that they have done so in consequence of police oppression. They have raised a subscription amongst themselves for the purpose of engaging a pleader to represent their grievances to the Collector. Whether there has been police zulum or not remains to be seen, but when a body of men are one and all resolved on depriving themselves of their only means of livelihood rather than submit to some alleged oppression, it behoves the authorities to consider and, if possible, to remedy their grievances. But the great misery at present pending the satisfaction of their demands is that the public are seriously inconvenienced, and in Hyderabad the inconvenience ought to be all the greater as other means of conveyance are not available.

22. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 20th August, says:—It has been the practice for several years past with the dealers in Bombay to obtain from Bilimora by sea vinegar produced from the sugarcane juice without any restraint from any official. About a month and a half ago several casks of this vinegar arrived at Bombay, but have been detained by the customs authorities on the ground that the vinegar contained in them is of 8 degrees, and an order has been issued that they are to be removed after it gets of 4 degrees. It took about a month for the reduction of one degree, and it must take about three or four months more before the vinegar arrives at the permissible strength of 4 degrees, while one anna per day is charged for ground-rent. The prohibition for the immediate removal of these casks is issued on the ground that the vinegar can be manufactured into spirit, but at that rate every edible which can be turned into spirit ought to be held under restraint. Moreover, no restraint is placed on the vinegar imported by rail. It is, therefore, to be hoped that the poor owners of these casks will be saved from the loss that threatens to befall them from the customs prohibition.

23. A correspondent, writing from Sinnar in the Násik District to the Indu Prakásh (14) of the 17th August, bitterly complains of want of fodder in that sub-division and of many cattle dying in consequence of rigorous forest rules regarding pasture lands, and says that a tax on fodder did not exist even under the so-called Mogul misrule.

Part II.—Legislation.

24. Referring to the discussion in the Bombay Legislative Council on the New Boilers' Inspection Bill, the Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 16th August, observes:—We are sorry that the language to which Sir R. West gave expression was far from parliamentary. In fact, it was that of a Councillor who knew the strength of the official majority at his back, and who had, besides, the privilege of having the last word on the controversy. His taunts regarding the virtue of modest silence were scarcely in good taste. The honourable member may seem to forget that if any member deserved the charge of inconsistency it was himself, and it was he who ought to have held golden silence instead of vehemently opposing those who knew a good deal about boilers and engines. It is to be regretted that he ignored the opinions of experts. The attitude and utterances of the honourable member come on the impartial public as a disagreeable surprise. If legislation is to be carried out in the spirit and tone displayed by him last Monday, then the sooner the Council is shut up the better. The incident has afforded the latest exemplification of little good that can be done by a Council which pretends to consult non-official opinion on matters on which it is scarcely well-informed, then arrogates to itself universal knowledge and wisdom, and has a large majority to endorse such arrogance and ignorance. We are, indeed, pained to have to say so much on the attitude of Sir Raymond West. He was expected to increase the usefulness of the Legislative Council. But all the same, we should advise the Mill-owners' Association to go courageously forward and represent the hardship of the 37th section to the Viceroy and the Secretary of State for India. The matter ought not to be allowed to rest here; nor should the honourable mover be allowed to have the last word.

Sir R. West and the New Boilers' Inspection Bill in the Bombay Legislative Council.

25. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—The New Boilers' Inspection Bill has now passed into law, though it is a question whether it ought not to be challenged. We think the Mill-owners' Association have strong reasons in their favour for submitting a vigorous representation to His Excellency the Viceroy in Council, and, if need be, to the Secretary of State for India, against the retention of that absurd Section 37. The Bill had to run during the course of the second reading the severe gauntlet of common-sense thrown at the honourable mover by three of the practical non-official members, who know more about the working of boilers than the rest of the members of the Council put together. The stand made by them was, indeed, creditable, and it is a matter of regret that the other three, but inexperienced, non-officials should at the last moment have weakly succumbed to the rhetorical appeal made by Sir Raymond West. When a masterful member of his calibre, after beating a hasty and illogical retreat from his original position, makes an impassioned appeal to get scratch votes on the Government side, we may leave the impartial public to judge of the weakness of the case the honourable member tried to make out in support of the restoration of Section 36 of the old Act in lieu of the objected to Section 37 of the new. Sir Raymond talked of compromise. But where was it? We have never heard of there being a compromise on the principle of a Bill. Compromise in reference to details is intelligible. It shows how unscientifically that little word was bandied about. But having asserted that in principle it is inexpedient to subject prime-movers to an examination by indifferent Inspectors, more or less elementary mechanical engineers than competent experts, it was amazing to see the efforts made by the honourable member to restore a clause which virtually emphasized the condemned principle. As Mr. Javerilál neatly retorted, it was tantamount to abandoning optional inspection, and in the same breath introducing compulsory inspection. And in spite of his very excellent reasoning and the opinions of experts submitted by the Honourable Mr. Forrest, Sir Raymond tried to shift the burden of inconsistency from his own shoulders to those of the honourable members who opposed the clause. This may be considered a unique piece of sophistry in matters legislative; but it is neither fair-minded statesmanship nor practical sagacity. And as to the formidable opinion of the experts, Sir Raymond West's knowledge of boilers was so complete (he is known to be an embodiment of universal knowledge) as that of a cyclopœdist that he simply ignored them! No wonder that he despised those opinions and declared himself a better oracle on the subject! Verily, we have now reached a boiling point in the history of our administration when Sir Raymond could talk of steam chests and boilers as if he had been conversant all his life with the management of boilers and engines. After this it need not astonish anybody if Sir Raymond West can run a race with Brigadier Budgen for the command of the Bombay brigade! Altogether, the debate has made a most unpleasant impression on the public mind. The obstinacy of the Government to cling to its own preconceived opinions and violently resent, as in fact Sir Raymond did, all reasonable and fair arguments put forth by the opposition was quite obvious. This kind of attitude on the part of members of Government in the House of Commons might have brought about a revolution. But we suppose anything and everything could be tolerated in India, where the mediocrities of the administration resent ability and are conceited enough to glory in their own farthing rushlight.

Part III.—Municipalities.

26. The Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 21st August, says:—

The conduct of the Bombay Government with the Bombay Municipality commented upon.

The Bombay Government are trying to shove over to the shoulders of the Bombay Municipality the burden of the local hospitals, educational institutions and the police, threatening the Corporation with the enforcement of the bludgeon clause if any unwillingness is shown by the latter to receive the burden. This raises the fear of the Municipal Corporation being asked sooner or later to take over the expenditure of the local judicial courts and prisons as well, and a commencement was made in this direction when a demand was made on the municipality for the salary of the proposed Fourth Presidency Magistrate. Hitherto it was believed that local self-government had to attend to sanitation alone, and it was never dreamt that the authorities would gradually transfer from their own shoulders to those of municipalities other burdens, causing heavy enhancement of municipal taxation. If such a thing had been known at the time of the maturing of the local self-government scheme, the public would have strongly objected to receive the concession. The present result of this concession, in itself a valuable one, has been brought about by the inadvertency committed in reserving powers to local Governments to make from time to time such arrangements in regard to municipalities as they would think best. This reservation was allowed to be made on the understanding that the authorities would exercise sound discretion and due judgment in this matter and no arrangements that would clash with the interests of the public would be made by them. But, unfortunately, in the case of Bombay this understanding has proved to be wrong. The ratepayers find that local self-government has, instead of benefiting them, actually done them harm, and the authorities ought not to shut their eyes to this phase of their conduct.

27. The Hindi Punch (106), in its issue of the 16th August, gives a cartoon, entitled, "The monsoon mud sports of the Season; or, the Bombay ratepayer, the civic father and the Government," and the letter-press runs as under:—"Ain't it a funny situation, Mr. Punch? The Civic Father rides the submissive ratepayer, and Government in turn straddles the old man! Rather inconvenient and, perhaps, infra dig. for the lord of Urbs prima in Indis, but ain't it death to the poor ratepayer who has to bear the double weight?" The Punch comments on the cartoon, saying:—The Bombay Government is not only going to saddle the municipality with five lakhs of rupees for police charges, but is going to try conclusions with it on the infectious hospital question by putting the bludgeon clause of the Municipal Act into operation.

28. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 17th August, writes:—The Government of Bombay is determined to make itself famous. It has had an inglorious fight with the Presidency Association, and now it is entering upon a war with the Municipal Corporation of Bombay. There has been for a long time a constitutional fight between the Government and the Corporation on various questions of principle, and the Corporation has been having the better of it in argument in almost every case. It is intolerable that this little urchin of a Corporation should bandy words with the Government as to its legal rights and liabilities. The Government bids it pay for such and such objects, and it ought to quietly obey the command. What business has this little brat of yesterday to argue and to discuss and to refuse to obey the behests of the Government? The paternal Government will not stand such insolence, and to show that it is for once in earnest it has set in motion against the Corporation those extraordinary powers of coercion which it has reserved to itself under the Act. These sections, when the Act was passed, were generally expected to remain a dead letter and a superfluous threat. But recent events show what potential capacity for mischief these powers possess, how they may be turned into a vigorous reality, and how such a body as the Bombay Municipal Corporation may be made the victim of their operation. The occasion for the use of what are called the "bludgeon clauses" is the dispute between the Government and the Corporation as regards the liability of the latter to maintain a permanent hospital for persons affected with infectious diseases. Section 61 (g) imposes on the Corporation as one of its obligatory duties the provision of "measures for preventing and checking the spread of dangerous diseases." The words of the clause are wide enough to include every kind of provision, but the Corporation as well as the Government have understood the liability to be limited to the epidemic form of the diseases in question, the sporadic cases being provided for in the general hospitals, viz., the Jamsetji Jijibhoy, the Gokuldás Tejpál and the European General Hospitals. In April 1890 it pleased the authorities of the Jamsetji Jijibhoy and Gokuldás Tejpál Hospitals to close their doors absolutely against cases of infectious diseases. The Government acquiesced in it, and called upon the Corporation to make the requisite provision. The Corporation demurred to be bound to keep up a permanent hospital and thus correspondence was in progress. Eventually in July last the Commissioner reported that there was no epidemic, and the Corporation ordered the hospital to be closed. The Government, therefore, obtained a loan of the hospital building, and conducted it with its own staff. Then a calm followed; but all of a sudden a bolt fell upon the Corporation from a clear sky, in the shape of a notice under Section 518 of the Municipal Act to show cause within one month why the Corporation should not be compelled to maintain permanently an hospital for infectious diseases. In default of the Corporation doing so, the Government will do it for the Corporation under Section 519, and it can reimburse itself under Section 520 by presenting an order to the Corporation's bankers to pay the amount. In this way the boasted independence of the Corporation may be reduced to naught by an arbitrary or overzealous Secretary. This effect of the control clauses was not seriously considered when they were passed in the Legislative Council. In fact, there was a general tacit understanding that they were to remain dormant. The Municipal Corporation of Bombay, it was thought, was too advanced and enlightened a body to need a resort to such clauses by the Government. But the Corporation must now be cruelly undeceived. It may now perceive what treatment it may expect to receive in regard to the other questions on which it is at issue with the Government, viz., primary education and police charges. The control sections make Government the sole judge of the dispute, and the Government, whenever it desires to put its hand into the coffers of the Corporation, has only to issue notices under Section 518. The Corporation may, in this manner, be easily reduced to a mere machinery for collecting taxes and registering the decrees of the Government. The Corporation at its meeting on Thursday last appointed a strong committee to frame a reply to Government. The committee, we doubt not, will make out a strong case. In our view the merits are strong in favour of the Corporation; but even if they were less strong, we should still strongly condemn the step the Government has taken. It bespeaks an utter want of balance in the body of individuals who constitute the Government. The Corporation, though it enjoys delegated power, deserves to be treated with courtesy and respect. It is the essence of local self-government that the chief executive Government creates certain bodies and clothes them with a portion of its own authority. The bodies so created have a sort of co-ordinate existence with the Government, and the latter must pay them the same respect which it expects to be paid to itself. The bodies have, moreover, to be brought up in the ways of constitutional government. What a lesson in constitutional government our Government presents when on any difference of opinion it cannot brook to be argued with, but must at once take up the bludgeon which the law puts into its hand. If a body like the Bombay Corporation is given such treatment, we tremble to think what will be the fate of mofussil municipalities. There will be an end to local self-government if differences of opinion are to be decided by the use of coercion. The resort to the bludgeon will, moreover, recoil on the Government itself. If honest difference of opinion is not to be respected, and if the views of the Government are to be enforced by the use of the bludgeon in each case, why have a farce of government by municipalities? What is the use of keeping up these intermediate agencies of delegated power? Government had better abolish them and govern direct. The gentlemen who accept the honorary work of the so-called self-government are sure to resent such interference. The members of the Bombay Corporation are all men of wealth and enlightenment. There are some among them, indeed, who are fast champions of the Government, and who, in fact, by the very necessity of their position have a bias in favour of Government action. Others there are who are philosophic enough to turn their right cheek to the smiter when they are smitten on the left, but their number is not large. The majority are too independent and sensitive to accept an insult quietly. The action of the Government will break up the entente cordiale which has so long subsisted between it and the Corporation. There will be repeated occasions for friction, a result on which neither the Government nor the Corporation can be congratulated. The ridiculousness of the present action of the Government is all the more aggravated when the occasion for it is taken into account. It is a petty matter of about Rs. 200 a month for which the heavy artillery of the bludgeon clauses has been brought into requisition by the Government. There is no question about the ability of the Corporation to pay. Nor can it be alleged that the Corporation is negligent of its statutory duties. The Corporation has an honest doubt about its liability, and wishes to discuss it with the Government. The Government has no patience with argument. It peremptorily asks the Corporation to obey its mandate on pain of application of force. Surely, Government must be reduced to a desperate state of intellectual impotency when it could find no better means of asserting its views. But, perhaps, the present notice is put forth as a feeler to see how public opinion and the Corporation receive it. There are so many matters on which the Corporation is hopelessly at variance with the Government that the latter probably feels annoyed at the recalcitrance of the Corporation, and it proposes to use the short and swift remedy of force rather than the dilatory one of argument. [The Gujarátí (33), in its issue of the 16th August, expresses similar sentiments.]

29. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 16th August, writes :—It seems that the gulf of feeling is widening between the Municipal Corporation of Bombay and the Government, which is indeed most regrettable on more than one account. Judging from the debates that have taken place on the subject of primary education, police charges and the cost of establishment of the vaccination depôt, it is clear enough that the authorities in power are on the wrong side. Their attitude is neither dignified nor consistent. And as to their position in each of the matters, the Corporation has not only been able to make out a strong case, but maintain its contention. In the matter of primary education it is obvious that Government neglected its duty for years, both as regards sanitary school-houses as well as teaching. The blame for backward progress rests on its shoulders. What did the Educational Department do for years prior to its handing the primary schools to the Municipal School Board ? Absolutely nothing. It starved that education, and it now unjustly turns round and rates the Corporation for its illiberality. The sinner preaches a sermon, which is amazing ! As to police charges, no words of ours are required to characterise their iniquity. Mr. P. M. Mehta has rendered a great service to the ratepayers by the admirable manner in which he placed the whole case before the Corporation in his usual trenchant and argumentative way, with a dash of his customary ridicule and sarcasm. It was no ordinary compliment which a leading European member paid to him on Thursday last as to his unique and wide municipal experience, which on important occasions so immensely influences for good the deliberations of the Corporation. Lastly, the debate on the vaccination depôt was not without its interest. Government has churlishly declined to place at the disposal of the Corporation adequate receipts whereby to maintain education, hospitals, dispensaries and so forth, in flagrant violation of the resolutions and despatches of the Government of India, and, at the same time, left no opportunity to pile on the burden of voluntary contributions. The "bludgeon" clause with which it has now threatened the Corporation will not have the slightest effect on that independent body, which is manfully doing its duty by its citizens. Already it has pointed out in a respectful but firm voice that the Government may do as it pleases. It is at liberty to act arbitrarily and sit in judgment on its own acts. Might is right. But, all the same, the Corporation knows its functions also. And it will see that it votes not a pie for the Gokuldás Tejpál Hospital, for the Jaffer Suleman Dispensary and other like establishments in the next municipal budget. Thus diamond must cut diamond. It is, however, to be hoped that the Government will consult its own dignity by withdrawing from the untenable ground it has taken up and recede with decency. It has already made up its peace with the Poona Municipality, which has shown of what stuff it is made. And it would be the part of wisdom and prudence to act in amity with the local Corporation. Let it remember its past quarrels and the indignity it had to suffer at the hands of the Secretary of State.

30. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 16th August, writes :—It is a matter of profound regret to have to observe the hostile attitude of the present Administration towards the Bombay Municipal Corporation. Evidently, its Chief Secretary is on the war path. Last year it was the Poona Municipality which provoked the wrath of that minor deity. But that masterful organisation was plucky enough and displayed such remarkable strength of facts and arguments that the misguided Government was compelled to sheathe its blade. The opposition which that self-governing body offered to it will certainly be remembered for a long time to come in the annals of local self-government in the presidency. The Poona Municipality may well be proud of its achievement which, we dare say, will be handed down as a glorious tradition from generation to generation by the future civic fathers of the capital of the Peshwas. But having made its peace with Poona, the Government seem to have been puzzled as to how once more to give vent to its pugilistic tendencies. Its occupation would have gone, Othello-like, had it rested awhile smoking the pipe of that humble resignation which Poona offered. But no. The "devil of a choler," as the Frenchman would say, was up. It panted for a new battle-field, possibly to retrieve the laurels lost at the Poona combat. Sedan must be whitewashed by a Waterloo. So to Waterloo it has come, full of authoritative insolence and pampered conceit, forgetful alike of a Wellington and a Blucher. The ultimate result may be con-

So to Waterloo it has come, full of authoritative insolence and pampered conceit, forgetful alike of a Wellington and a Blucher. The ultimate result may be considered a foregone conclusion. But till the battle is fought and won, it is futile to expect the authorities to learn the lesson that a Government has, in the first place, to consult its dignity, and, in the second place, to exercise the virtue of political sagacity and practical prudence. A Government that cannot realise these scarcely deserves the name of Government. Let the Corporation bravely fight out its triangular battles with the short-sighted authorities. Whether the combat has reference to primary education, or to the police charges, or to the discretional charges, the cause for which it is putting forth its whole strength is just. And justice will, at last, triumph. Facts, arguments and equities, its sharpest and strongest weapons, are on its side. These must vanquish its adversary, however powerful he may be. Years ago, too, the Corporation had to deal with a similarly hostile administration. That time the battle waged round the Contagious Diseases' Hospital and its maintenance. The Corporation was ordered to pay Rs. 36,000 for that purpose against its oft-repeated declaration not to maintain it. But the Corporation sat not mute. It made its voice heard in the Council chamber at Westminster. The avenging and slow-footed Nemesis came in the shape of a despatch from the Secretary of State, and the administration had to give way. That was its Sedan. Let the successors of those days remember it. Let them bear in mind lest Sedan may be eclipsed by a Waterloo. More need not be said.

PART IV.—Native States.

The paramount power and the Native States.

31. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—In Káthiáwár new days are dawning. The troop of Vakils, as they are called, that graced the Political Agent's moving camp, wherever he went, and devoured, not unlike locusts, the substance of the Tálukdárs whose dominions they traversed, are a thing of the past. Another great change, scarcely noticed, is that brought about by the extension of the railway system in Káthiáwár. The levelling nineteenth century has created its own engine to remove all absurd inequalities, except those of the three different classes it maintains. And this when introduced into Káthiáwár was a blow to the dignity of the political officers and their establishments. The old pomp and circumstance of the Political Agent's tour have disappeared, except in parts where the railway has not penetrated. The political officer, like any other person, takes his ticket, enters the carriage, arrives at his destination and reaches his quarters near the station. His clerks, who lived at the expense of the States entirely through their tour, who had every comfort, conveyances included, for nothing, and besides charged Government for the batta and pocketed it quietly, have good reason to curse the introduction of the railways, which have done them little good, Heaven knows. A third change, and still more recent, is that introduced by the Government resolution which forbids the use of State carriages and the acceptance of State hospitality. We referred to it some time back in these columns. We are very glad to hear that the Political Agent and his Assistants and their establishments carry out the orders of Government most faithfully. The carriage and pair, without which the political officer never travelled during his tour, and the sowárs before and behind, have disappeared. He travels now in dák shigrams or tongás. It is devoutly to be wished that Government always attended to the well-being of the Native States in the same liberal spirit. We may remind it, for example, that the visits of great personages like Royal Princes or the head of the presidency could not but in the nature of things prove onerous to the minor States. On such occasions there is a grand assemblage at the head-quarters of the Agency. Chiefs that have small incomes, or have run into debt—as very many of them learn to do with fatal facility—do not find the expense of travelling in state to a distant place with a number of followers, and of maintaining themselves there with their retinue for several days, a burden easy to bear. They know it is ungracious to complain, and yet they grieve over the event. The hospitalities among themselves that follow at the station are an additional drain on their purse. They would not abate one jot of the hospitality required of them in return. That would be meanness, according to their notions, and not unjustly, perhaps. The pride of poverty surpasses the vanity of riches; what would they have us do, then? They deplore the false position in which they are placed. When all Chiefs have met together, they would not be guilty of anything so undignified as shirking the duty that devolves on them. All the same, they heartily wish they had not been invited and pressed to attend the Darbár. There is the rub. Their exchequer is not over-flowing, and they desire that they be not called upon every now and then, that is, nearly every other year, to fritter away large sums which they cannot always well spare. It may be easier to point out a grievance than find a remedy for it. The visits of wise rulers at the head of the Government, who want to see things with their own eyes and hear with their own ears, are not thrown away. These visits we would not like to see omitted for any consideration. Some arrangement may, perhaps, be suggested by which States with very small revenues may not on such occasions be burdened with large expense. Government may also see that no unnecessary appointments are made at the expense of the Native States. A person who cannot be provided with as good and snug a berth as he wants anywhere else is at times forced on them. The authority that the Political Agent or the Government has a right to exercise over the States is given, we need not say, for a very different purpose. Because an appointment that would raise a howl in British territory could be made with comparative ease in the Native States, could be no reason for trying the experiment. And yet, we regret to say, it is at times done.

Cannot a Native Chief correspond directly with the Viceroy?

32. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 20th August, writes:—Cannot the Chief of a Native State directly correspond with the Viceroy of India? If he cannot, that is really a great hardship. Suppose a Chief and the British political officer do not pull on well; under the existing rules the Chief can never approach the Viceroy, because, unless each of his communications is approved of by the political officer, it will never be forwarded. We think the rule is unjust and ought to be changed at once.

Disapproval of the order controlling the newspapers in Native States.

33. The Indu Prakdsh (14), in its issue of the 17th August, observes that acts of injustice and oppression being more frequent in Native States than in British territories, the newspapers should have greater liberty in the former than in the latter, and that the Political Agents being all in all in Native States, and the Native Princes being mere puppets in their hands and, in fact, their subordinates, depending for the very continuance of their authority on their good graces, the Government of India have not done well in investing Political Agents with power to suppress newspapers published within their respective jurisdictions. The restraint imposed on the press by the new rules, adds the paper, implies that Government suspect much mismanagement and confusion in the administration by the Political Agents that cannot bear light, and that they desire that they should not be exposed. Such curtailment of the freedom of the press is very derogatory to the good reputation of the British Government, which is understood to be a stanch champion of individual liberty, and it is highly desirable that the Government of India should reconsider this question and repeal the rules, and in the event of the said Government being unwilling to do so, the Secretary of State for India should, without fail, give the matter his best consideration and condemn the action of the Government of India. [The Shri Shivaji (65), in its issue of the 14th August, expresses similar sentiments.]

Condemnation of the sentences passed by the Government of India on the Manipur princes.

34. The Gujardti (83), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—The Government of India have, at last, pronounced their final verdict upon the guilt of the unfortunate Manipur princes and the other prisoners who were alleged to have been more or less connected with what will be handed down to posterity as the Manipur Tragedy. From the manner and spirit in which Government seemed to have managed the whole Manipur business and instituted a Military Court for the trial of the members of the ruling family, some people did not expect them to accord even the scanty indulgence that has been now shown to the so-called rebels. Apart from the perfunctory and unsatisfactory nature of the entire proceedings, in which the accused were placed at a serious disadvantage, we think the sentence of hanging pronounced on the Senápati and the Tongal General will strike many as savouring of a spirit of retaliation. The Tongal General was more than ninety years old, and, even assuming it as proved beyond doubt that he was primarily responsible for the massacre of Mr. Quinton and his party, it should be remembered that he was a barbarian; and it appears to us scarcely humane to have applied to his conduct the same rigid principles of right and wrong which would naturally hold good in the case of the leaders of a more civilized power—principles which even our own Government have not over-scrupulously followed in this unfortunate Manipur affair. The unlucky officers who fell victims to the unbridled fury and indignation of the Manipur soldiery, themselves courted the disaster to a large extent, and the Senápati who had grave provocation was entitled to more consideration at the hands of the British Government. It is not yet satisfactorily proved that Manipur is not an independent State, and we doubt if any Englishman or European had been in the Senápati's position he would not have acted in the precise manner that he did towards the representatives of a foreign power which had no business to interfere in the domestic quarrels of another State. The Senápati was, after all, a barbarian, centuries removed from the civilization of our ruling power. If our enlightened Government had dealt with him with greater consideration and generosity, they would have raised themselves higher in the estimation of the public both in this country and outside, and made us all forget their blunders. We are sorry they have lost a golden opportunity and that these blunders have after mature deliberation been perpetrated in red blood. It required a very powerful and sagacious mind and a broad and humane heart to adequately survey the present and future position of affairs and win the good opinion and sympathy of the world by an act of noble generosity and humanity towards an injured foe. Such humane and far-seeing statesmanship is, however, not to be found at this moment in high quarters. The Jubráj, who was merely a puppet in the hands of the principal actors, and the third brother, Sama Henjaba, who were condemned to death by the trying court, are to be transported for life and to forfeit their property. This is also a harsh punishment, which is scarcely justified by the nature of their guilt. Greater leniency could have been easily shown towards them without going against the strict equities of the case. The executioners and the sentry who were condemned to death by the model court which inquired into their guilt are to be transported during pleasure of the Indian Government. A grain of clemency is better than cruelty or positive inhumanity, and this is all that we can justly say about the decision arrived at by Government. We cannot possibly congratulate them on their foresight or generosity. The Tongal General and the Senápati have already been executed. The rest of the prisoners are no longer in heavy suspense, and must now endure the sad fate that has overtaken them through the strange ordinances of Providence as a punishment for their imprudence in dealing with an all-powerful Government, which, if so minded, can make and unmake rulers and princes within less than twenty-four hours.

35. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—We think the general opinion will be that the sentences passed on the Manipur princes are rather severe. The provocation given by the British officers, the former relations of the State with the Government of India, and last, not least, the position of the prisoners, have not been considered in passing them. However much we may feel for the deaths of Mr. Quinton and others, whatever be our bias against the prisoners, it is unquestionable that we must not lose sight of the aggravating circumstances which drove them to desperation. Indeed, one cannot say that they were meek innocent lambs and therefore wholly guiltless. But it should be remembered that they have had not a fair trial at Manipur. It would, therefore, have been better if they had been immured in some remote fortress to repent of their folly. To be candid, there is a touch of vindictiveness in the sentences, and the magnanimity of the British is not conspicuous in this matter.

36. The Madrdita (5), in its issue of the 16th August, writes:—We are glad that the sentence of death passed upon the Regent and his younger brothers has been commuted to transportation for life and forfeiture of property. In the case of minor actors the sentence has been commuted to transportation during the pleasure of Government. We wish the lives of the Jubráj and the old General had also been spared. Mercy never harms. The Government of Lord Lansdowne would, certainly, have added to the prestige of the British Government by such an act of clemency. But, on the whole, no one can deny that Lord Lansdowne has not allowed himself to be carried away by the blood-thirsty counsels of the irresponsible advisers of Government who were urging him to spare no one. Now the great question remains, "What to do with Manipur?" Let us see how Lord Lansdowne disposes of it.

37. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 17th August, writes:—As a matter of policy it was, perhaps, necessary to make an example of Tekendrajit and the Tongal General, but we should have preferred to see them tried by court-martial and blown off from the cannon's mouth if necessary, rather than subjected to a trial, which was little better than a farce, and then dealt with like civil convicts. If they have been instrumental in shedding British blood it is proper they should forfeit their lives for it, but they ought to have been treated as military prisoners. The form of trial was hardly such as to inspire respect or confidence. As to the other prisoners the same remarks apply.

38. While writing on the Manipur affairs, the Jagadhitechchhu (38), in its issue of the 15th August, draws the attention of the Native Princes to the conclusion of the Manipur trials and advises them to take a lesson therefrom and to follow always the suggestions made to them by Political Agents and to revere the paramount Government. The paper considers that much injustice has been done to the Manipur princes, and expresses a hope that the action of the Government of India will be severely reprimanded when Parliament re-opens.—The Arunodaya (20) of the 16th August thinks that the conclusion of the Manipur trials is likely to inspire the minds of the Native Chiefs in India with fear and hatred of the paramount Government. The Nizám, the Holkar, the Scindia, the Gáikwád and other Chiefs have, no doubt, become quite harmless, but there is great likelihood of their being much terrified at a Chief like themselves being executed or sent to the Andamans as a mean offender by the paramount Government. We have, however, much pleasure to tell these Chiefs that no Indian Chief is likely to meet with the same treatment as the Manipur Chief has received. But we are of opinion that Government would have shown generosity if they had let the Manipur criminals go scot-free.

39. The Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 20th August, observes:—The treatment of the Manipur princes by the Government of India has from the beginning been open to objection. If Government wanted to give them a fair trial an independent judge should have been appointed to try them instead of investing military men with that power. It is also said that the princes were not provided with proper legal assistance to defend themselves. The Manipur affairs were freely discussed in Parliament, and from what Lord Ripon said on that occasion in favour of the State and the princes, it was believed that the extreme penalty of law meted to the princes by the Special Commission would not be confirmed by the Government of India. But it seems Government have taken this opportunity of the prorogation of Parliament to publish their verdict. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is, no doubt, noble-minded, but he seems to have been misled by selfish officers and selfish newspapers; but this will throw a blot on his administration, while his advisers will remain in the dark. The Regent and his youngest brother have been transported for life, but it ought to have been remembered that they were mere tools in the hands of the Jubráj. There is no precedent on record of capital punishment being meted to princes, and we are sorry for the fate of the Manipur princes.

40. The Gujardt Mitra (84), in its issue of the 16th August, approves of the commutation of the sentence of death to one of transportation for life and forfeiture of all property passed on the Regent of Manipur and his youngest brother, and observes:—It would have been much better if the sentence of death passed by the Special Commission on the Jubráj and the Tongal General had also been commuted to one of transportation for life, because, by doing so the public would have spoken highly of British clemency, while the offenders would have been subjected to lifelong misery and penitence for their brutal act. We recommend the Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to bring the two prisoners to Rájkot in Káthiáwár or to a similar place and to execute them in the presence of the Native Chiefs of India in order to convey a warning to them; but we are sure that our suggestion will not be accepted by Lord Lansdowne, as he does not care for public opinion. We also remind him that he need not be afraid of an explanation being asked for by Parliament. Like many of our contemporaries we think that His Excellency the Viceroy seems to have considered the prorogation of Parliament a favourable opportunity for disposing of the Manipur muddle and for undertaking the prosecution of the Bangabasi. But we request His Excellency to pay better attention to public opinion hereafter. [The Satyavakta (121) of the 15th August and the Nyáyadarshak (115) of the 17th idem also disapprove of the sentences passed on the Manipur princes.]

41. The Rájyabhakta (118), in its issue of the 18th August, observes:—The Anglo-Indian papers might praise the decision of the Indian Government in the case of the Manipur princes, but we never thought that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne would be so forgetful of mercy. The Manipur affairs created great sensation even in England, and it was hoped that Lord Lansdowne would show clemency, but as soon as Parliament was prorogued he passed the final orders. The conduct of his Government in this case has shown that it has not the nobility of mind to submit quietly to any rebuff. It also teaches a lesson to Native Princes that they are not competent to protect themselves, and that if they ever try to do so they will surely meet with the fate of the Manipur princes. The best course for the preservation of Native States is to humour Residents and Political Agents.

42. The Ahmedabad Times (91), in its issue of the 19th August, regrets that the Indian Government should have passed final orders regarding the Manipur princes and put them into force when the Manipur question was pending in Parliament, and observes:—Probably the princes did not deserve to be shown any mercy, but they deserved at least fair treatment, because it was the arbitrary action of the British Government which gave them a cause to murder British officers. His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is labouring under an error if he thinks that by confirming the capital sentence passed on the Jubráj and the Tongal General he will deter other Native Princes from taking such a bold step. This will only serve to make these princes less loyal and will prevent them from rendering hearty assistance to Government in time of need. Unfortunately, Parliament also did not check His Excellency, because there was a majority of Conservative members. We wish that the management of the Manipur State would be handed over to the ex-Mahárája.

43. The Pársi Tikdhár (116), in its issue of the 15th August, observes:—It was really an unfortunate hour when the Manipur princes murdered the innocent British officers, because they have thereby brought Native valour into disgrace. A sentence of capital punishment was never before passed on a Native prince, and therefore the fate of the Jubráj and the Tongal General has created a panic in the country. The recent Manipur affair teaches a lesson to Native Princes that they should always be guileless in their friendship with Government. India was once very powerful on account of its honesty and valour, but she has recently lost her strength and become dependent mainly on account of her dishonesty and intriguing ways.

Approval of the sentences passed on the Manipur princes.

44. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 15th August, writes:—It may be stated that the punishments inflicted on the Manipur princes must now commend themselves to the approval of all right-minded persons and satisfy the most exacting critic. The dignity of the law has been vindicated and the retribution following on its breach is of sufficient consequence to convey a timely reminder to all Native Princes of the serious liabilities they incur in trifling with the majesty and prestige of the British Government. [The Kávide Mumbai (110), in its issue of the 17th August, expresses similar sentiments.]

Grievances of the people in the Porbandar State.

45. A correspondent of the Rájyabhakta (118), in its issue of the 18th August, observes:—The market at Porbandar has been closed for a month, though a few shops have been opened for the convenience of the poor people. The people of this State are greatly disappointed to find that Ráo Bahádur S. P. Pandit, the Administrator, does not attend to their grievances, and think of taking further steps in the matter. It is said that though several complaints have been made against a Mámlatdár, no inquiry appears to have been made since he is still retained in office. A complaint was made by one Khima Thakkar about three months ago, but the same has also remained undisposed of, and the delay merely increases the difficulty of adducing evidence. Gambling, debauchery and thefts are also said to be rife in the town of Porbandar.

A complaint against the imposition of a grazing fee on the Pinjrapol cattle by the administration of the Porbandar State.

46. A correspondent of the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 21st August, says:—The Mahájans of Porbandar have objected to the grazing fee imposed anew by the Administrator of that State on the cattle of the local Pinjrapol. The Mahájans petitioned the Administrator to remove the fee, and, on his refusal to do so, have closed their shops. It is nearly a month since the shops were closed, but in order to save the poor from inconveniences, articles of ordinary consumption are allowed to be sold in the Mahájanvádi, while the public bazar is kept closed. The imposition of the "Pánchari" or grazing fee on the Panjrapol cattle is quite against the rule sanctioned by Mr. Lely, the late Political Agent of Káthiáwár. Since the transfer of the administrative powers from the Rána to the administration the right of grazing cattle in the forests without any fees has been taken away from the people, and several new taxes have been imposed, the principal of which are the house-tax and the stamp-fees. One of the reasons for the imposition of the new taxes is said to be a desire to recoup the State for the losses sustained in carrying on proceedings in connection with the confusion in the Public Works Department of the State. Mr. Purshottam Mávji has been despatched by the Mahájans to represent their complaint to the Political Department, and if no satisfactory reply is received, they intend to send a deputation to the Political Agent with a representation on the subject signed by the members of the different castes in the State.

1. The Berár Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 17th August, writes :—

Remarks on the decision of the India Government in regard to the sentences passed on the Manipur Princes.

We have now without option to bow down to the final decision given by the Government of India in regard to the Manipur princes. No further appeal can lie against the judgment of the Viceroy in Council. It is useless to weep over their unhappy fate, but we are firmly of opinion that their fault was due to the blunders of the English meddlers in the internal dissensions of the Manipur State. Their interposition was, besides, inopportune and uncalled for. It was inopportune because the Mahárája in exile was let alone to brood over the wrongs done him by his brothers. It was uncalled for because there prevailed afterwards peace and amity. Mr. Quinton's march into the capital of the State was, besides, ill arranged. The darbár was an invention to imprison the Senápati in his own palace. The trial for the bloodshed that followed in the desperate attempt of the Senápati to defend his person from deportation, was of the nature of a military court guided by the laws of civil justice. The Court was presided over by a Judge who understood justice from war affairs and learnt bravery from judicial proceedings. Besides, the Manipur princes were not better than dead creatures. We craved for their lives being spared because we thought that no such tragedy was necessary to establish British prestige after the absolute occupation of that State by the English army.

2. The same newspaper writes :—The Manipur history is not without its moral. Upon prudential considerations we should say that the Manipur princes deserved the punishment meted to them. There are very few Native States left unannexed to the English dominions. The Government of India is ever ready to step in and to mend the wrong matters in these States with the aid of their Political Agents and Residents. The Manipur rebels lacked in those manly qualities that esteem honour and good name more than the mere preservation of life. To them life was more dear than their own honour. They preferred to die an ignominious death when they ought to have been perfectly certain of capital punishment for the bloodshed of English officers. The Rájas and Mahárájas should bear in mind that their thanks are due to the British nation who allowed them to enjoy royalty, and they would be considered to thankfully appreciate the noble gift if they would rule over their principalities with credit to themselves and happiness to the rayats.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Sir John Gorst on British rule in India.

1. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—Addressing the successful students at the Cooper's Hill College, Sir John Gorst referred to British rule in India as "a unique example of the government of one nation by another entirely for the advantage and interest of the subject people." This is cant, pure and simple. India is retained primarily for the benefit of England. No one could reasonably complain, if England were to make the most of an empire won by her exploits and courage and retained in peace, security and contentment by her wisdom. The ruling race would be more than human if it were to take all the trouble and undergo the risk of governing this country only for the good of the natives. If the motive had been so nobly and so superhumanly unselfish, England might have departed, bag and baggage, from India when her ungrateful sons rose in mutiny thirty years ago and killed every Englishman, woman and child they could lay their hands upon. Let us have none of this silly cant, which is as ludicrous as the professions of love by Lancashire manufacturers to Indian factory operatives and their solicitude for their welfare. England retains India for her own good, and England's retention of India is the great good fortune of India.

2. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 24th August, writes:—Sir John Gorst, in addressing the students of the Cooper's Hill College the other day, observed that the British governed India entirely for the benefit of that country. How extremely philanthropic! When an Under Secretary of State indulges in such clap-trap, which he must know is quite wide of the mark, what justice or fair-play can India hope to get at the hands of her rulers? All the treasures of Indian royal houses which have been conveyed to England during the conquest have been taken away for the benefit of India! The Kohinoor which adorns the Royal diadem of England has also been carried away for the benefit of India! The salaries and pensions, too, which England's sons get from India are all for the benefit of India alone! The Cooper's Hill College is maintained at a cost of nearly £40,000 only for the benefit of India! How silly of people to think that it was going to be abolished! And does not Sir John Gorst himself get his £1,500 a year all for the benefit of India? Could philanthropy go further? Long live Sir John Gorst!

India's demands on Government.

3. The same newspaper contains an article on "the demands of the Indian people," in which it says:—We do not ask that the Indian National Congress should be turned into an Indian Parliament, because we know that we are not yet fitted to have our own parliament, and that the British rulers would not accede to this demand if we made it. What we pray for is that Government may fulfil the promises made by them when they deprived us of native rule. In the proclamation which was promulgated in 1818 on the conquest of Bájiráo Peshwa's dominions, an assurance was given that the British Government would continue the grants and donations made by the former rulers. But the Inám Commission, which has by its strange decisions reduced to penury hundreds of noble families, has quite nullified this assurance. So also was it notified in the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 that steps would be taken to leave undisturbed the people's attachment to their lands. But the system of survey and land assessment adopted by Government is threatening to reduce the people to the condition of mere tenants. There is famine in Madras at present, and it is said that poor cultivators are leaving their homes and lands and wandering in search of bread, and that opportunities are thereby offered to other people to occupy their lands. Similar was the case in this province during the last famine. This shows that a feeling of instability has been given rise to in the minds of the people in connection with their lands. Examinations have been prescribed for Kulkarnis and their object is to make the vatans or hereditary landed properties of these village servants unstable like Government service. In short, Government intend ultimately to establish that the country is their own property in every way and that the people are merely Government's tenants. This is what we do not want. We are your subjects. You should make it possible for us to conduct ourselves without any inconvenience as your subjects, and if we transgress our duty you may be harsh towards us and we will not grudge at such treatment. But do not make us mere tenants or slaves, we pray. You are our rulers and you may well charge us with a small tax as your due. How long have we been clamouring that the cost of the Secretary of State for India is useless and should not fall on us? When you first established your rule over us, abolishing several oppressive imposts of the former rule, we were very happy and blessed you. But have you not of late imposed various new taxes which we never even dreamt of? Did anybody know of a duty on salt in 1818? Did anybody think of stamped paper? Did any one believe that the poor people would have no right to touch even a blade of grass in the forests? Did any one foresee that the country would have to pay about fourteen hundred thousand rupees to the Amir of Afghanistan to keep him quiet? Did any body even dream that the country would be charged with the expenses incurred in subjugating Burma while Burmese treasures would be carried to England? In short, all these are new and unheard-of things, and our forefathers never had an idea that these burdens would fall on the shoulders of their grandsons and great-grandsons. This ignorance was the real cause of the English having encountered no impediments in the establishment of their dominion and of some sensible Natives having thought well of their rule. If our forefathers were now to come down from heaven they would be very sorry to discover their mistake. If they be accompanied by Sir John Malcolm, Mountstuart Elphinstone and other English officers, the latter would feel extremely humiliated and would not raise their heads to reply to our questions. The agreements or promises thus broken were not between man and man, but between nation and nation. The breaches have been gradual and have during the last century and a half grown into a mountain, under the weight of which we are being crushed. We do not now ask you to give back our dominion, for that would not be a right thing from a political point of view. What we want is that we may be permitted to be in the same condition in which we were under Native rule. Do away with the duty on salt and the income-tax, repeal the severe forest laws and free us from those charges which have been saddled on us for the sake of gratifying the whims of English statesmen or preserving the dignity of the British Government. This is not a demand for anything new, but is only a request to you to fulfil your own promises, made expressly or impliedly. We need not say that one who has any regard for honesty keeps his word; for though in ordinary calculations four and four make eight, in politics the sum sometimes amounts to six and sometimes to ten and a half.

Reflections on the British Government in India.

4. The Makrátta (5), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—It cannot have escaped the notice of careful observers of things passing around them, that day by day signs are developing on all sides which presage the revival of, or rather reversion to, what we call in Maráthi 'Lyttonsháhi' in its full swing, shorn, perhaps, of its redeeming features. Darwin in his admirable 'Descent of Man' has dwelt at considerable length on the principle of 'reversion,' whereby a variation or peculiarity long cast off, having ceased to serve its purpose, is again revived or reverted to in a far-off descendant. Similar has been the case with the spirit and policy of the Indian Government. Lord Ripon, and to a great extent Lord Dufferin, followed certain liberal and broad-minded lines of policy, which, in addition to appeasing the minds of the people, added to the well-being of the nation. Those lines and traditions seem now to be completely departed from; and there is apparently a serious and well-determined effort in high administrative quarters to imitate the steps, the taking of which involved Lord Lytton's Government in India and Lord Beaconsfield's Government in England in such dreadful disaster. The gagging of the press in Residencies and Cantonments; the undertaking of questionable and weak-kneed prosecutions for sedition and libel and contempt of court; the inadvisable execution of semi-independent Chiefs for rebellion and murder of unwise British officials under strong provocation; their trial under the sections of the Penal Code, applicable only to British India; the emphasising of the ultimate principle of 'Might is right,' under the garb of a sanctioned declaration that under no circumstances are the sacred bodies of British officers to be touched by any subject of the Native States, however strong the provocation and however peremptory the orders of the State authorities ;—these are a few of the latter-day illustrations of that tendency to reversion which Darwin expatiates upon as prevailing within the domains of animal kingdom. If the policy thus deliberately entered upon be faithfully carried out, as there are strong confirmatory indications, by putting a kind of gag on the whole Indian press, the Liberal party at the next general election, not far distant, may have an additional plank to their political platform, as they had in the general election of 1880. What is even more remarkable, the revival of conservative and narrow-minded traditions in the highest quarters is immediately inherited by local Governments. The same contrast that strikes one's observant eye between the spirit of Lord Ripon's and partly Lord Dufferin's rule on the one hand, and His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's on the other, is faithfully reflected in the respective careers of Lord Reay and Lord Harris in Bombay, and of Lord Connemara and Lord Wenlock in the Southern Presidency. As far as we can judge from a distance, a similar remark applies to the North-West Provinces and Oudh. If current local opinion is to be trusted, it is only in Bengal that we find a happy continuation of the content-producing policy of Sir Steuart Bayley by his successor Sir Charles Elliot. Sir Charles, however, is only in the first year of his régime, and it is yet too early to say whether the liberal traditions of his predecessor will be faithfully adhered to to the end or broken through. The atmosphere of Bengal is peculiarly unfavourable to the maintenance of such a policy, tainted as it is by the imperious odours emanating from the doings and sayings of the Supreme Conservative Government. One must be endowed almost with an adamantine individuality to keep one's self free from those tempting influences, and it remains to be seen how far Sir Charles answers the test. He has certainly begun well, and let us fervently pray he will end well. Unfortunately, we have had different experiences nearer home. Whatever difference of opinion there may exist as regards the actual and immediate good that India derives, or has hitherto derived, at the hands of the Conservatives and Liberals, respectively, when long in office, there can, we suspect, be no two opinions on one point. The selections of the latter party are in nine cases out of ten far happier than those of the former. Look at the bright array of distinguished names like those of Lord Northbrook, Lord Ripon, Lord Dufferin, Lord Reay, Mr. Ilbert, Sir Evelyn Baring, &c., on the one hand, and contrast it with the present incumbents of these high posts, and you are at once struck with the inherent superiority of the one set over the other. And this is no wonder. However much Conservatives may endeavour to walk into the shoes of their Liberal contemporaries, either under the tutelage of leaders like the protean Beaconsfield, or in forced company with Liberal Unionists as at present, there can be no manner of doubt that the watchword of the one party being progress, while that of the other is aggrandisement, the first party naturally attracts to itself all the progressive element in the country, and the shadow of that element is naturally reflected in the measures it generally adopts, including nominations to responsible posts in this country. As to what policy does or will do ultimate good to the country at large, the lulling one of the Liberals or the exciting one of the Conservatives, is a question too complicated to solve for 'mediocrities.'

Remarks on the administration of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne.

5. The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 22nd August, observes:—The necessity for appointing a Parliamentary Committee to inquire into the condition of India has been admitted on all hands, and this fact proves that the British administration here is not carried on in a satisfactory manner. Lord Lansdowne has not done during the period of two years and a half that he has been in India a single act of which he can well be proud or which has pleased the public. The officials who in the time of Lord Dufferin were opposed to the National Congress movement received encouragement to bring forward the Official Secrets Bill, which Government have only shown their weakness in passing. The Act has not produced the desired effect, since the semi-Government organs have been freely publishing all kinds of confidential correspondence of Government as before. Soon after the passing of this Act, His Excellency the Viceroy issued the objectionable circular regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States. Lord Lansdowne also confirmed the capital sentence passed on two of the Manipur princes, soon after the prorogation of Parliament, although the case was under parliamentary discussion. The last act of His Excellency's Government is the prosecution of the Bangabasi. Judging from all these acts one must say that His Lordship's administration has not been satisfactory, and that the sooner it is changed the better. Lord Lansdowne would have become very popular if he had followed the policy of Lord Ripon. He, however, has neither reduced the income-tax and the duty on salt, introduced any schemes of local self-government, nor tried to revive the import duties on cloth or to improve the condition of the rayat.

6. The Ahmedabad Times (92), in its issue of the 26th August, observes:—The policy of Lord Lansdowne seems to be more oppressive than that of Lords Lytton and Dufferin. Yakubkhan, the ex-Amir of Kabul, was in the time of Lord Lytton sentenced to be held as a State prisoner for murdering some of the British officials, while two of the Manipur princes have been sentenced to death and others transported for life in the réyime of Lord Lansdowne, who is said to have threatened to resign office in case his decision was not approved of by the Secretary of State for India. The prosecution of the Bangabasi under Section 124 of the Indian Penal Code, undertaken by the Government after Parliament was prorogued, seems to be a worse measure than even the Press Gagging Act. By passing the Official Secrets Act and issuing the objectionable circular regarding the publication of newspapers in Native States, Lord Lansdowne has deprived the press of some of its liberty, while the Age of Consent Act directly interferes with the religious rites of the people. All these acts of His Excellency have tended to make him unpopular. The Native Princes and the Native press are both conducive to the permanence of the British dominion in India. We request Parliament in the interest of British rule to prevent Lord Lansdowne from carrying on his present policy in future and to keep a keen eye over his administration.—In another place the same paper observes:—The Anglo-Indian papers are greatly opposed to the Natives and therefore freely write against them, and it is to be regretted that the Imperial and the Provincial Governments should be solely guided by such disloyal papers, and we fear that Government will come one day into trouble.

7. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—

The resolution of the Government of India on the formation of fuel and fodder reserves and the Agricultural Department.

The resolution of the Government of India, dated Simla the 15th July last, on the subject of the formation of fuel and fodder reserves, is one more instance of the administrative working with a rigid regard to red-tapeism and scant attention to the welfare of the people. To the inventive genius of the Government India owed several departments of questionable utility, to which a decade ago the Revenue and Agricultural Department was added, of course with the ostensible object of improving the material condition of those directly or indirectly engaged in agriculture. How far the creation of the department has benefited the country it is not for us to say, though it is a matter of common experience that since the institution has been launched under the pompous title the periodical famine has lost none of its rigour and that cattle die by thousands in times of scarcity. The department has confined its operations to a few experimental farms, the results of which, it is scarcely exaggeration to say, have borne no fruit in the shape of suggesting reforms to the ignorant peasant in the primitive mode of agriculture. It cannot be denied that the department issues annual reports, but can it be reasonably hoped that the information contained therein comes within the ken of the unlettered rustic? Does the Agricultural Department ever circulate translated copies of its reports among those peasants who do not know English but are acquainted with the vernaculars? Has it ever cared to collect statistics which can give, to those unacquainted with the actual condition of the cultivating classes, an idea of the kind of life they lead and the hard struggle they have to make for existence? Has it been ascertained that in most rural districts the labourers who work for wages, and commonly pass by the name of coolies, get in some cases only an anna each per day, out of which a family of five persons has to be provided with food and raiment? Is not the number of the cattle that die of starvation when there is a scarcity of water and fodder great? Can the department supply statistics which may help to show the yearly mortality among the agricultural cattle? It is no use multiplying such queries when the kind of work the department does is well known. If it can conserve and foster the interests of the agricultural population by giving an idea of the actualities of their condition and guarding them as well against the encroachment of the Forest Department upon their rights as against the exacting demands of the Settlement Department, it can justify its raison d'être. Otherwise it is little short of a lumber department created to make provision for a beneficed bureaucracy. If the statistics, the want of which we have seen and which it is within the sphere of the Agricultural Department to collect, had been available, we could have known if the increased assessment owing to revised settlements which are carried on in the country is fair and justifiable, though it can be clear even to a casual on-looker that in the absence of any material improvement in the condition of the cultivating class any enhancement in the old rate is scarcely expedient or equitable. These observations forced themselves to our notice on reading the resolution of the Government alluded to above. Nearly eight years ago the Government of India asked for the advice and co-operation of local Governments as to the action which should be taken for the better protection of the cattle of the country during seasons of drought, and at the same time indicated the general outlines of the scheme which seemed most likely to secure the desired result. The scheme referred to had for one of its objects the extended growth and reproduction of the fodder trees and bushes on which Indian cattle are so largely dependent for food-supply in years of scarcity, as well as encouraging the people to store more carefully the grass produced in their fields, and, where possible, to store hay. It was enquired whether in some cases land could not be purchased for the above purpose, and information was called for which would indicate how far the cattle in each district required protection, the extent of waste land available, and the best means of managing any land which would be set apart for the purpose. It is nearly a decade since the Agricultural Department has been in existence, and it is curious that the information of the kind called for should not have been in its possession. Yet it appears so from the resolution under notice, in which the Government of India, writing on 18th July last, say that the replies "now before them" of the local Governments and Administrations, addressed on 1st March 1883, are still "incomplete." But to afford no cause for disappointment, the inevitable remark follows that the Government of India are convinced that "the subject deserves to be further analysed and studied in greater detail before it is safe (sic) to draw any final conclusions"! Indeed, the department seems so jealously watchful of the interests of the agricultural community that even eight years have not sufficed to give them a substantial and protective measure. The further analysis and study to be made of the replies of the local Governments before any "final" conclusion can be drawn may take another decade, and it would then be worth while enquiring as to the lot of field animals carried off by sheer starvation in years of drought! It is needless to say that cattle form the mainstay of the Indian peasant, who is a two-fold sufferer in a year of scarcity by the heavy mortality among the cattle and the depressive cessation of field work. If the department created to protect him against the worst consequences of famine can fail to do its essential duty, it is hard to understand for what earthly good it exists.

Complaint about want of fodder for cattle.

8. The Chandrásha (25), in its issue of the 23rd August, complains of want of fodder in the Tásgaon subdivision of the Sátára District owing to a scanty rainfall, and prays that with a view to save the agriculturists' cattle from death Government may permit people to graze their cattle free of charge in the reserved forests.—The Rámdás (61), in its issue of the 22nd August, also complains of the new forest arrangements being fatal to cattle, and says that the people have, either through ignorance or other reason, quietly submitted to the duty on salt, high land assessment and the ruinous ábkári laws, but have clearly perceived the oppression of the Forest Department and the income-tax and the necessity for making special and united efforts to get redress from it.

9. The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 22nd August, observes:—Since the British conquest of India there has been tranquillity throughout the country, but the British military force is disproportionate to the population and extent of the country, and as foreign enemies have always an evil eye upon the country it is proper that in the interests of the State the Arms Act should be repealed and Natives should be given military education. In India there are several gallant races like the Maráthas, the Panjábis, the Sikhs, the Káthis and others, who will be but too willing to fight for their country if they be provided with arms and given military education.

A request to Government to repeal the Arms Act and to give military education to Natives.

10. In alluding to the reply given by His Excellency Lord Wenlock, Governor of Madras, to the Bellary municipal address, the same newspaper regrets that His Lordship should have commenced his tour in the distressed districts so late, and observes:—It seems that Lord Wenlock, in considering the famine to be less distressful than the people thought it to be, has been misled by the misrepresentations of his subordinates, who are generally in the habit of making light of distressing times, which is very discreditable to those officers. His Lordship is very probably under a delusion, as was Sir Richard Temple in 1877, and we request His Excellency to appoint a commission to find out the true state of affairs in his presidency. [The Gujardt Darpan (83) and the Hindusthán (108), in their issues of the 23rd August, and the Broach Mitra (97), in its issue of the 26th idem, express similar sentiments.]

Remarks on the reply of His Excellency Lord Wenlock, Governor of Madras, to the Bellary municipal address.

11. The Jáme Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 26th August, says:—It is an undoubted fact that the Arbitration Court at Poona has proved a decided success. An account of the proceedings of this Court for the past year, read at a public meeting held on Saturday last at Poona under the presidency of Dr. Pollen, C.S., shows that this Court worked satisfactorily last year as it did in the previous fifteen years of its existence. At this meeting it was resolved to memorialize the Bombay Government, submitting a draft of a Bill for the extension of this Court to the remaining parts of the presidency and praying it to forward the draft, with its recommendation to pass it into a law, to the Supreme Government. Such a law as is recommended here is highly conducive to the welfare of the people, but it is not likely that the suggestion will be readily adopted by the Government of India. If we mistake not, a similar suggestion for the extension of the Arbitration Court was previously made to the Government of India, which however did not adopt it, evidently as it did not like to forego the large revenues yielded by the stamp duties and court fees. However, the subject of Arbitration Courts is of vital importance and ought to be brought to the notice of the political and other important associations of the presidency, and an extensive agitation on the subject should be made with a view to acquire the concession sooner or later.

Extension of the Poona Arbitration Court scheme throughout the presidency desired.

12. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—We are glad to learn that the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Ódhárám Mulchand, Additional Member of the Bombay Legislative Council, has been appointed member a second time. The province of Sind requires competent representation, and in Ráo Bahádur Ódhárám all the conditions of such representation are duly fulfilled.

Approval of the re-appointment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Ódhárám Mulchand as an Additional Member of the Bombay Legislative Council.

13. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—Some of the Calcutta papers say that the writings of the Bangabasi carry no weight with the people. But this is surely a mistake. A paper which has a circulation of 30,000 copies must be held to be a great power in the hands of its editor and proprietor. The Government of India think that this power has been exercised for evil and in defiance of the Penal Code. They must have doubtless consulted their law officers, and we do not see why their action should be criticised as impolitic, especially at this stage. If the prosecution succeeds, it will serve as a good example and will teach other journals to respect the law of the land—a law under which we enjoy the fullest liberty, but which rightly puts its foot down on license of every kind. We well remember how often those very journalists who are now falling foul of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne advised Lord Lytton to have recourse to the Penal Code instead of passing a special gagging Act. Lord Lansdowne is following that advice and the same councillors are now falling foul of him. They apparently think that the responsible authorities, having come to a conclusion that a paper having the largest circulation of any in India is sowing sedition of a dangerous kind among those who cannot think for themselves, should allow it to break the law with impunity and continue to disseminate treason. We would have understood the criticism of our Bengal friends if the Bangabasi prosecution had failed. But the matter is still sub-judice. The issue raised is a plain one. It concerns only a particular paper and not the entire press. The Government has been doubtless making itself acquainted with the general tone of the newspaper in question. It is of opinion that the newspaper has been attempting to excite such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is not compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support such authority against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist it. The High Court may be of a different opinion and may acquit the accused. But it is all-important that the press should say nothing likely to influence the High Court. The Government of India is from one point of view as much on its trial as the Bangabasi, and it is not fair to create prejudice against it at the very outset of the case. The case will be tried with the aid of a jury, and we think it is hardly right to influence the public, out of which the jurors will be chosen, against the prosecutor. Had a similar attempt been made to influence the public against the accused, every one would have seen its unfairness. The Government in the High Court is in no better position than a private prosecutor, though its responsibility is undoubtedly greater. We would, therefore, respectfully advise the Bengal press to maintain a judicial spirit until the trial is over, and after it is over to discuss the real issue involved and not the Age of Consent Act.

14. The Sudhdrak (18), in its issue of the 24th August, writes:—The Statesman learns on "excellent authority" that if Government are able to get a conviction in the Bangabasi case two or three other Native papers "are already down on the list for criminal prosecution." We are sorry for His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, if this be true. His Lordship came amongst us with a name distinguished in the history of English Liberalism and with the prestige of Liberal traditions. It would be a sad commentary on the reputation that he thus brought with him, if he were to leave the shores of India as a second Lord Lytton.

15. The Svadesh Bandhu (129), in its issue of the 26th August, observes:—The so-called seditious writings of the Bangabasi do not seem to be fraught with danger at all. Even a child knows that the subjects of other sovereigns do not get so much happiness and immunity from danger as the people of India derive from the British Government. We are sorry to find that attempts are being made to deprive the Native press of its liberty, and if they succeed they will only make Government officials indulge all the more in their arbitrary and oppressive acts, thereby rendering the British administration unsatisfactory and unpopular. The people think that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is afraid of the Native press, and trust his action will not meet with sympathy from the people of England.

16. The Nyayadarshak (116), in its issue of the 17th August, observes:—The British Government is the paramount power and to speak anything against it will bring us into trouble. Natives ought to remember that the best thing for them is to blindly follow Government and sing its praises, and that if they adopt any other course they might bring themselves into the same trouble as the Bangabasi has now come into. We know from experience that the English nation is not such a weak power as to comply with even the most trifling request of the people against its own will. Its only business is to extend its territories, to increase its power and to snub Natives, who unfortunately do not realise that 'might is right.' The present time is such that if our rulers wish they may use us as beasts of burden, levy from us innumerable taxes, annex Native States, and in dispensing justice show partiality to Europeans in cases in which Natives and Europeans are concerned, while we should stand before them with arms folded and obey their dictates without murmur.

Retrial of the Bangabasi case at the next sessions disapproved.

17. The Bombay Samachár (96), in its issue of the 26th August, says:—The jury in the Bangabasi case has been discharged and a retrial of the case at the next sessions has been ordered. There was some applause on this occasion, leading to the inference that the verdict of the majority of the jury was against conviction of the accused. Whatever the fact may be, the labours of the Bengal Government have for the present gone in vain, depriving the case of much of its outward attraction. The retrial of the accused at the next sessions might lead the people to view the affair as persecution of the accused by Government, that would not add to the credit of the authorities.

No need of further inquiry into the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

18. In alluding to the recent reply given by the Bombay Government to a second memorial presented by certain inhabitants of Bombay in the matter of the Rájábái Tower case, the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 27th August, writes:—We wish the Bombay Government had, along with their recent reply, published the report of the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran, as well as those by the Honourable the Advocate-General and the Public Prosecutor. There may be, and probably are, good reasons for withholding from the public the report of Colonel Wilson, the Commissioner of Police; but we should think that there could be no valid objection to publishing the other reports, more especially because they would go far to satisfy the public at large, and particularly the Pársi community of Bombay, of the reasonableness of the view taken in the Government letter under notice. Mr. Justice Farran's report would, we should think, convince at least the more influential members of that community that there existed no ground whatever for the institution of any further inquiry. If it is satisfactorily proved, as we hold it to have been, that no crime was committed, then it must be clear that no public purpose can be served by the adoption of the course so persistently suggested by the memorialists.

Further reply from the Bombay Government to the memorial on the Rájábái Tower tragedy and remarks thereon.

19. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—The fiat has gone forth; the mandate is given that there shall be no further inquiry into what the Government themselves were pleased to call but the other day "the dark mystery" of the Rájábái Tower fatality. Although we are by no means satisfied with the meagre and miserable letter sent by the petitioners praying for further inquiry, the bare demand of which unsupported by fresh facts and arguments as elicited by after-events has possibly drawn this reply from Government without difficulty, we must with all deference say that the reply is utterly evasive and unsatisfactory, and leaves the question exactly where it was before the trial of Mánekji Aslji commenced in the High Court. Government have no ground whatever to say that the theory of outrage on the deceased ladies was fully tried and the conduct of the police was gone through before Mr. Justice Farran. Nothing of the sort was done in the High Court. It was a trial, pure and simple, of the charges against Mánekji Aslji, and the Judge himself had to admit the one-sidedness with which the trial was conducted,—a feature in it which favoured the defence and which could throw no light whatever on the conduct of the police, nor on the probabilities of outrage. The matter will evidently not rest here, as public feeling is still very much excited for the cold water which is sought to be thrown on the painful incident.

20. In noticing the above reply of the Bombay Government the Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 24th August, observes:—Neither the committee formed in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, nor the Government reply, has given satisfaction to the public. After the submission of the memorial a simple reminder was addressed by the committee to Government, but, instead of doing this, another memorial should have been addressed, amplifying the grounds on which the first memorial was based and meeting the worthless reasons advanced by Government in their first reply. The reply of the 22nd instant is based upon the report of the Commissioner of Police, the review of the case by the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran, and the opinions of the Honourable the Advocate-General and the Public Prosecutor, which have not been published. However, the public had formed its opinion on the conduct and sentiments of these officers in the case, and had arrived at a conclusion contrary to the one come to by Government, and hence it would not attach any value to those documents in spite of the high appreciation attached to them by Government. If these documents are published they are sure to meet with disparaging criticism, and it is not just to base a reply on them.

The reply of the Bombay Government of the 22nd August in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy criticised.

21. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 25th August, says:—It is the duty of the committee formed in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy to place before the public its proceedings in the matter and to acquaint it with the further steps it proposes to take in connection with the subject, since the expenditure incurred by the committee has been met by subscriptions raised from the public, and it is to be hoped that early steps will accordingly be taken by the committee. On the decision of the case against Mánekji Asláji by the Bombay High Court it was observed by the entire vernacular and local English press that the Rájábái Tower mystery had remained unsolved, while the Government reply supplies no light for its solution, and the proceedings and conduct of those officers on whose reports and opinions, which are withheld from the public, the reply is based have confirmed the public opinion that the two deceased ladies were victims of outrage and violence. Particular care ought, therefore, to be taken by the public to support its complaint by every available proof, and no attention should be paid to the representation of any of the persons who are given to misleading the public by a misrepresentation, that due redress will be given by the Bombay Government of any well-founded complaint laid before them, since the conduct of that Government has not proved satisfactory to the public in several matters. The public expect that further steps in this matter will be taken by the committee at an early date.

22. The same, in its issue of the 26th August, writes:—The Rájábái Tower Tragedy Committee held a consultation as to whether any further steps in the matter should be taken or not, and has arrived at the conclusion that silence cannot be well held over the position in which the Bombay public has been left by the Government reply. It is quite a different thing that the public has not obtained redress; but it has been placed by the Government reply in a wrong position, and not only for the protection of its honour but to remove the blot cast on it it must take further steps in the matter. The public is sure to be gratified to learn that the leading members are anxious to take due steps to vindicate the public.

23. The Jáme Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 24th August, says:—The reply of Government is disappointing. We will, however, throw the hint for consoling the people that something is being done in the matter very secretly and that there is much risk in divulging the secret. To do justice to ourselves we might as well state that we have no connection whatever with the Vigilance and other committees, that we took no part in raising subscriptions for the Vigilance Committee or in assisting it in the performance of any of its acts. It is to be much regretted that the documents on which the Government reply is based have not been published and that Government should have arrived at a conclusion in an important matter like the Rájábái Tower tragedy on one-sided representations.

24. The Akhbáre Soddgar (94), in its issue of the 25th August, in writing on the same subject, requests the publication of the report of the Commissioner of Police, the review of the case by the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran, and the opinions of the Honourable the Advocate-General and the Public Prosecutor.

25. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 23rd August, observes:—The reply of the Bombay Government to the letter sent by some of the members of the committee formed in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy is disappointing. The letter concerned an important question regarding public safety, and Government ought to have appointed a commission for the sake of setting the public mind at rest. One of the local English contemporaries complained in one of its recent issues that swindling had greatly increased in the city, that the police was powerless to take steps against the swindlers on account of a defect in the law and warned people to beware of them. This is sufficient to show that there is a wide field for reform in the Bombay Police force, and it would have been well if Government had appointed a commission instead of putting implicit confidence in the police.

26. In alluding to the same subject, the Svadesh Bandhu (129), in its issue of the 26th August, regrets that the Bombay Government should have put implicit faith in the report of the police without paying any consideration to the reasonable request of the public and supported the theory of suicide, and observes:—It is wrong to believe that the unfortunate Pársi ladies committed suicide when regard is had to their education and unblemished life and to the emphatic opinion of several medical men who testified to the presence of signs of outrage on their bodies. It is also wrong to suppose that the ladies went to such an out-of-the-way place as the tower to commit suicide. We are sorry to have to say this, but we cannot help saying that such suppositions will spread discontent among the people.

27. The Broach Mitra (97), in its issue of the 26th August, in writing on the same subject, observes:—The reply has been completely disappointing, but it was not unexpected. It is wrong of the people to expect any good under the régime of His Excellency Lord Harris, who hardly possesses the requisite knowledge of political matters, but who seems to pride himself upon being well-versed in cricket and other games, and has done no good to the presidency till now, and has been a puppet in the hands of his subordinates.

28. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 26th August, publishes a letter to that paper signed by Mr. A'rdesar Barjorji Godrez which is in effect as follows:—In their reply to the second memorial on the Rájábái Tower tragedy Government observe that there is no use in making further inquiries into the matter as they would causelessly bring into public our household matters. This statement seems to show that Government are in possession of some matters that would go against our family. If so, all those matters should have been placed before the Coroner's jury to enable that tribunal to find out the cause of the casualties. Government have, however, thought it fit to use in their reply to the memorial words calculated to annoy us in our misfortune, and this is not right. [A similar communication has appeared in the Jáme Jamshed (87) of the same date.]

Letter from a member of the family of the deceased, complaining against certain expressions used in the Government reply of the 22nd August in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

29. The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 27th August, disapproves of the present practice of appointing municipal commissioners as Honorary Magistrates and entrusting them with the decision of municipal cases, and observes:—Some time ago it came to the notice of the Bombay High Court that municipal commissioners were appointed by District Judges as assessors to ascertain the valuation of land belonging to private individuals required by the municipality under the Land Acquisition Act, and that Court put a stop to the practice at once. It is also proper that the practice of appointing municipal commissioners as Honorary Magistrates should be done away with, because the Honorary Magistrates have to deal with criminal cases. We are sorry the attention of Government has not been drawn to this flaw in the Municipal Act by its officers, and we recommend the Bombay Presidency Association and other Political Associations to memorialize Government on the subject, but in the meantime request the Reporter on the Native Press to bring this to the notice of Government.

A request to Government to apply the Gambling Act to Mahudha in the Kaira District.

30. The Svadesh Bandhu (129), in its issue of the 26th August, complains that the evil of gambling is increasing at Mahudha in the Kaira District, says that about two months ago a couple of Mahomedan lads were detected gambling, and that recently a Mahomedan notorious for gambling was convicted and sentenced by the Second Class Magistrate for house-breaking, and requests the Superintendent of Police, Kaira District, to move Government to make the Gambling Act applicable to this town without loss of time.

Remarks on the compulsory retirement on pension of Mr. Bápu Sáheb Mulé, District Deputy Collector, Sholápur, on account of his indebtedness.

31. The Gujarát Mitrá (86), in its issue of the 23rd August, approves of the compulsory retirement on pension of Mr. Bápu Sáheb Mulé, District Deputy Collector, Sholápur, on account of his indebtedness, and observes:—This will deter Natives employed in Government service from incurring debts, but this rule should be applied to all cases without distinction of caste or creed. We hear that Mr. Fforde, Assistant Superintendent, Survey Department, Gujarát, has been only given a warning for a similar offence, and we request Government to state whether some such warning was given to Mr. Mulé before his retirement. We recommend Government to adopt the course of warning a Government servant before forcing him to retire on account of indebtedness.

New rules of management of the J. J. Hospital, Bombay.

32. A correspondent, writing to the Sudhárak (18) of the 24th August, observes:—I think that the big name and fame of the J. J. Hospital is well known to your readers. The rules under which the management is conducted are such as would excite wonder and laughter. The importance of the authorities, in whose hands the sole management rests, decreases in proportion to the high rank they hold. The House Surgeons, who are mere apothecaries, are thought of as of greater importance than Surgeons. They are clothed with the authority of keeping a strict eye over what the Surgeons do. It is laid down in the rules that prescriptions written by the Surgeons should be signed by such petty officials as House Surgeons, otherwise the prescriptions are null and void. What do the framers of these rules mean by this? Do they think that the House Surgeons are higher than the Surgeons? Generally in all public offices what the subordinate officers do requires the sanction of their superiors. But a directly contrary course is to be seen in the J. J. Hospital. When rules are made they must be obeyed by all. But whatever it may be according to the rules, it is most absurd that what the superior officers do should require the consent of their inferiors. That the prescriptions from a Surgeon's own hand should have to be authenticated by the signature of a House Surgeon, who is a mere apothecary, and who, compared with the Surgeon in point of talents, ability, experience, rank, and knowledge of the medical science, is nowhere, only serves to degrade the latter. Let me trouble the authorities of the hospital with a few interrogatories. How did such eminent Surgeons as Dr. Cooke, Dr. Carter, and Dr. Hunter do without such a rule? What has made Dr. Gray lay it down? What has made him introduce a new system, which no circumstances can call necessary? Surely Drs. Carter, Cooke, and Hunter sufficiently valued their importance, honour and authority. But I am very sorry that Dr. Gray has got his own hands tied up by himself and lowered himself in the public estimation by placing his well-written prescriptions at the disposal of the apothecary.

Thefts at Kelva Máhim in the Thána District.

33. A correspondent, writing from Kelva Máhim in the Thána District to the Jagadhitechchhu (38) in its issue of the 22nd August, refers to a few local thefts of recent occurrence on public roads, and blames the police for having failed to detect the offenders in any of them.

34. A correspondent of the Kaira Vartamán (110), in its issue of the 26th August, complains that the bábul trees have so extensively grown on the borders of the villages of Nayaka, Rada, Wásana, Hariala and some others in the Mátar Táluka of the Kaira District, that these places have been haunted by tigers, and requests the authorities to take the necessary steps in the matter.

Growth of bábul trees affording shelter to tigers in the Mátar Táluka of the Kaira District and a request in the matter.

35. The Satyá Shodhak (63), in its issue of the 23rd August, says that there being only three postal peons to deliver letters and parcels and to make payments for money orders at the town of Ratnágiri the people residing at the farthest end of the town do not receive their letters till four or five hours after the time the peons commence the delivery, and that the postal authorities should, with a view to remove this cause of complaint, sanction additional delivery-peons.

A postal complaint of the people of Ratnágiri.

Part II.—Railways.

36. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes :—J. W.'s letter to the Bombay Gazette describing an instance of the treatment of Native passengers on the G. I. P. Railway will be no news, at all events, to the Native community. Such instances on this line are of almost every-day occurrence. Yet we cordially thank the gentleman for bringing to notice an instance of petty insolence and oppression which came under his observation while he was at the Victoria Terminus one evening to see a friend off. His friend was travelling in the same train by which two Mahomedan women were passengers to Secunderabad. A "whipper-snapper of a ticket-collector," aged about seventeen, came up to their carriage five minutes before the starting of the train and "in a rude, authoritative tone and in scorn of all respectful protests on the part of the passengers insisted on every particle of the baggage being taken out of the carriage to be weighed." It was all taken out, but the train started before it could be weighed and brought back, and the poor women, deprived of their luggage, including even their bedding, must have been put to very serious discomfort. This is a shame and a scandal. The G. I. P. Railway seems to be an asylum for Eurasian and East Indian youths, as ill-mannered as they are ill-educated, whose behaviour towards poor Natives is sometimes more than disrespectful. They observe much difference between Europeans and Natives, this very case being an instance in point. The ticket-collector had nothing whatever to say to some European passengers though the seats of their carriages "were littered with baggage." It is possible that the ladies were carrying more luggage than was allowed by the rules, but it ought to have been weighed before it was allowed to pass. If it was not weighed in time, it was the fault of the railway employés for which it was a grievous injustice to have made the poor women suffer. Mr. Conder is a very good man, a devout Christian, and the patron saint of these half-castes. We appeal to him to see that his charity to those who profess the Christian faith is not abused to the detriment of the Company by insolent lads who owe their bread to him. [The Káiside Mumbai (111) of the 24th August expresses similar sentiments.]

Rude behaviour of a ticket-collector at the Victoria Terminus Station of the G. I. P. Railway towards Native passengers.

Part III.—Municipalities.

37. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes :—Now that the Bombay Municipal Corporation has got through the building bye-laws, we hope that before finally sanctioning them the Government of Bombay will act upon the very sensible suggestion of Mr. Stevens, viz., that a committee of experts should be appointed to examine and report upon them. Everything that can be done to make the laws intelligible and workable and as little oppressive as possible, with due regard, however, to the erection of buildings that shall ensure human safety, should be done. It may cause some delay, but delay is no important consideration in a matter of this kind.

Suggestion to appoint a committee of experts to examine and report on the building bye-laws of the Bombay Municipality.

PART IV.—Native States.

38. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—Impartial men cannot see much justice or humanity in a procedure which made it impossible for the Senápati of Manipur to appeal to the Secretary of State or the British Parliament for clemency. Nor are we prepared to admire the humanity of our highly civilized Government which got the Tongal General hanged, when the wretched old man could not even walk out of his cell and had to be carried in a chair to the place of execution. Nor are we sensitive enough to appreciate the high morality of that sentiment for the gratification of which the two wretched men were hanged face to face. At the time of the executions there were present correspondents belonging to journals interested in not relating the particulars in full. Hence it is difficult to say whether the old general had the halter put round his neck while in his chair or whether he was able to stand up before the drop was removed. It is not out of mere rabid curiosity that we should have liked to know these ghastly particulars, but because they would enable the impartial public to ascertain whether the wretched old man was worth the trouble of taking him to the gallows when he was lying more than prostrate with the load of ninety years and heavy grief. How much higher would our Government have risen in the estimation of the world if they had shown some consideration to a man in such a plight, however guilty! When it was announced that the lives of the late Rája and Angáo Sena were to be spared, many thought that they would be confined in some place as State prisoners for life. But now it seems that they are on their way to the Andamans. This is an unusually severe punishment, which is not warranted by the peculiar circumstances with which the usurper was surrounded. He was not the originator of, nor the participator in, the indiscreet order passed for the execution of the English officers. If such a cruel and lifelong punishment is to be passed for his weakness and helplessness, how strongly must one denounce the action of a Government but for whose interference no one would have ever heard of the tragical episodes that have distressed and pained every humane and rational soul? The Manipuris are avowedly barbarians. If they had been better, the officers would never have been killed but detained as hostages till the British Government had given a solemn undertaking not to meddle with their affairs. Where even so much foresight was wanting it does not strike us as just or humane for a civilised Government to apply the strict standard of right and wrong to the case of the helpless Rája. The Burmese king is in confinement at Ratnágiri. Malhár Ráo Gáikwád ended his days in the Madras Presidency, and our enlightened Government, if they had chosen to be more far-seeing and generous, could have detained the Rája and Angáo Sena in some convenient place in British India far away from Manipur. Such a course would have commended itself to the approval of the whole country, though it has not a word of approval to say in favour of the policy which has brought such a painful and unexpected revolution in Manipur. We are very sorry for the Manipuris for the great grief and pain with which they must have witnessed the successive episodes which have shocked all right-minded persons. We are bitterly sorry for our Government, because it will be half a century more before the horrible tragedy is forgotten and before they are able to recover their moral prestige which has been terribly shaken. Military courts and executions and transportations might strike terror for a time. Government also are at liberty to delude themselves with the belief that they have succeeded in re-establishing their moral prestige. But it should be borne in mind that the whole of India has formed its own judgment on the matter. Whether it finds articulate expression or not in all cases, it dwells in the mind of the nation, and no amount of whitewashing in blue-books and inspired official organs can dislodge it from that seat. It is hence that we are sorry for our Government that, instead of being raised in the estimation of the subject population and the outside world, its moral prestige has been lowered and will so remain for many years to come. We are sorry for our countrymen in British India, because fresh responsibilities and anxieties will now be added to the cares of the Government, which is already beginning to find itself unable to cope successfully with the growing difficulties of administration in British India. The Manipur revolution has already cost the Indian exchequer more than 30 lakhs of rupees and the chances of a long-looked-for reduction in taxation have become as remote as ever. The people have freely expressed their sense of disapproval of the Manipur imbroglio, at times in very strong terms. That was, of course, inevitable under the circumstances. A feeling of estrangement has in consequence become perceptible between them and Government, and it has been and is being intensified by other unfortunate causes. We regret also this result of the Manipur tragedy. As far as we can see, there is no room for congratulations anywhere, but for painful regrets all round. Manipur has not been actually annexed. The province will, however, be governed through a Regency, and our only hope is that the Manipuris will profit by the change, however sudden and painful it has been. With the deportation of the Rája to the Andamans the Manipur drama closes and the curtain falls. We only wish that Parliament should intervene and cancel the sentence of transportation awarded to the Rája and Angáo Sena and see them comfortably lodged in some place in British India. This alteration of the sentence is demanded by considerations of pure justice and humanity, and so much clemency a wise and beneficent Government ought to have shown. Since they have not done it, Parliament at least will illumine the ghastly Manipur record by an act of nobility and generosity towards a man whose only fault was that he was not blessed by Providence with sufficient strength of character to prevent himself from being employed by the Senápati as an instrument for the accomplishment of his revolutionary designs.

Remarks on the sentences passed by the Government of India on the Manipur princes.

39. The Svadesh Bandhu (129), in its issue of the 19th August, observes:—The capital sentence passed by the special commission on the Regent and his brother Angáo Sena was extremely heavy and Government have done well in commuting it to one of transportation for life, otherwise it would have left a dark stain on the British administration; but it is to be regretted that the same sentiment of clemency was not shown in the case of the Jubráj and the Tongal General against whom there was no direct evidence of their having murdered any of the English officials. Moreover, this is probably the first instance under the British administration in which a Native prince has been executed, and the Jubráj, it seems, has been punished because he was powerful and able. If Parliament had been sitting at this time, we believe it would have interfered in the matter and the Jubráj would not have been executed. The Viceroy will have probably to give an explanation of his conduct on the re-opening of Parliament, but, in the meantime, we request the English public to keep an eye over the Indian administration, because if the present policy continues it will not be conducive to the interests of the British administration.

Lord Lansdowne's alleged message to the Secretary of State for India regarding the fate of the Manipur princes.

40. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 23rd August, writes:—Jubráj is hanged and the Manipur prince is transported. So there is little use in discussing the principles on which Mr. Manmohan's note is founded. But there are certain facts which may still require some explanation, and one of them is that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne offered to resign in case the sentence passed on Jubráj by the Government of India was not approved by the Secretary of State for India. The news first appeared in the Morning Post. We quote below the same with the remarks thereon of our contemporary of the Hindu. "'The Morning Post of Allahabad publishes in its issue of the 17th instant the following item:—"If decision of Executive Council regarding Senápati and Tongal General not confirmed, I unreservedly resign." Extract from telegram sent to the Secretary of State by the Marquis of Lansdowne.' This, if correctly reported, shows beyond doubt that Lord Lansdowne alone is responsible for the final carrying out of the sentence of death passed upon the Senápati and the Tongal General. The threat conveyed in the telegram has a tinge of childishness in it; and those who have hitherto formed high estimation of the benevolence of His Lordship will certainly feel disappointed. With a different Secretary of State the threat would have gone for little. But Lord Cross is so notoriously weak-minded that he may be expected to yield to almost any folly, if only he is boldly faced. The incredible haste with which the prisoners were executed at Manipur will now be less intelligible." [The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 23rd August, also speaks of the alleged telegram.]

41. In alluding to the same telegram, the Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 27th August, asks whether the Official Secrets Act is intended only for the Native press or whether Government is unaware of confidential information leaking out now and then through Anglo-Indian newspapers, and observes :— If the information be true it does not speak well for His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and only shows his anxiety to be rid of the Manipur muddle, lest delay might induce the Crown to view with mercy the crimes of the princes and to commute the capital sentence on some of them to some other punishment. Moreover, it does not redound to the credit of Lord Cross if he has really approved of the sentences on account of the threat held out by the Viceroy. But we cannot believe that Lord Lansdowne has been so obstinate, and recommend His Excellency to publish an explanation on the subject. The Manipur matter, which has lasted for nearly a year, will always make Lord Lansdowne remembered in the history of the country.

The solution of the Government of India on the Manipur cases and the future of that State.

42. In noticing the resolution of the Government of India on the Manipur cases and the future of that State, the Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 25th August, says :— The Manipur princes committed a serious blunder in disobeying orders of the British Indian Government to which the Gáikwád and other tributary Native princes would have quietly submitted, in murdering European officers, and in making an armed attack on the small British force and the Residency and in effecting their destruction. Other discreet princes would not certainly have acted as did the thoughtless Manipur princes, who have ultimately seen their own mistake, that has resulted in the hanging of the Jubráj and the Tongal General and the deportation of the Rája and his Senápati to the Andamans. The Jubráj should have submitted to his being arrested in a Darbár by Mr. Quinton, and afterwards legally fought with the British Indian Government for this conduct of it; and had he done so he would have been now in a far better position. It has been proved by Mr. Ghose, the well-known Bengali Barrister, that the British Government had no reason to interfere with the revolution that had been effected in the Manipur State on account of a rupture between the members of the Royal family, and this opinion has been more or less accepted by many Natives and Europeans as well as by the authorities in England. The plan of arresting the Jubráj in a Darbár has also been condemned on principle and orders have been issued not to make any arrests at any of the future Darbárs. It is also gratifying that native rule is to be re-established in Manipur. [The Jáme Jamshed (87) of the same date also expresses satisfaction at the issue of orders prohibiting the arrest of any Native princes at any Darbárs and directing the re-establishment of native rule in the Manipur State.]

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Chanddnshu (25), in its issue of the 30th August, observes :—

The present condition of India and the responsibility of the educated classes for it.

Everybody knows from past history that the present rulers of India first came to this country professedly for commercial purposes, and having gradually secured a firm footing in it have acquired supreme sovereignty over it and are now enforcing very stringently over the people various oppressive laws made by them through wantonness and according to their pleasure. They have annexed to their territories large Native States one after another, imposed various taxes on the people, deprived them of their arms, made salt scarce to them, and extended taxation even to forest produce from trees and berries down to grass, earth and stone. They assess the taxes in any way they like and recover them in default of voluntary payment by selling chattels and other things. This course having continued for a long time the country has been drained of its immense wealth and quite impoverished and one-fourth of its total population is starved. All men from great Princes, Ráo Bahádurs and Ráo Sáhebs downwards are like puppets in their hands and the country has lost all its trades and industries. In these circumstances what is it, if not foolish, for the people to be off their guard and trade boastfully in foreign goods, to litigate for trifling and unprofitable matters and spend money in carrying them through three Courts of justice in succession, to write or prattle nonsense with a consciousness of fancied learning acquired by passing through examinations the standards of which are changed from time to time as if to amuse children, to be contented with their present condition and to make absurd or no efforts to ameliorate it? The whole responsibility of this state of things rests on the so-called educated and higher classes, and if they will not benefit themselves even by doing such a simple thing as making up their minds to abstain from using foreign piece-goods, what chance is there of their securing political rights for themselves?

2. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 31st August, says that if, as would seem from large portions of the newspapers being devoted at present to the discussion of matters pertaining to the games of cricket, lawntennis, &c., there is nothing more serious to engage the attention of Provincial Governors, it is very desirable that there should be only one Governor appointed for the whole of India, the Presidential Governors being replaced by so many Lieutenant-Governors on lower salaries, but that there is very little chance of this economical arrangement being adopted. [The Prabhákar (16) also, in its issue of the 3rd September, asks why the Governor of Bombay should have a salary of Rs. 10,000 if he has nothing more important to do than play cricket and give balls and dances, as would appear from the course followed by His Excellency Lord Harris.]

A suggestion for a more economical arrangement for provincial government.

3. The Pársi Tikákár (117), in its issue of the 1st September, observes :—

Remarks on the régime of His Excellency Lord Harris.

His Excellency Lord Harris has thoroughly fulfilled all the expectations formed of him, and we do not think that any of his predecessors has been so clever. His Excellency is a skilled hand at cricket and is ready to give parties and entertainments in his leisure hours and to encourage Lady Harris in her purda parties. He always keeps his Secretaries engaged in active work. His recent conduct anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy has also shown his zeal to attend to public grievances. His Excellency has undertaken the difficult task of a trip to Simla and would make a capital Governor wherever he might go, and if about four such Governors were appointed to the country it would be exceedingly fortunate and prosperous. Since his appointment as Governor of this presidency Lord Harris has never troubled himself about the presidency town, and has won a high opinion in the estimation of the people by passing popular measures from his seat at Poona. This shows His Excellency's great foresight, and at the end of his term of office his policy will probably make him so popular that he will be worshipped by the Natives as a god. His indefatigable energy will, however, tell on his health and other noblemen will be prevented from accepting the Governor's post. We therefore recommend that the sooner he returns to his native country the better.

4. The Indu Prakash (14), in its issue of the 31st August, writes :—When the Bombay Gazette stated the other day, as a piece of Poona gossip, that an effort was being made to hereafter oust the Judicial Member from the Bombay Executive Council and to appropriate both the places to the revenue service, we treated the news with incredulity, thinking it to be too extravagantly absurd to be true. There seems to be, however, better warrant than mere gossip to apprehend that in point of fact a serious effort is being made in that direction. The revenue or executive service is notoriously aggressive, and, if it is distinguished for one thing more than another, it is its supreme contempt for its sister of the judicial service. Nothing is more common in the experience of a legal practitioner than the contempt and impatience with which most of the mofussil Magistrates treat all trammels of law, more especially the decisions of the High Court. They are generally men of light disposition and take pride in being so. It is one of their cardinal articles of faith that they are the sole possessors of the acme of perfection in regard to administrative talent. The present head of the revenue service is par excellence an embodiment of these traditions, and it is not a matter for surprise that under his auspices an effort should be made to obtain for that service the exclusive privilege of occupying the two highest administrative posts in the presidency next to the Governor. We cannot characterize this otherwise than as an impudent attempt to aggrandize the revenue service at the expense of the judicial, and to cast an undeserved slur upon the latter. Such an injustice the public, if it has any strength in its voice, must not allow to be perpetrated. For one thing, we venture to believe that such a proposal will not be tolerated by the higher authorities and by the British public, however strongly it may be backed by an interested service. We have great faith in the strong practical sense of Englishmen, and we think the proposal will not stand a moment's reflection. If it be ever seriously entertained, we must say our faith in the solid common sense of British statesmen will be greatly shaken. Nothing, however gross and palpably wrong, may then be impossible to be accomplished, provided it has strong interest to back it up. We cannot imagine to ourselves the grounds on which the exclusion of the judicial service from a place in the Executive Council could be justified. In our judgment every possible consideration of justice, expediency, efficiency of services, interest of administration, all point to the selection of the best men from both the chief administrative services as the most proper arrangement.

The Judicial Membership of the Bombay Executive Council.

5. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 30th August, writes :—What with the scarcity of water in the wells, the bad condition of the crops and the want of fodder for the cattle, the prospects in the Cuddapah district, where Lord Wenlock is touring at present, must be very gloomy and threatening. It would seem that His Lordship was asked to open Government grain depôts in the district and to throw open the forests to the cattle which were dying for want of fodder, as also to make some facilities for cutting firewood from them, and his reply must have chilled the hopes of his hearers. He said that those that had not sufficient food must resort to the works or the relief kitchens started for their benefit. A Government that shows itself so anxious to prevent human suffering by such benevolent measures as relief works and kitchens, which Hindus on account of their innate prejudices do not take advantage of, is wanting in the power of adapting its measures to the needs of the generality of the people. The law of supply and demand which Lord Wenlock gave as a ground against not opening grain depôts must be overruled for the time being. The facilities for cutting firewood and getting fodder should be made so great as to leave no cause for complaint. His Excellency said that the licenses for cutting firewood could not possibly be given free of charge. How the throwing open of the forests would be a source of greater trouble and loss to the rayats is difficult to understand. Indeed, there is a plausible argument. It is that if the forests were thrown open inferior cattle would eat away what was preserved for better cattle, which now grazed there on payment of a small fee. No one would consider such an argument very sound. The Government should forego all temporary money considerations when the permanent interests of the people, and, for the matter of that, of Government, are in danger of injury. At such critical times it becomes necessary for Government to be so much in sympathy with the distressed people that a great many concessions asked for by the latter should be given. The services of the Mahájan Sabha and the missionary bodies should not be without recognition. Many of those who hesitate to accept Government relief are assisted by them. Every one hopes that such good measures would be adopted by the Madras Government as would leave nothing to be desired.

Remarks on the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper.

6. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 31st August, writes:—The prosecution of the Bangabasi has for once failed. In the Sessions Court the jury disagreed, seven being for conviction and two for acquittal. The Judge, Sir Comer Petheram, discharged the jury and ordered a fresh trial. Under Section 305 of the Criminal Procedure Code it was possible for the Judge to act on the opinion of the majority if he agreed with their opinion, but since he has chosen to discharge the jury it may be inferred that he himself was for acquittal, although the reason stated by him was that in the case of that kind he would not convict except on a unanimous verdict. The Government, it is said, are now considering whether they should press for a fresh trial. It is rather a sorry predicament for the Government to be in. They have been foiled in a prosecution in which they were almost sure of success, and their failure must be all the more galling since no less a person than the Chief Justice of Bengal has practically condemned their proceeding. Let us hope the result of this failure will not give rise to a greater stringency in the law. It is broadly hinted in some quarters that the present prosecution was meant to be a test case, to see how far Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code answered the Government's expectations. We hope the suggestion is incorrect, as it cannot redound to the credit of the Government that they should have undertaken the prosecution by way of an experiment to put any persons on trial for sedition. Not to speak of the ruinous cost of the defence, the loss of peace of mind and reputation to the individual concerned is an excessively heavy price to pay for even the pleasure of the Government. We think the law is quite sufficient, only the choice of the Government in enforcing it was unfortunate. As we have said before, however rabid the writing, it was impolitic for Government to prosecute the writer for sedition, especially when the writing was published in the name of religion at a time of religious frenzy, and when a long time had elapsed since it was written. It has long been forgotten, and Government has only brought it into prominence by raking it up for a public prosecution. Let us hope better counsels will prevail as regards the re-trial.

7. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—The prosecution of the Bangabasi, if regard be had to the events which have marked the progress of this unlucky year, must be pronounced to be extremely impolitic. It only shows once more that the country has at this moment neither a Ripon nor a Canning to direct the ship of State. Even during the troblous times of the mutiny Lord Canning showed an amount of forbearance which is beyond the conception of the men who now pass as statesmen. Sir Charles Elliot asked the people under his sway the other day to bury the hatchet, and is this the manner in which Government are going to act their part? Even those who supported Government will now pause to consider whether the latter have done well in noticing the comments proceeding from a heated imagination, when they themselves have had to suffer as much at the hands of the opponents of the Age of Consent Bill. The path of reform is not strewn with roses, and opposition was not wholly unexpected. The best way to convince the country of the sincerity of their belief in the excellence of the measure they had initiated was to ignore silently all comments, however silly or hostile. The controversy was being gradually forgotten, but Government have unearthed the articles of the Bangabasi which would never have been read throughout the country but for this prosecution. Rightly or wrongly, the country as a whole did believe, with the exception of the select portion of the educated community, that the Bill was fraught with mischief. Even now not a few honestly believe, however unfounded their judgment might be, that the Act was forced upon them against their will and that it would destroy domestic happiness and peace. Under the peculiar circumstances of the case the best course would have been to ignore the articles altogether and bury in oblivion the fierce controversy that raged throughout the country. The prosecution will make reform still more disagreeable and retard the operation of the causes that are acting in the direction of progress. Whether Government fail or succeed in the prosecution, they will increase the difficulties in the path of social improvement which are already more than enough to discourage even zealous persons in devoting their energies to the social amelioration of their country. We wish Government had taken into consideration all these matters before they made up their mind to prosecute the Bangabasi for writing childish nonsense, which even the uneducated would treat with supreme contempt.

8. In noticing the letter addressed by the Honourable Mr. A. E. Miller, the Legal Member of the Supreme Legislative Council, to the Times of India disclaiming all connection whatever with the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper for sedition, the Jáme Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 1st September, says:—The Legal Member's letter divests the Bangabasi case of much of the gravity that enshrouded it at one time. Government ought to take care not to be led away by the recommendations of the Anglo-Indian press for the punishment of such vernacular newspapers as are alleged to make a wrong use of the liberty of the press, but should consider carefully whether the alleged defaulters deserve punishment, and never think of curtailing even to a small extent the liberty of the entire press for the faults of a few delinquents. The authorities need entertain no fear of evil effects arising from the writings appearing in newspapers of the class of the Bangabasi, because they are judged by the public from their acts and not from what appears in newspapers. If due encouragement be given to the respectable portion of the vernacular press and proper notice taken of the writings appearing in it, the disrespectable and scurrilous portion of the press will soon go out of existence.

9. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 30th August, says:—The prosecution of the Bangabasi on a charge of sedition has so far come to naught. The jury could not be unanimous. Seven of the jurymen were for conviction and two for acquittal. The Chief Justice, Sir Comer Petheram, who presided at the Calcutta Sessions, might have accepted the verdict of the majority, but evidently the verdict of the majority did not coincide with his own view of the case. There will, therefore, be a re-trial of the conductors of the Bengal journal. This is a great pity. In a State prosecution of this nature it is due to the prestige and dignity of Government that they should be perfectly sure of their ground before taking proceedings. It has been stated that this case has been taken up as a test case, in order to see whether Section 124A of the Penal Code covers cases of sedition. Though this is the report, we should be very unwilling to credit Government with such a silly blunder; for they ought to be able to perceive that the discredit and humiliation of failure would be a heavy price to pay for testing the applicability of a certain section of the Penal Code. Among the ignorant mass the acquittal of the accused would create an impression that Government had set their mighty machinery in motion in order to smother down free and independent criticism of their actions; that they had failed to accomplish their purpose in their own Court of law, presided over by their own Judges to administer the laws framed by themselves, because right and justice were not on their side; that they wanted to trample down persons who spoke unpalatable truths, but were ignominiously foiled in the attempt because of the gross iniquity of their action. The ignorant mass will be taught to believe all this, and the accused will wear the crown of martyrdom. They will be exalted as heroes and as martyrs to the cause of righteousness, who fought, and successfully, against all-powerful unrighteousness. Failure in such a State prosecution would give an immense lift to the accused and the poison of their pen would be more poisonous still. We hope Government have fully weighed the consequences of failure before instituting these proceedings for the first time since the section was introduced in the Penal Code.

10. The same newspaper writes:—We have not the slightest sympathy with the blatant and mischievous nonsense of publications of the Bangabasi type. What is most to be deplored is that people in India should be credulous enough to take it all in as gospel truth. Newspapers of this stamp never write a political article, which does not betray a strong and preconceived bias against Government and their officials. Their doings are all denounced as selfish and wicked. The effusions appearing in the Bangabasi might lead the populace to believe that the State is the enemy of its religion, the despoiler of its wealth, and the violator of its domestic sanctities. Such writing is calculated to create disaffection and hatred and contempt of Government, and the mischief would spread over a wide area, when it is disseminated through a paper which commands a circulation of some twenty or thirty thousand. Whether the articles upon which the charge against the Bangabasi is based are calculated to create such disaffection as might imperil the interests of the State, and whether the offence, if any, is covered by Section 124A of the Penal Code, are questions remaining to be decided by a second jury. We should not be surprised if the circulation of the paper increased in the meanwhile by a few thousand.

11. The Ahmedabad Times (92), in its issue of the 2nd September, observes:—If the majority of the jury were against the Bangabasi it was very considerate of the Honourable Chief Justice to have traversed the case to the next sessions. Of the three charges originally brought against that paper one was withdrawn at the beginning of the trial, while the remaining two were not proved satisfactorily; and we regret that the expenses so far incurred by the paper have been in vain and that they will have again to be incurred at the second trial. If the present prosecution has been taken up as a test case in order to see whether Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code is sufficient to check such writings or whether it requires to be amended, the Bangabasi has been unjustifiably made a victim of such a notion, and if conviction is the result of the High Court trial, then the paper will be ruined, and even in the event of acquittal it will suffer pecuniarily and will have to remain in terror for a time. We are sorry that Government have been misguided in taking this objectionable action and that some Native newspapers have joined the Anglo-Indian press in upholding it.

12. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 1st September, observes that the Chief Justice of Calcutta has done well in not accepting the verdict of the majority of the jury and recommends Government to withdraw the prosecution and merely give a warning to the Bangabasi. It adds that in 1857 Government took similar measures to stop the publication of the Friend of India after warning it three times without any effect, and that then, too, the matter was amicably settled.—The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 3rd September, expresses similar sentiments and observes:—If Government amend Section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code on failure to bring the charge of sedition home to the Bangabasi, it will strike terror in the Native press and preclude it from speaking its mind out, the consequences of which will be unfavourable to Government, which must always bear in mind that those are the real well-wishers of the State who, like the late Rám Shástri (who flourished in the time of Bájiráo II), speak out the truth, while those who cajole Government with sweet words must be considered the enemies of the State.

13. The Shri Shivájí (66), in its issue of the 28th August, says:—Even supposing that the charges brought by Government against the Bangabasi newspaper are well founded, the authorities ought to have considered that the paper has rendered them a valuable service. As a thermometer shows the degree of heat in the atmosphere, so the writings like those of the Bangabasi show practically the disposition of the people towards Government. The Bangabasi has 20,000 subscribers and is probably read by five times as many people; but not a single reader was excited against Government. This clearly proves the extreme devotion of the people to Government and justifies the request that Government officers should not commit the folly of persecuting the poor newspapers. It would have been necessary for Government to punish the newspapers severely for seditious writings had there been any chance of such writings ever exciting the people; but if the real state of things is otherwise, we do not know what wisdom there is in prosecuting them.

14. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 3rd September, writes:—At the end of the Bangabasi case Mr. Pugh asked for time to consider the question whether the Crown would proceed with the case in the next session. Are we to infer from this that there is a likelihood of its being abandoned? Its abandonment would rectify a mistake. The prosecution has failed to make out a case against the accused, who have posed before the Indian public as martyrs, to the cause of the country and their religion. The disagreement of the jury kept the public in suspense about the ultimate result of the case. But no one could have been struck with the impassioned eloquence of the speech for the defence made by Mr. Jackson. It was an admixture of close reasoning, legal acumen, and platform oratory. Mr. Jackson was able to show that the English and Anglo-Indian press sometimes indulged in stronger language than the Bangabasi. It is sheer injustice to the Bangabasi to make a scapegoat of it.

15. The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—

The reply of the Bombay Government of the 22nd August in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy criticised.

We have not yet got at the bottom of the truth of this horrible Rájábái Tower tragedy. The Government itself seems to have been oscillating between one theory and another. It disbelieves in the hypothesis of accident, so absurdly propounded by the Judge, and now tries to throw covert hints that it may be suicide. We are indeed sorry that Government should have even hinted at such a theory without any adequate foundation for it. If it has, why does it not tell us all about it? In the way that it has hinted at it in the resolution, it is, we consider, simple wantonness. It has added "insult to injury," as very properly stated in the letter written by the distressed, but indignant, husband of the elder girl in the dailies of Friday last. On what grounds does the Government believe that there may have been suicide? This alone, that in the secret recesses of the bureau of the Judicial Secretary there lies a report of the police which, if laid open, may unfold the tale. If so, we openly challenge the Government to lay it bare and let it vindicate its insinuation. The report may be a privileged communication; but, after all, it is a one-sided report of policemen whose conduct of the inquiry has not given public satisfaction. If the two sides are to be heard, then in the interest of truth, justice and morality as well as in the interests of the purity of the administration itself, the Government is bound in all honour to publish that report. Let its contents be known urbs et orbis, so that if there be a spark of truth in it we may afterwards diminish our heads, sit on the stool of repentance, and cry peccavi. Until that is done, we repudiate the outrageous insinuation which a misguided Government has been led into making, but which it had no business to make. It is of no use having anything more to do with the local Government. We would advise the Tower Committee that it would best consult its self-respect and dignity by no more entering into any correspondence with the authorities here. If a truce is to be proclaimed, let it drop all further ideas of communication with them. Let it carry on its battle at Westminster. We know what may be the ultimate reply from the Secretary of State himself. But, all the same, let us once for all put in black and white the whole case and tear to pieces, point by point, every argument urged by the Government and its screaming apologists in the press. We shall have then amply vindicated ourselves. [The Satyavakta (122) and the Surya Prakash (91), in their issues of the 29th August, the Gujaráti (84) and the Hindusthán (108), in their issues of the 30th August, and the Pársi Tikákár (117), in its issue of the 1st September, express similar sentiments.]

16. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—The half-hearted nature of the enquiry into the conduct of the police and the circumstances connected with the Rájábái Tower tragedy must have prepared the public for the cold reply which the Government gave to the second memorial of the committee formed in connection with the tragic event. We are not disposed to disguise the fact that the reply will aggravate, instead of allaying, the alarm and indignation of the people, and fill them with fear as to the safety of their life and liberty and the preservation of the purity and chastity of their homes. It is true that this was an extraordinary case, but have the Government satisfied themselves that they have taken sufficient care and precaution to detect the perpetrators of the horrible crime and to bring them to book? If the authorities think that they have done all that was required of them, the public has many and just reasons to differ from them. It is hardly warrantable to say from the reports secreted in the archives of the Secretariat that to suppose the tragedy to be due to outrage and murder is to uphold a discredited theory. The substantial testimony of the Pársi children, of Arjun Ráma, Mr. Enty, Mr. Framroze—was it a conspiracy to appease the phrenzy of an insensiate mob thirsting for the conviction and blood of an innocent man? It is, again, an obliquity of judgment to base the supposition of suicide as a probable cause of the death of the unfortunate girls on a secret report supplied to the Government about their alleged domestic unhappiness. In fact, the ill-mannered enquiries of the police and their stock heresy in this regard have been so thoroughly exposed that it surprises us to see Government upholding this discredited theory of suicide. Although a particular aspect of the case may commend itself to Government, and viewing it in that light they may propose to shelve all enquiry, we are free to record that a crime, and nothing but a crime of the deepest dye, has been committed, and that the authors of it are abroad, mocking the majesty and sublimity of British justice.

17. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—The reply of Government to the brief note addressed to them on behalf of the memorialists on the Rájábái Tower tragedy is painfully disappointing. What even to them was a "dark mystery" before the trial of Mánekji Asláji is, now that the trial is over, no longer a mystery to them. They have been supplied with confidential reports from the Commissioner of Police, the Judge who presided at the trial, and the law officers of the Crown, and these reports lead them to the belief that the poor girls were not victims of outrage, but had gone up the tower with the deliberate pre-determination to commit suicide. So all the noise, excitement and indignation of a large portion of the public was simply a lamentable waste of energy. If these confidential documents are such as to throw a new light upon what has so long been a mystery, if they have at last supplied a clue to the mystery, then there should be no delay whatever in publishing them, in order that the public too, groping hitherto in utter darkness, may revel in the light of truth and knowledge. Well may the unfortunate gentleman, who is the husband of one of the young ladies and the brother of the other, exclaim that "the cup of our misery has been embittered to the utmost by the Government reply, full of insinuations, entirely unwarranted by facts and by the evidence already laid before the public." Well may he exclaim that the cup of bitterness had been filled to the brim and was running over, for this final reply from Government is "the most unkindest cup of all." To have made such insinuation publicly without strong and adequate grounds for it is an outrage upon the memory of the unfortunate ladies, which has added one more link to the long chain of miseries which hangs round the afflicted relatives of the dead. We need not repeat here the arguments which we have dwelt upon, to show that the acquittal of that man at a trial which, in itself, was so unique and singular, did not necessarily discredit the hypothesis of violence, that the balance of probabilities are immensely in favour of this hypothesis, and we may add that nothing has since happened to shake the general belief that a foul crime has been committed, that the offenders are free and at large, and that justice remains unsatisfied. It was not without reason that the public had been aroused, angered and indignant. There is nothing to show that they have been mistaken in the view which they hold to be the most probable. It is therefore with much bitterness of feeling and soreness of heart that they have received what appears to be the final reply of Government.

18. The Hindi Punch (107), in its issue of the 30th August, publishes a letter purporting to be written by Willee Warner, Esq., Secretary to Lord Punch, Serio-Comic Department, to Sir Jamsetji Jijibhoy, Bart., C.S.I., which runs as follows:—"I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of a letter, dated 8th August 1891, from yourself, Sir D. M. Petit, Bart., and the other principal members of the committee formed in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy, requesting His Lordship of Frere Road, Bombay, 'in the interests of justice and public safety to take such steps in the matter of the tower mystery as to His Lordship may seem proper for its elucidation.' With a pertinacity which, to say the least of it, is provoking, you appear to cling to the belief that, notwithstanding the late trial in the High Court, the cloud of mystery, which, in a moment of undue excitement, was at first supposed to hang over an 'unexplained' occurrence, still remains undispelled. (2) I am to inform you that by reason of the power of thought-reading, imparted in him from his very birth, His Lordship has had the opportunity, unhappily (or, perhaps happily, for 'where ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise') denied to you, of mentally conferring with the Commissioner of Police, who has watched the whole conduct of the investigation and whose vigilant and ever-wakeful eye no blunder on the part of his subordinates could possibly escape; with the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran, who, in a comprehensive review of an 'act of mistaken kindness,' as presented to the High Court, was able to judge not only of the merits of that particular act, but also incidentally, and in some mysterious and unexplained way, of the conduct of the police, although such conduct did not form part of the enquiry at all; and, lastly, with the Honourable the Advocate-General and the Public Prosecutor, whose opinions, you will at once admit, are entitled to greater respect than yours. A careful consideration of all the facts (and His Lordship is confident that not one has been kept from him) connected with the so-called mysterious deaths, as elucidated by the flood of light poured upon them from these several high quarters, renders it impossible to admit the suggestion of outrage and violence, which, guided by your limited human sagacity, you have ventured to put forth. That theory has been exhaustively examined and thoroughly discredited. It is at least certain that of three possible causes of death, no substantial indication of violence has been afforded! His Lordship fancies he sees a smile of incredulity overspread your faces. You are probably saying to yourselves that if missing articles of dress and significant nail-marks (to say nothing of torn clothing and early confessions) are not substantial indications of violence, what else can be in a case where the victims are silenced for ever and those who can won't speak? Is it, then, on such slender foundations that you build your theory of outrage and violence? I regret to say that this is your limited human sagacity, again, and His Lordship has only pity for your lamentable short-sightedness. What 'sane' man ever attached a moment's importance to such trifles as your kasti and mâthâband—things light as air and as evanescent? And as for the nail-marks, do you know that His Lordship has been assured by the great physician attached to his staff that the marks on the bodies of those unfortunate girls were merely indentations due to the fall, though with the charming vagueness and inconsistency characteristic of all men of genius this same learned authority is constrained to admit that the marks in question may also be the result of an attempted outrage? Notwithstanding such vagueness and inconsistency, however, His Lordship cannot allow the evidence of his own physician to be outweighed by the random assertions of a whole army of your Native doctors, even when backed by a medical gentleman of the Coroner's long and varied experience. The theory of violence being thus disposed of, to His Lordship's and to every 'sane' man's satisfaction, if not to yours or your community's (but that is no great matter), there remain the possibilities of accident and suicide. If the former were the cause of death, it cannot now be expected that the particulars should become known, or that any enquiry whatsoever should throw light upon it, or that you or anybody else should be any the wiser for such enquiry. In itself the theory of accident seems highly improbable, though His Lordship is not unmindful of the fact that one cool mind at least has found itself able to contemplate its possibility by the gratuitous assumption of an 'intrepid spirit,' rarely to be met with even among beings of sterner mould. If it weren't for the weighty name on the strength of which the assumption is sought to be forced upon a credulous public, His Lordship would be inclined to set it down as a huge and, possibly, a heartless joke, with which he would not condescend to soil his spotless pages. Suicide must be admitted as possible, whether you like it or not, though here, too, it is not quite plain sailing. Unfortunately there is no sufficient motive, that is, none that we have been able, with our limited human sagacity, to discover. If only the relatives and friends of the unfortunate ladies could be made to open their mouths the motive would be no secret at all, but what advantage would be served by dragging it into public light? It is enough to remind you that dirty linen is always best washed at home. This is strong language, and may sound to you like an insult both to the living and the dead, but His Lordship is known never to mince matters, to always call a spade a spade, and to respect nobody's feelings, except when they happen to intertwine with his own. (3) To understand the position taken up by His Lordship more correctly, I am directed to ask you to read, study and inwardly digest a learned dissertation, which has just seen the light, on physical facts and human motives constantly presenting themselves in combinations for which previous experience affords no adequate explanation; on the impossibility of remedying positive lack of data by any method of enquiry, however elaborate; and on unexplained accidents and unexplained suicides being really events of not infrequent occurrence, both here and in other countries. From all this pompous farrago of nonsense, His Lordship finds himself unable to concur with you that the interests of justice and public safety require the appointment of a special commission of enquiry such as you ask for, or that the appointment would lead to any tangible result; for commissions, after all, are composed only of human beings like ourselves, whose sagacity and vision are necessarily limited. (4) There remains, then, the question of the conduct of the police. Your strong disapprobation is doubtless due to your settled conviction that a crime has been committed. But once bring yourselves to look at the matter with His Lordship's eyes, and you will admit that no prima facie case of negligence or ill-will has been established against the force. You seem to make it a reproach that the officer in charge of the enquiry should have dismissed the untenable theory of violence that naturally presented itself to his mind at the outset, at precisely 8 o'clock in the morning, that is, only 12 hours after the occurrence of the double suicide, as His Lordship must now describe what he at first agreed with you in calling a 'dark mystery,' which required to be cleared up. Rather than a reproach, this boldness and courage of his convictions on the part of a police officer, in the face of the undue pressure put upon him by your misguided people, are deserving of His Lordship's highest commendation and His Lordship is of the opinion that the whole collective force has throughout acted with courage and with the best regard to justice and the public safety—such, at any rate, as His Lordship, and the police, and their shrieking apologist understand them. If you had only been present at the tower inquest, and watched the conduct of the police, day after day, both at the inquest and elsewhere, as His Lordship thought it his duty to do, you could not have failed to be struck with the zeal and diligence with which every clue, as offered by the relatives and friends of the unfortunate ladies, was followed up; in one case, even though something like 56 hours had elapsed after the first information of a certain bundle had been given—a delay which to ordinary minds like yours may appear fatal to success, but which is really of no moment, when we take into consideration the extraordinary vigilance of the lynx-eyed police! The fact is that you have been completely led astray by your ignorance of the rules of evidence, and your inability to discover and appreciate at their proper value those beautiful 'touches of nature,' which alone enable a man to detect the true from the false. As one result of this weakness, observe what an awkward position you have put yourselves into. While you are unable to swerve an inch, either this way or that, from the untenable position you have taken up, we, that is to say, His Lordship and the police and all other 'sane' men, have had the advantage of oscillating, as the fancy took us, between the theory of suicide, for which no adequate motive has been discovered, though they have searched high and low for it, and the theory of accident, which except in one notable instance has been scouted and laughed at as preposterous and absurd—very convenient theories, fraught with no harm to living man, and as accommodating, in their way, as Hamlet's clouds to Polonius—whale, camel and weasel, as you please. And now having scattered to the winds your pet theory of outrage and murder, having stamped upon the theory of suicide the seal of his approbation, and having said a kind word for everybody except yourselves who have forfeited it by your presumption, His Lordship has only one last piece of advice to give you, which you will take as it is meant, in good part. Living under the protection of a rule which, according to Sir Gorstus Tarquinius Superbus of England, affords a 'unique example of the government of one nation by another entirely for the advantage and interest of the subject people,' it is surprising that you should fail to realise that, instead of perpetually growling and grumbling, it is to your benefit to quietly take things as you find them. Strangely enough, you never are, but always to be, blest, and you are clamouring incessantly for what you are pleased to call your constitutional rights. Constitutional fiddlesticks! Because your rulers sometimes find it to their interest to agitate in a certain way, must you also follow in their footsteps, forgetting that what is permissible to them is denied to you! Let them, if they choose, go mad over the Ilbert Bill, hang broomsticks in the path of a Viceroy and hiss and howl at Her Majesty's representative in India! Let them frantically embrace and welcome a Pirilal as a brother, until he is proved to be only a leper and nothing more! Let them go into hysterics over a Kate Greenfield, and, after moving heaven and earth for her rescue, only retire in confusion on making the discovery that the impetuous maiden had 'embraced not only her Aziz but his religion besides.' They may do all this and more, but you must not even so much as indulge in respectful memorials for a calamity, by the side of which all your proud Englishman's grievances dwindle into insignificance—the wanton sacrifice of defenceless women on the altar of unhallowed lust! Your fault is that you are becoming too insufferably English, and you cannot too soon mend your ways. (6) I am therefore directed to invite you to sleep over your grievances, to wear smiling faces even though your hearts may be lacerated, to come and dance a measure, if you like, with His Lordship, or play a game of cricket or make merry over his weekly pages of frolic and fun. But if you must needs cherish disaffection and nurse your cock-and-bull stories of outrage and murder, I am to order you to forthwith withdraw yourselves from this pleasure-seeking world of ours and to bury yourselves in the solitude of your homes: there to chew the cud of discontent at your leisure and to fret your lives away in fruitless repinings and lamentations."

19. The same newspaper gives a cartoon entitled "The extinguisher at last! First scene of the Fourth Act of the Tower Tragedy," and the letter-press runs as under:—The Bombay Government has refused in the interests of justice and public safety to take any steps for the elucidation of the tower mystery. Mr. W. Lee-Warner, Secretary to Government, writes to Sir Jamsetji Jijibhoy, Sir D. M. Petit, Kázi Sháhábudin and others, that the police acted with courage and with the best regard to justice and public safety, and that the Governor in Council "can find no prima facie case of negligence or ill-will established against the police force, nor does he perceive any grounds for acceding to your prayer for the appointment of a special inquiry."

20. The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 30th August, says:—We do not know how far the present refusal of the Bombay Government to make further enquiry into the Rájábái Tower tragedy is consistent with their former assurance of making an enquiry after the termination of the case against Mánekji Asláji, then pending in the Bombay High Court. It seems from the Government resolution that from the information supplied to Government they have come to believe that there are some filthy things in the home life of the Pársis, and the leaders of that community should also consider this matter. Although the Pársis belong to a different community they are included among Natives, and the resolution therefore casts blame upon all Natives. Mr. Malabari should go to England to agitate in this matter. Sir D. M. Petit and other Pársis who are asking Government to make further enquiry into the matter should also ask them to state plainly the filthy things they have alluded to. Although we belong to two different castes we should join and make a common cause against a European third party when he raises his hand to strike us.

21. The Broach Samáchár (98), in its issue of the 3rd September, observes:—The Bombay Government seems to be a puppet in the hands of clever conjurers like Mr. Lee-Warner, as is evident from several recent Government despatches and the Rájábái Tower tragedy affair. The further reply of Government on the subject simply adds insult to injury. The attitude of Government throughout the Coroner's inquest and the trial of Mánekji Asláji had been commendable, but much disappointment was caused by the second reply of Government, particularly to the relatives of the deceased, and we think that Government have been misguided by Anglo-Indian newspapers and the police. After the trial of Mánekji Asláji was over the secretary to the committee formed in connection with the tragedy sent a short note on the subject to Government, but the prayer was disregarded on the puerile excuse that it was not properly signed. This showed the desire of Government to hush up the matter. It was, however, disappointed when the note was again submitted after being duly signed. If Government had merely declined to grant the prayer there would not have been much ground to complain. But by showing their leaning in favour of the theory of suicide, which had been exploded at the Coroner's inquest and has not been proved as yet, Government have aroused with redoubled force public sympathy for the deceased and their relations. It is also strange that Government should not have stated their reasons for believing in this theory.

22. The Nyáyadarshak (116), in its issue of the 31st August, observes:—The incident of the Rájábái Tower tragedy must teach a lesson to those Pársis who flatter Europeans and follow the suicidal course of falling in with the views of the conservative Anglo-Indian papers in opposing the just demands of the Natives. These enemies of the people will now understand that they need not expect any countenance from Europeans when a complaint is raised against the arbitrary act of one of the latter, whilst the Hindus are apt to forget the insults given to them by the Pársis and to act as their true friends in time of need. It is also wrong of those Natives who supported the Age of Consent Bill to suppose that it was passed into law because they supported it. His Excellency the Viceroy and many other European officials were determined to raise the age of consent and would have done so even if all the Natives had combined together to oppose the proposal. Similarly the Bombay Government did not pay the slightest heed to the memorial of 40,000 inhabitants of Bombay anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy, although many of them were very influential. Natives need not expect justice when their interests clash with those of the Europeans, the ruling class.

23. The Bombay Samachár (96), in its issue of the 1st September, states:—

Further steps in the matter of the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

In connection with the reply received from the Bombay Government to the memorial regarding the Rájábái Tower tragedy it has been resolved that another memorial containing due facts and statements be forwarded to the Secretary of State for India, and that a reward of Rs. 20,000 be offered to any person or persons who may give such satisfactory information as will lead to the discovery of the perpetrators of outrage on the deceased ladies and of the murderer of both or one of the two ladies. It is also intended to submit a memorial to Parliament; and the reward will be soon advertized.

24. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 2nd September, publishes the proceedings of a meeting of the Rájábái Tower Tragedy Committee held on Monday in the office of Messrs. Bhiishankar and Kanga, Albert Buildings, at which the above resolutions were passed. [The Jáme Jamshed (87) of the same date also states that these resolutions were passed, the sum of Rs. 10,000 being collected by the Jáme Jamshed Press towards the amount of the reward.]

25. The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—It is said that the Government of India has been rigidly inquiring into the allegations regarding its servants acting as Directors and promoters of public companies. This is a step in the right direction. Nothing adds to the prestige and reputation of State officials as strict honesty. More or less where public service and private interests conflict, it happens that the former suffers. To avoid so undesirable and mischievous a circumstance, the State is bound to see that its officers have no direct or indirect connection with public companies. But while this wholesome principle is being reaffirmed with vigour in India, it is a matter of regret to have to observe that the India Council should have at its Board members, retired civilians and other officials, who are more or less connected with joint stock concerns in the United Kingdom. Again, our Indian railway companies have on their directors' board nearly three or four retired Directors-General of Railways and ex-ministers of public works. At the boards of such railways they carry great influence owing to their Indian experience and knowledge of the inner wishes of the Government. Their intimate connection with some members of the India Council is notorious. So that whenever there is a new railway project on the tapis or some new schemes in connection with old railways, a good deal of underhand business goes on, with this net result that India's interests suffer. At the present moment there are the Kashmere, Assam, and Burma railway projects for consideration before the India Council, besides minor schemes. In all these some of the most well-known retired Anglo-Indian officials are interested. In fact, it is a matter of enquiry whether a secret triangular correspondence is not constantly going on between the official public works authorities here, the directors of Indian railways in England and the members of the India Council who may be sitting for the time as a railway committee. Is not this a system which leads to job and corruption? Is there any chance of stamping out these secret official syndicates? What steps is the Government of India going to take in reference to these?

Public servants acting as Directors and promoters of public companies.

A complaint in connection with an order alleged to have been issued to the village officers by the Collector of Madura, Madras Presidency.

26. The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 30th August, refers to an order alleged to have been issued by the Collector of Madura District in Madras prohibiting village officers from supplying to the Mahájan Sabha any information about the condition of the rayats, who, it is said, are suffering from famine, and remarks:—The order in question shows how anarchy prevails under the British rule. We cannot say how far it is creditable to the British morality that a high Government officer in the position of a Collector should issue such an order and prevent a public association like the Mahájan Sabha from getting correct information. The Government should take proper steps in this matter in order to preserve its own reputation.

Withdrawal of the writing against Mr. J. Weir, First Assistant Collector in the Surat District, and his letter to the paper.

27. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 30th August, publishes a letter from Mr. J. Weir, C. S., First Assistant Collector in charge of the Sachin State in the Surat District, as follows:—My attention has been called to a paragraph in your issue of the 31st May last. The statements made therein are inaccurate and untrue. The facts are that the Patel of Bhimpore, on the day after my arrival at Bhimpore, came to pay his salams. He salamed without removing his shoes. I, without speaking, pointed to his shoes, which he removed, and after apologising again put them on. Our conversation continued in the most pleasant manner. The Patel was neither fined nor ill-treated, nor were any peons abused or ill-treated. I therefore invite you to publicly correct your statements and make proper amends for the pain your paragraph has given me.—On this the editor remarks:—We are glad to make room for the above letter. The paragraph referred to gave circulation to only a rumour which our correspondent had no reason to disbelieve. We now, as Mr. Weir has thought proper to give us the above information, have much pleasure in withdrawing the paragraph in our issue of the 31st May. We also desire to express our regret and assure Mr. Weir that we had no intention of giving him pain or injuring his reputation.

New grazing regulations complained against.

28. The Shubh Suchak (67), in its issue of the 28th August, makes the following comments on the revised rules for the regulation of cattle-grazing in forest areas of the Bombay Presidency:—Anybody will see that in framing the new rules for cattle-grazing Government have consulted only their own interests without looking to their effect on owners of cattle. Any rational man will admit that forests are not solely the property of Government, but belong jointly to the governors and the governed, and we do not know why we should not characterise as unjust the conduct of Government in extorting money from the people by hook or by crook by means of their authority. One is really surprised to see the complicate and elaborate rules which Government expect ignorant herdsmen to attend to. Look at the number of things which a herdsman in charge of fifty head of cattle has to look to. He must see that cattle do not fall headlong from precipices, that they do not injure the trees or marks of the reserved forests, and that no unauthorised cattle enter the grazing area open to his cattle. He must also render assistance in protecting forests from fire and the trees therein from being felled unauthorisedly and carry with him into the forest the grazing permits for his cattle and on demand show them to any village or forest officer. Even a learned man will find it difficult to attend to so many things, not to speak of illiterate herdsmen. It is a mistake to apply the term "agricultural cattle" only to cattle used for ploughing land or drawing water for irrigation purposes. Cultivators require manure for their lands and dairy produce for themselves and their families, and for these purposes keep some head of cattle, and it is unjust to exclude them from the term "agricultural cattle." In short, the observance of these rules involves so much trouble and worry that cultivators feel disposed to give up both their cattle and fields. The people, however, have no alternative but to send their cattle into the forest for grazing, for, excepting the roadways, cattle have no standing space even left them, the gáirán being altogether done away with. The people are thus in a fix, as it were, there being heavy land assessment on one hand and strict prohibition against stepping into the forests on the other. Since the time Government made these strict arrangements about forests, fodder has become so dear that it costs more than Rs. 5 to keep a single cow. This dearness of fodder, added to that of corn and other provisions, has quite embarrassed the people, while Government are bent on exacting money for everything. Originally forest conservancy was said to be intended for securing a more plentiful rainfall and for other humane purposes, but now it has been turned into a prolific source of revenue to Government and misery to the people. This state of things is aggravated by the absence of a remedy, because the very officers who are to be petitioned on the subject are busy in making strict arrangements to increase revenue and the people are thus left entirely at their mercy without any means to get out of the difficulties.

Alleged scarcity of salt at Ratnágiri and a suggestion to the District Collector.

29. The Satyá Shodhak (64), in its issue of the 30th August, says that owing to the closing of the local salt depôt and salt-pans, salt has become very dear at present at Ratnágiri, and that poor people are actually suffering from the scarcity of the article, and requests Mr. Cumine, the District Collector, who, observes the paper, is very kind and well acquainted with the real condition of the people, to enquire into the matter and to ask Government to re-establish the Government salt depôt or to make some other arrangement for the supply of salt at a cheap rate.

Remarks on the introduction of the Village Sanitation Act into the Surat District.

30. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 30th August, is glad to learn that steps are being taken in the Surat District to introduce the Village Sanitation Act, and says that if the Local Fund cess of an anna per rupee is increased to an anna and a half the rayat will feel much oppressed, and advises Government to consider the matter before enhancing the cess with a view to make the Act acceptable to the people.

Alleged issue of orders by the Superintendent of Army Schools to discontinue the use of the Hindi language in Native regiments.

31. The Pandit (155), in its issue of the 28th August, writes:—It is said that the Superintendent of Army Schools has issued orders to discontinue the use of Hindi in the Native regiments. It is to be hoped that the regimental people will be consulted before the order is made final, as the discontinuance of that language will be very inconvenient both to the regimental people and the transaction of business with them by Government, as the language is extensively used in all regiments.

Alleged habit of Christian missionaries to revile Hindu religion and a suggestion to Government in the matter.

32. The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 30th August, says:—An English missionary of a high order has said that there are altogether 8,000 females of the Gurav caste in Hindu temples who are all public prostitutes. This assertion of this wise missionary has been nicely refuted by an English newspaper called the Free Thinker. This paper says that there is at the most one singing girl in every temple in India, that European ladies are wanting in the virtues possessed by Hindu ladies, and that the Bible does not contain a single instance which can favourably compare with the description of Sita given in the Rámáyan. We need not confirm the truth of what the paper has said. Although it is true that being a conquered people we cannot say anything against the religion of the English, who are the conquerors, still if any one of us were to say that the Pádri (Christian missionary) keeps an evil eye upon several young and beautiful Christian ladies while absolving them of their sins, would the missionaries tolerate it? The best course is that nobody should revile another's religion. Our rulers should at once stop this folly of the missionaries. It is useless to expect the spread of Christianity by reviling Hinduism. The utterances of the missionaries against a subdued people are like the sitting of a frog on the back of an elephant merged in mud. They are only calculated to annoy the minds of the Hindus.

Suggestion with regard to grievances of passengers on the coasting steamers.

33. After expressing thankfulness to the British rule for the facilities of locomotion it has provided, the Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 3rd September, observes:—We are sorry to be constrained to say that the proprietors of the steamers plying on the Western Coast look principally to their profits. Whatever slight redress may have been obtained has been in a sense forced from them by Government. There is not one point alone on which there is cause for dissatisfaction. The want of due civility on the part of the officers, the over-crowding of the steamers, the want of separate latrines and privies for second class passengers in the quarters allotted to them, the absence of the necessary arrangements for the safety of passengers at the time of landing and embarking at the various ports, the non-provision of drinking water on board the steamers for the use of passengers, the over-crowding in the boats by which the passengers embark and disembark at the various ports, and the inconvenience of the time of the departure of the steamer in the morning, are amongst the manifold grievances of the passengers, but very little attention is paid to them. The passengers and the press have been crying themselves hoarse, but to no purpose. Government has made some rules, but to what purpose? They remain on paper and the old order of things continues. What is wanted is their rigid enforcement. The matter is so important that, if need be, legislation should be resorted to. The report of the Commission that sat here recently does not go far enough in the interests of the passengers. We have very little hope that the company will redress the grievances of passengers. Government alone is in a position to bring it to a sense of its duty. We have already several times written on this subject. The non-removal of the grievances in any appreciable manner makes it our duty to draw the attention of Government to the matter once more. What the Government ought to do is to pass adequate rules and to appoint a well-paid inspector to see that the rules are not broken, and generally to look after the interests of passengers. An officer to whom they can complain and who is empowered to prosecute the company for breach of the promulgated rules, is a pressing necessity. Copies of such rules in the vernacular should also be posted in prominent places on the steamers. We prefer this appeal to Government once more, this year, as the company will shortly recommence its annual traffic.

Fine levied by the local Government on land acquired from the State by the people at Bandora, Mátunga and other places in Thána.

34. The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—Mr. Lungrana's letter, published in the columns of our contemporaries, puts the whole case very neatly against the ill-advised action of the Bombay Government to levy the preposterous fine of Rs. 5,000 on new plots of land which people may be willing to acquire from the State in Mátunga, Bandora, and other places in Sálsette. They have fully pointed out both the absurdity and the inexpediency of this ruling of the executive, and we have nothing further to add to their just criticism thereon. The State may consider itself justified to levy in anticipation its share of the "unearned increment." But surely there ought to be some rational principle on which to levy it. As matters now stand, the ruling is purely arbitrary. The "fine," as it is somewhat facetiously called, seems to bear no ratio whatever to the value of the land, present and prospective. It is computed on a fancied prospective appreciation. But it is altogether an unknown quantity. It is a problem. Nay, it may be observed that in some parts where the fine is levied there has been for some time past a depreciation. The political economy of the Collector and the Commissioner seems to be on all fours. But as in many other matters, so in this, the teachings of that dismal science, as taught by our latter-day economists, are ignored by the bureaucracy here. It has a soul above political economy. In its eyes it has but one meaning—the amount of increased revenue and taxation which could be squeezed from the tax-payers. It is an intensely comfortable doctrine, especially when it is practically enforced by the argumentum baculum. The simplicity of British Indian political economy is such that it might bring a blush to the face of the most accomplished and scientific economists of the day; while writers on political ethics may, if so inclined, pull to pieces this simplicity, which is only a synonym for departmental spoliation. Mr. Lungrana and others may petition and pray, but they will mistake their public spirit if they think they could have the ghost of a chance of an amelioration of this oppressive land "royalty." The patent screw is a golden one, and the Government, which in these days has to fumble here, there and everywhere for a few hundred rupees for primary education, medical aid and police, is not a liberal-minded one to be appealed to. They must possess their soul in patience till another Mountstuart Elphinstone should come to their aid. Reactionary mediocrities can never be expected to advance the welfare of a community, nor, for that matter, give satisfaction and contentment to the ruled.

Remarks on the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Ishwarlál Ochchhavrám as Honorary Magistrate, Ahmedabad, to try municipal cases.

35. A correspondent of the Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 30th August, regrets that there should not be a single political association at Ahmedabad to protest against the appointments of municipal commissioners as Honorary Magistrates, who in trying municipal cases sit in judgment over their own action, as was the case with Ráo Sáheb Ishwarlál Ochchhavrám, Third Class Magistrate, Ahmedabad. The correspondent observes that Ráo Sáheb Ishwarlál is a nominated member of the Ahmedabad Municipality and in that capacity he had to consider the numerous petitions made against the tax levied for the removal of dirty water, and that now he has to try the self-same petitioners.

Diseased meat in the bazars of Bombay and the punishment received by the offenders.

36. The Bombay Samachár (96), in its issue of the 3rd September, says:—Cases of bringing diseased meat, not slaughtered at the authorized slaughter-house, and offering it for sale, have become frequent of late. On Tuesday last two persons charged with this offence were placed before Mr. Hamilton, the Second Presidency Magistrate, at the Girgaon Police Court, and on conviction were fined in the amounts of Rs. 5 and 10. These fines were very light, considering the frequency with which the offence is committed and the profit made in the absence of detection. It is desirable that in order to protect the public these offenders should be more heavily fined or even sent to jail.

Swindlers in Bombay and the local police.

37. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 30th August, observes:—"A victim" of the gigantic swindling going on in Bombay and exposed under the dramatic name of the "confidence trick," writes to the Times of India, yesterday, that "I casually mentioned the occurrence to Inspector Frámji, of the detective force, who said he knew of the trick long ago." If this be true—and our contemporary would not have given insertion to an unauthenticated version of it—the question arises, why did the police fail in putting down "this gang of daylight robbers" brought to their notice "so long ago"? We cannot believe that Mr. Inspector Frámji did not report to his superiors the existence of this enormity which he knew "long ago"; hence the question has greater force: What, if any, were the measures adopted by the police to stamp out this crime so extensively practised, when they came to know of it "long ago"? The fearful extent of this crime in Bombay was, certainly, a matter of notoriety in Bombay "long ago"; we recollect its having first reached our ears some five years before, and certain names, not unknown to the police, were freely mentioned in connection with it. Our wonder is that the crime remained undetected and the criminals even unpunished so "long ago." And what is done even now, pray?

38. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 31st August, writes:—Bombay has been of late subject to periodical depredations of a certain gang of swindlers, who carry on their trade in defiance of all law. They are successful in their operations, no doubt, because there are people credulous enough to be their dupes; but what are the police, the guardians of the law, the protectors of the life and property of the people, good for if they cannot track out these swindlers and bring them to justice? It has been alleged that the police are powerless because the law does not make cheating a cognizable offence. But these acts of cheating have been done so persistently, and on such an organized scale, that the police could have, if they had set about the matter in earnest, devised measures to arm themselves with the necessary powers for the purpose of arresting the swindlers. As our contemporary of the Rást Goftár observes, the trick has been long known to the police, and it is a matter for no less regret than surprise that the police have been so supine all this time. We have more than once called attention to the organized swindling that is carried on under one pretence or another. The circumstances are often romantic and sometimes bordering on the ridiculous, but each time a fraud is perpetrated to the tune of several thousands. The swindling is carried on by fits and starts. There are periodical eruptions. They get a few fat funds, and then lie quiet, to begin operations again. The present is one of those periods of activity, but it must be recognized to be a part of a system, and not an isolated and passing phase of crime. The Bombay Police have a great reputation for cleverness. Let us hope that for their own reputation they will bestir themselves and save the simple folk of Bombay with money and no brains from being victimized by these hardened sharpers. [The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 30th August, and the Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 1st September, express similar sentiments. The former adds that the police should watch the movements of the swindlers, and inform the public from time to time through the medium of newspapers of their whereabouts, and warn them against their attacks.]

Part II.—Railways.

A complaint against the G. I. P. Railway authorities for alleged inattention to the convenience and comfort of female passengers.

39. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 31st August, complains:—A carriage of the passenger train that started from the Victoria Terminus of the G. I. P. Railway at 7-5 A.M. on 29th August was reserved for ladies and some females were sitting in it. On arrival of this train at the Byculla Station a number of male mill-hands forcibly entered the female carriage and took their seats in it, in spite of the vehement protests of the female passengers. A complaint against this conduct of the mill-labourers was made to the guard in charge of the train, the station-master and other railway officials, but no notice of it was taken by any of them. The annual Jain religious holidays have commenced and nearly three thousand male and female Jains daily travel by this line for some days, and it is surprising that the railway officials should be so inattentive to the convenience and comfort of female passengers.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Adverse remarks about the late president of the Wái Municipality and the Reporter on the Native Press.

40. The Moda Vritt (50), of Wái, in its issue of the 3rd September, considers its local contemporary, the Vrittasár, (78) to have been actuated by selfish motives in praising Mr. L. M. Sáthe, late Mámlatdár and president of the local municipality, and saying that it was a mistake to transfer him from Wái, and observes that the condition of the municipality under the late president was bad and would have become worse if he had not been transferred as he was, that he made false reports about the municipality, and that the Reporter on the Native Press being his brother, similar writings published in the Vrittasár newspaper, which was partial to him, were brought to the notice of Government, while writings representing the other side of the case and published in the Moda Vritt were not reported to Government.

PART IV.—Native States.

Final arrangement of Manipur affairs and remarks thereon.

41. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—The Royal proclamation on the subject of the arrangements to be made for the administration of Manipur has been published. The Queen-Empress has been graciously pleased to forego her right to annex the State, though it has become liable to that penalty. This decision will be gratifying to every loyal subject of Her Majesty. As regards the future arrangement, Her Majesty empowers the Governor-General to name the future ruler of the State and the conditions under which he will be invested with power. We hope the power thus conferred will be used with such discretion that the doctrine of tall poppies may not be heard of again. The Bombay Gazette suggests the idea of restoring the Mahárája Sur Chandra Sing. He is well disposed to the British Government and besides "is weak and by no means conspicuous for his capacity." But, adds our contemporary, weakness is relative and this need not now disqualify the Mahárája. We approve and support the suggestion, with the further reason that the above description of the Mahárája fully satisfies the test publicly declared by the able assistant of Lord Cross. As regards the past conduct of the Government of India, it is now useless to make any comments. But still the mild disapproval of Lord Cross of the intended arrest of the Senápati in Darbár is worth noticing, and shows that official sense, howsoever assertive and one-sided it may be, cannot afford to wholly disregard public opinion. Excepting this faint note of dissent His Lordship approves of the action of the Government of India in this matter, thus finally deciding the important question of the independence or semi-independence of such States. We may therefore take it for certain that this is the last time when we hear of the so-called independence of Native States and their rulers and also of Darbárs held for the purpose of arresting them.

42. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 30th August, observes:—Much anxiety had been felt about the future of Manipur, and we are glad to learn by the recent proclamation of the Queen and the Viceroy's resolution that Government consider the sentences passed on the princes and several other Manipuris connected with the matter quite adequate and therefore do not intend annexing the State. [The Hindusthán (108), in its issue of the same date, disapproves of the sentences passed on the Manipur princes, but is glad that Government has decided not to annex the State. The Din Mani (81), in its issue of the 1st September, expresses similar sentiments.]

Alleged message sent by His Excellency the Viceroy to the Secretary of State for India in connection with the sentence passed on the Manipur princes.

43. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 29th August, writes:—The Morning Post has published an extract of an extraordinary character from what is alleged to be a telegram sent to the Secretary of State by the Marquis of Lansdowne. "If decision Executive Council regarding Senápati and Tongal General not confirmed, I unreservedly resign." This piece of intelligence is striking in more ways than one. First, how could the contents of the private telegram, presumably sent in cypher, leak out unless there has been somewhere or other a breach of the Official Secrets Act? It is not at all likely that the Morning Post is in a vein for jocularity, for it would hardly be deemed consistent with common sense that a journal of position would venture to take upon itself the responsibility of publishing such a startling intelligence. But if it be true, it does not contribute much to the sound and practical wisdom which has characterized the present Viceroy. To say that he is prepared to resign unless his judgment meets with an endorsement of full approval from the Secretary of State, apparently sounds too puerile for a Viceroy, and what makes it all the more surprising is the circumstances of the present case in which the extreme penalty of the law is inflicted on two men and under threat of resignation an unreserved sanction of the penalty is demanded so as entirely to shut out every loophole for any mitigation of the sentence. Moreover, can a Viceroy or any other official, for the matter of that, consider his reasoning faculty so unerring that his orders and judgments are never to be called into question and in the event of their being impeached threaten resignation? In fact, we think a due consideration of the telegram launches us into such absurdities that it sounds too strange to be true. [The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 31st August, expresses similar sentiments.]

Utilisation of the troops of Native States and remarks thereon.

44. The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 30th August, writes:—The more we consider the policy of the Government of India with regard to the imperialisation of the troops of Native States, the stronger grows our conviction that it is an entirely selfish policy. The objects ostensibly proclaimed may be all that it says. No doubt a smaller but disciplined force is better than a tagrag and irregular one. It may also be that the troops under Colonel Mellis's scheme of organisation would in time to come prove of some service on the frontier, and that some of the hereditary nobility may thus find vent for its military ardour. These are apparent advantages. But our people should try to dive a little below the surface. They should not be dazzled by this trumpery show of imperialised troops. The Government of India's wisdom is as the wisdom of the serpent. It is wise because it thinks that practically several birds could be killed with one stone. Firstly, the object is to save the imperial treasury the cost of additional troops, cavalry and infantry. The military expenditure of the empire is growing so rapidly and at such an alarming speed that there is now a bitter cry against it from all quarters. If the Government increases the expense of the army services at this rate for a few years more there is certain to be another financial embarrassment. The Finance Minister clearly perceives this. He has spoken in no uncertain tones on this matter in his last financial statement. In the face of these facts, which the more they become widely known the greater is the dissatisfaction they engender, the Government of India dare not increase the number of troops which are now supposed to be absolutely necessary, according to its military advisers, to guard the huge indefinite line of frontier and transfrontier defences which its own impolicy has created. These advisers say that if European and Native regular troops are required for ordinary garrisoning there would be very little of these forces left for field operations. So the convenient plan of the so-called imperialisation of the forces of Native feudatories was resolved upon. By this means they have actually added to the existing army strength about 17,000 men without incurring a pie of their cost, which, of course, the loyal feudatories have agreed with a light heart to bear. But, we fear, these Princes have thought little of the morrow of their own finances and much less of the financial obligations they have thus heedlessly imposed on themselves and their own tax-payers. They seem to be scarcely aware of the costliness of British army organisation of which the Indian Government itself has loudly complained in more than one despatch during the last 13 years. There is going on an incessant change in arms, ammunition and accoutrements. What is considered the best to-day is condemned the next day, and so on, taking one year with another. Hence every exigency which demands fresh organisation and fresh descriptions of arms will tell heavily on these feudatories, till, one day, when they begin to cast up totals, they will be appalled to learn what a huge financial obligation they have thoughtlessly undertaken and how fast their tax-payers may sink under it. This is number one bird killed by the Government of India. It has saved its treasury at the expense of these unreflective States. Secondly, after all, these disciplined troops will do nothing more than garrison duty. That means they are to be religiously refused employment in the active field of operations. This would, no doubt, be a sure disappointment to them. But it is part and parcel of the new policy, which under the guise of trust mistrusts everything connected with Native States and their rabble army. The very fact of these imperialised troops being destined for such garrison service only, and that too wide apart in distant places, proves this policy of mistrust. And so far, the third object is secured, namely, that of segregating the forces so that they may never coalesce. In so mistrusting Native States the Government displays not only its insincerity but great weakness. Is it worthy of a powerful Government so to betray its fear of a rabble army, which it has often proclaimed to be more or less contemptible? The fourth object is equally open to criticism. It may be highly diplomatic, but it is a question whether it could be approved from the point of ethics. This is the disbandment of the rest of the troops of Native feudatories. They number over 3¼ lakhs. Of these 17,000 will be disciplined. An equal or even double that number will still perform home duties. But the bulk of the forces will be nowhere. They must convert their arms into plough-shares. The large number was a menace in the eyes of the military advisers of the Government. They will be a menace no longer. Thus the military death-knell of the feudatories has been tolled. The policy is now an accomplished or almost an accomplished fact. The whole country, including the States, may now be said to be thoroughly emasculated. On the policy of fear this emasculation has proceeded. Whether it is wise, time may show. But, we think we have sufficiently shown that the imperialisation of Native troops owes its origin to pure selfishness and mistrust. And to the same cause may be assigned the dogged refusal of the military authorities to establish a Military Sandhurst.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration of India.

1. The Chikitsak (27), in its issue of the 2nd September, says:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has surpassed Lord Lytton, who lavishly spent money from the poor Indian treasury, sacrificed the lives of millions of Native sepoys in aggressive foreign expeditions, and allowed 52 lakhs of people in the Bombay and Madras Presidencies to die of famine and thereby created much discontent, which was partially allayed by Lord Ripon. No sooner did Lord Lansdowne assume his office than Kashmere was pronounced to be misgoverned and was virtually annexed to the British dominions. The Age of Consent Act and the Manipur affair, which makes one's hair stand on their ends, are things which will never be forgotten. The liberty of the press is now threatened, probably because Lord Lansdowne dislikes comments made on his acts and is determined to stick to his oppressive policy. Our readers are aware how the political officers have commenced in right earnest to reduce the Native Princes of India in importance by depriving them even of their nominal freedom and emptying their treasuries. It is the newspapers which expose their acts to public gaze and it is intended to remove them altogether. With this object in view was issued the order regarding newspapers in Native States, whereby the political officers have been invested with power to suppress them. Owing to this order the Prajáhitaishi newspaper in the Central Provinces and the Deccan Times of Hyderabad were discontinued, and the newspapers in other Native States are threatened with a similar fate; nor are the newspapers in the British territories which sympathise with them free from this fear. Although the Bangabasi alone is now being prosecuted under Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code, several others will be similarly dealt with hereafter, and they should therefore be on their guard.

Remarks in connection with the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper.

2. While writing about the Bangabasi prosecution, the Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 6th September, observes:—We are extremely grieved that the Government of India should have been so badly advised as to have condescended to take notice of all the effusions which Mr. Jackson so ably dissected and proved to be perfectly innocuous. There was more in the defence made by that learned counsel which was to the point. A larger amount of serious matter which could be fairly construed as seditious is now and again to be found in Anglo-Indian prints of supposed respectability, especially some prints which are the accredited organs of merchants and planters. Dissatisfaction and sullen discontent are engendered more by this class of Anglo-Indian organs of public opinion than any other. There is much vile abuse of a most exasperating character to be found now and again in such journals, and we cannot help remarking that even such highly respectable and leading papers like the Pioneer and the Englishman have in the past not been free from aberrations of this kind. We fear the Government has entirely gone on the wrong track. No number of repressive statutes to gag the vernacular press will ever prevent sedition, if seeds of sedition are deeply implanted in the heart of the average Indian. We do not, however, think such is the case. But we do believe that the reactionary policy pursued, not only by the Imperial Government but by all the provincial Governments also for the last six years, is beginning to have its baneful influence on the masses. Apart from the mad transfrontier policy which has augmented taxation and made salt dear, there have not been wanting tangible proofs in every part of the empire of the feeling that that stern impartiality and justice which once characterised the administration of the British in India are slowly but steadily vanishing. The growing arbitrariness of all the Governments, the vagaries of our law courts and of our magistracy all over the country, are daily becoming the theme of adverse criticism in the Native press. They are a growing scandal. You cannot take up a single leading paper in which you do not meet with a flagrant instance of official wrong-doing or miscarriage of justice, especially where the accused is a European. Now, whatever may be the policy of the State as a landlord, whatever its foreign policy, whatever its attitude towards education and the feudatories, and so forth, the one thing which ought to keep India contented, if not prosperous, is impartial justice.

It is on this solid foundation of impartiality that British rule in India rests. We deny that it is the bayonet that keeps it so. We deny that India will become even more contented and happy if the Government endeavours to have twice the number of troops in the country. We firmly believe in the axiom that the more is India governed on the principles of justice and impartiality, of truth and righteousness, of sympathy and benevolence, the more will the foundations of the glorious empire widen and become firm as rock. The evils of the policy of terror, repression and unrighteousness witnessed for some time past would have never outgrown themselves as they have, had it not been for the total absence of enquiry into the just and reasonable grievances of Indians every twenty years, which was the case prior to the transfer of the government to the Crown. We earnestly ask the Imperial Government to probe deep the sores which are now slowly rankling in the hearts of the mute masses. Let it trace to its source that mental seclusion which characterises their general attitude—that reservation of mind which out of sheer fear of the consequences of the unwise policy of repression at present pursued shrinks to tell the real tale of dissatisfaction and discontent. It is in this direction that the efforts of a wise and mighty Government should be directed rather than in prosecutions of the Bangabasi character. Hundred prosecutions like it and any number of gagging Acts will not make the people more loyal and better affected towards their rulers, if the seeds of growing dissatisfaction and discontent with the existing conditions of government are allowed to grow till past remedy. The danger lies there. Is there statesmanship at head-quarters to arrest that growth and kill the seeds while still in the process of germination?

3. While commenting on the same subject, the Chandinshu (25), in its issue of the 6th September, says that the action of Government in the matter is only in keeping with the despotic rule that India has been under for a long time past and shows that the will of the paramount British rulers is the law to the ruled, which the latter must accept without grumbling as just and intended to promote their interests and comments against which are always likely to be treated as seditious. The power of the English in India, adds the paper, is absolute, and nobody can come in their way if they transport those who make adverse criticisms on their acts. This kind of unrestrained action does not, however, betoken future good.

4. The Hindusthán (108), in its issue of the 6th September, observes :—The prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper shows that Government look with disfavour on the Native press, and Mr. Jackson's defence clearly shows how far Government are justified in taking the action. It also shows how the law is twisted to meet the views of Government. When Section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code was framed in the régime of Lord Lytton, the present Advocate-General, the Honourable Mr. Evans, expressed his opinion that it would not apply to those who strongly criticised the action of Government, and it is surprising to find the same gentleman putting quite a different interpretation on it now which, if endorsed by the Court, would serve to gag the press.—The Surya Prakásh (91), in its issue of the 5th September, disapproves of the action of Government in prosecuting the Bangabasi as a test case, praises the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court for his independence, and says that the accused have got now sufficient time to get up a defence and that if they are acquitted the circulation of the paper will increase.

5. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 6th September, observes :—Sir Alexander Miller's letter to the Times of India to the effect that he knew nothing about the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper till he read of it in the Pioneer shows that the Bengal Government has boldly undertaken the prosecution without even consulting the Legal Member of the Viceregal Council. Those Government officers who understand well the vernacular languages do not treat with contempt what appears in the Native press, but try to attend to the complaints and suggestions made through its medium; and Government have for the purpose of knowing the general views of the Native press instituted a special department, that of the Reporter on the Native Press. It is therefore not right that Government should try to gag the whole Native press for the sake of a few scurrilous prints.

6. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 2nd September, writes:—Our fellow-citizens of the benighted Madras Presidency will, or rather ought to, entertain a different opinion of their Governor. The notorious "Devil's Dance" and the projected gubernatorial cricket-match had, indeed, thrown him into bad odour and many of the Native organs could hardly refrain from openly expressing their disapproval of his administration at the very outset of his career. It was, therefore, fortunate that the Governor had an opportunity of convincing his subjects that he was not so indifferent to their welfare as he was represented to be. The task of undertaking the relief of the famine-stricken districts in Madras was a stupendous one, and Lord Wenlock has not spared himself in alleviating with the greatest promptitude the miseries of his subjects, so far as lay in his power. In fairness to him it ought to be admitted even by the most malignant of his critics that he has sacrificed much in the fulfilment of his task, and that he has certainly not contented himself with the conversion of his office into a sinecure by basking in the sunshine of the gubernatorial halo. Lord Wenlock has made ample reparation for his tarnished reputation, and it is to be hoped that his future administration will be characterised by the display of equally laudable efforts for the advancement of the welfare of his subjects.

His Excellency Lord Wenlock's administration of the Madras Presidency.

7. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—Some of the papers are giving currency to a rumour that His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught will succeed General Roberts as the Commander-in-Chief of India. It is not quite improbable that it should be so, and if what is rumoured comes to pass we have every hope that the peaceful Duke will bless the country by securing to it those changes in the organization of the Indian army which have been long delayed. With the Duke as the Commander-in-Chief of India and Lord Reay as the Viceroy, India would be soon made very happy. These two noblemen would push Indian interests forward by 25 years and make the foundations of the British power in India securely permanent.

Appointments of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as Commander-in-Chief and Lord Reay as the Viceroy of India desired.

8. The Gujarát Mitrá (85), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—Mr. Wádia's term of office in the Bombay Legislative Council having come to a termination the Council is now without any Pársi member. The Supreme Legislative Council has had no Pársi member since the resignation of Sir Dinshaw M. Petit, Bart. We sincerely regret that Government should at times present such an unaccountable indifference to the proper representation of minorities. No Council, we dare say without any racial prejudice, can be considered complete in its constitution without a recognized leader or two of an advanced and intelligent community like that of the Pársis. We sincerely trust that the gaps caused in the Provincial and Supreme Councils will soon be filled up by the nomination of the most intelligent and public-spirited representatives.

Want of a representative of the Pársi community in the Supreme and Bombay Legislative Councils.

9. The Dhárwár Vritt (31), in its issue of the 10th September, states that a man who had supplied fireworks to the value of Rs. 101 on the occasion of the reception given to Lord Reay at Dhárwár in 1888, and who had not been paid that sum in spite of repeated entreaties, having filed a suit against five commissioners of the local municipality for the recovery of the said amount with interest, the Court decided that the municipality was not in any way liable for the amount of the suit and that all the Native municipal commissioners having in combination with other inhabitants of the town arranged the reception on their own account should pay the amount. In commenting on this occurrence the paper regrets that the people of Dhárwár should have brought their names into discredit without being freed from the obligation of payment, and says that if Lord Reay had heard of this suit while in India he would have once for all paid the amount of it from his own pocket and would not have accepted any such public receptions any more, and

A suit for the recovery of outstanding debts in connection with Lord Reay's reception at Dhárwár in 1888 and comments thereon.

It is on this solid foundation of impartiality that British rule in India rests. We deny that it is the bayonet that keeps it so. We deny that India will become even more contented and happy if the Government endeavours to have twice the number of troops in the country. We firmly believe in the axiom that the more is India governed on the principles of justice and impartiality, of truth and righteousness, of sympathy and benevolence, the more will the foundations of the glorious empire widen and become firm as rock. The evils of the policy of terror, repression and unrighteousness witnessed for some time past would have never outgrown themselves as they have, had it not been for the total absence of enquiry into the just and reasonable grievances of Indians every twenty years, which was the case prior to the transfer of the government to the Crown. We earnestly ask the Imperial Government to probe deep the sores which are now slowly rankling in the hearts of the mute masses. Let it trace to its source that mental seclusion which characterises their general attitude—that reservation of mind which out of sheer fear of the consequences of the unwise policy of repression at present pursued shrinks to tell the real tale of dissatisfaction and discontent. It is in this direction that the efforts of a wise and mighty Government should be directed rather than in prosecutions of the Bangabasi character. Hundred prosecutions like it and any number of gagging Acts will not make the people more loyal and better affected towards their rulers, if the seeds of growing dissatisfaction and discontent with the existing conditions of government are allowed to grow till past remedy. The danger lies there. Is there statesmanship at head-quarters to arrest that growth and kill the seeds while still in the process of germination?

3. While commenting on the same subject, the Chandinshu (25), in its issue of the 6th September, says that the action of Government in the matter is only in keeping with the despotic rule that India has been under for a long time past and shows that the will of the paramount British rulers is the law to the ruled, which the latter must accept without grumbling as just and intended to promote their interests and comments against which are always likely to be treated as seditious. The power of the English in India, adds the paper, is absolute, and nobody can come in their way if they transport those who make adverse criticisms on their acts. This kind of unrestrained action does not, however, betoken future good.

4. The Hindusthán (108), in its issue of the 6th September, observes:—The prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper shows that Government look with disfavour on the Native press, and Mr. Jackson's defence clearly shows how far Government are justified in taking the action. It also shows how the law is twisted to meet the views of Government. When Section 124 A of the Indian Penal Code was framed in the régime of Lord Lytton, the present Advocate-General, the Honourable Mr. Evans, expressed his opinion that it would not apply to those who strongly criticised the action of Government, and it is surprising to find the same gentleman putting quite a different interpretation on it now which, if endorsed by the Court, would serve to gag the press.—The Surya Prakash (91), in its issue of the 5th September, disapproves of the action of Government in prosecuting the Bangabasi as a test case, praises the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court for his independence, and says that the accused have got now sufficient time to get up a defence and that if they are acquitted the circulation of the paper will increase.

5. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 6th September, observes:—Sir Alexander Miller's letter to the Times of India to the effect that he knew nothing about the prosecution of the Bangabasi newspaper till he read of it in the Pioneer shows that the Bengal Government has boldly undertaken the prosecution without even consulting the Legal Member of the Viceregal Council. Those Government officers who understand well the vernacular languages do not treat with contempt what appears in the Native press, but try to attend to the complaints and suggestions made through its medium; and Government have for the purpose of knowing the general views of the Native press instituted a special department, that of the Reporter on the Native Press. It is therefore not right that Government should try to gag the whole Native press for the sake of a few scurrilous prints.

6. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 2nd September, writes:—Our fellow-citizens of the benighted Madras Presidency will, or rather ought to, entertain a different opinion of their Governor. The notorious "Devil's Dance" and the projected gubernatorial cricket-match had, indeed, thrown him into bad odour and many of the Native organs could hardly refrain from openly expressing their disapproval of his administration at the very outset of his career. It was, therefore, fortunate that the Governor had an opportunity of convincing his subjects that he was not so indifferent to their welfare as he was represented to be. The task of undertaking the relief of the famine-stricken districts in Madras was a stupendous one, and Lord Wenlock has not spared himself in alleviating with the greatest promptitude the miseries of his subjects, so far as lay in his power. In fairness to him it ought to be admitted even by the most malignant of his critics that he has sacrificed much in the fulfilment of his task, and that he has certainly not contented himself with the conversion of his office into a sinecure by basking in the sunshine of the gubernatorial halo. Lord Wenlock has made ample reparation for his tarnished reputation, and it is to be hoped that his future administration will be characterised by the display of equally laudable efforts for the advancement of the welfare of his subjects.

His Excellency Lord Wenlock's administration of the Madras Presidency.

7. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—Some of the papers are giving currency to a rumour that His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught will succeed General Roberts as the Commander-in-Chief of India. It is not quite improbable that it should be so, and if what is rumoured comes to pass we have every hope that the peaceful Duke will bless the country by securing to it those changes in the organization of the Indian army which have been long delayed. With the Duke as the Commander-in-Chief of India and Lord Reay as the Viceroy, India would be soon made very happy. These two noblemen would push Indian interests forward by 25 years and make the foundations of the British power in India securely permanent.

Appointments of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as Commander-in-Chief and Lord Reay as the Viceroy of India desired.

8. The Gujarát Mitra (85), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—Mr. Wádia's term of office in the Bombay Legislative Council having come to a termination the Council is now without any Pársi member. The Supreme Legislative Council has had no Pársi member since the resignation of Sir Dinshaw M. Petit, Bart. We sincerely regret that Government should at times present such an unaccountable indifference to the proper representation of minorities. No Council, we dare say without any racial prejudice, can be considered complete in its constitution without a recognized leader or two of an advanced and intelligent community like that of the Pársis. We sincerely trust that the gaps caused in the Provincial and Supreme Councils will soon be filled up by the nomination of the most intelligent and public-spirited representatives.

Want of a representative of the Pársi community in the Supreme and Bombay Legislative Councils.

9. The Dhárwár Vritt (31), in its issue of the 10th September, states that a man who had supplied fireworks to the value of Rs. 101 on the occasion of the reception given to Lord Reay at Dhárwár in 1888, and who had not been paid that sum in spite of repeated entreaties, having filed a suit against five commissioners of the local municipality for the recovery of the said amount with interest, the Court decided that the municipality was not in any way liable for the amount of the suit and that all the Native municipal commissioners having in combination with other inhabitants of the town arranged the reception on their own account should pay the amount. In commenting on this occurrence the paper regrets that the people of Dhárwár should have brought their names into discredit without being freed from the obligation of payment, and says that if Lord Reay had heard of this suit while in India he would have once for all paid the amount of it from his own pocket and would not have accepted any such public receptions any more, and that if the Dhárwár people did not mean to pay the expenses of the reception they gave they should not have busied themselves with a matter which was of not much consequence to His Lordship.

A suit for the recovery of outstanding debts in connection with Lord Reay's reception at Dhárwár in 1888 and comments thereon.

Alleged discontent in the Central Provinces about the revenue settlements.

10. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—As we stated before, there appears to be wide discontentment felt in the Central Provinces about the revenue settlements. They are acting very properly in those provinces in publicly ventilating their grievance. It appears from the Nyáya Sindhu newspaper of Harda that the people expected that the Chief Commissioner would avail himself of the occasion of his visit to Biláspur and make personal enquiries into the grievances, but that they were very sadly disappointed. In other provinces where revision surveys have taken place or are taking place the people are no better. The Indian National Congress will be held this year at Nágpur, and we would suggest that a deputation ought to be appointed at the Congress to wait upon Government and press the land grievance upon its attention. Those provinces which do not enjoy the benefits of a permanent settlement ought to share the expenses of the deputation. Should the Central Committee of the Congress at Nágpur pay attention to this suggestion and correspond with leaders in other provinces, we think there will not be much difficulty in finding both men and money for the deputation.

Anti-opium movement and comments on it.

11. The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 6th September, deprecates the movement that is started in Poona against opium and its growth in India as being highly injurious to the finances of India and likely to lead to some additional tax being imposed upon the people with a view to recoup Government from the loss of opium revenue, and says that Government should rather discourage the manufacture and consumption of liquors which are productive of much greater mischief. The paper says that the use of spirituous liquors is not protested against and no efforts are made to induce Government to diminish or altogether eradicate the vice of drinking, because, unlike opium, the non-production of which will affect injuriously the finances of India alone, liquors form a source of much profit to Europeans and to Government and the discouragement of their manufacture and consumption will cause much loss to European traders.

The authorised translation of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Nulkar's speech in support of the Age of Consent Bill and its utility.

12. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 8th September, acknowledges receipt of a copy of the Maráthi translation of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Nulkar's speech delivered in the Supreme Legislative Council in support of the Age of Consent Bill and says that as it does not wish to re-open the subject of the Bill and draw the attention of the public to the dissatisfactory circumstances in connection with it, it cannot make it convenient to let the copy lie on its editorial table. The translation, adds the paper, is not calculated to alter public opinion on the subject of the Bill, and though translations of the speeches made in the Legislative Councils would have been of some use in times gone by when the vernacular newspapers did not command wide circulation and were not powerful, they can serve no purpose at the present time, when the press discusses every important topic at considerable length, beyond affording useless work to the translator and some satisfaction to the makers of the speeches translated.

Further steps in the matter of the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

13. The Hindi Punch (147), in its issue of the 6th September, gives a cartoon entitled "The Cricket Match of the Season—The Pársis vs. the Police," and the letter-press runs as under:—(With apologies to Linley Sambourne.)—W. G. N.—I find the Pársi bowling too hot, and in the second inning I don't know what may result. Their balls come straight on the middle stump! H.rr.s.—Oh! They "break awful, right and left, and shoot like mad." But cheer up, my lad; anyhow we'll make a good stand! The Punch gives the following explanation of the cartoon:—After the most disappointing and evasive reply of the Bombay Government based on the confidential and secret reports of Colonel Wilson, the Commissioner of Police, and others, the Pársis have resolved to carry the matter of the tower tragedy to the Secretary of State for India and to the House of Commons.

Remarks on a hand-bill recently issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society.

14. A correspondent of the Jáme Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 12th September, praises the missionaries for their zeal in spreading the Christian religion, and warns them against wounding the religious feelings of the Hindus by insulting their gods, as is seen from a Maráthi hand-bill entitled the 'Janmáshtami or Gokuláshtami' recently issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society and of which 20,000 copies are said to have been printed.

Fine levied by the local Government on land acquired from the State by the people at Bandora and other places in Sálsette.

15. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of 10th September, observes :— The Bombay Government at the request of the inhabitants of Bandora and other places in Sálsette have reduced the fine levied on building sites by the Collector of Thána from Rs. 5,000 to only Rs. 3,000 per acre, but this will hardly give general satisfaction. Within the last 25 years the fine has been gradually raised from Rs. 30 to Rs. 1,000 and it is strange that Government should have seen fit to treble it at one stroke. Moreover, there is no guarantee that it will not be further increased. The fine of Rs. 3,000 is prohibitive. One of the suggestions of the Bombay Extension Committee was that the slaughter-house should be removed from Bandora to Mátunga and that its site should be utilized for building purposes, and Government ought to encourage such people as are desirous of building houses at Bandora instead of levying such high fines. It seems that the extension scheme of Lord Reay has been discountenanced by the present Government, just in the same way as several other acts of His Lordship have been ignored. [The Jáme Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 8th September, expresses similar sentiments.]

Alleged hardship caused by the new rules on the subject of grazing.

16. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 7th September, says :— The people in the Sátára District are suffering a great deal of inconvenience owing to the closure of gáyrán for grazing purposes and a number of them from the Pátan, Karád and other tálukas in the district have gone to Sátára with petitions to the District Collector, earnestly entreating him to grant them some concessions in this respect. We suggest that Government should take prompt measures to remove the cause of their complaint. We hear that the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha is going to send shortly a petition to Government on this question. [Several other papers of the week write on the subject of the revised rules for the regulation of grazing, and pray that Government may alter them so as to give greater facilities to the people as regards grazing.]

An alleged death at the hands of the Kumtha Police while extorting confession from a suspected offender.

17. The Kumtha Vritt (46), in its issue of the 3rd September, states that it is very commonly believed by the people at Kumtha that one Subráy Shetti, who had been taken by the Kumtha Police into their custody in connection with the investigation into a theft recently committed at that place and whose corpse was found in the river, must have met with death at the hands of the Police while the latter were trying to force a confession from him, and says that the authorities concerned should take due notice of the circumstances of the case.

Frequency of murders, thefts, &c., in the Dhárwár District and the alleged inactivity of the police.

18. The Dhárwár Vritt (31), in its issue of the 3rd September, says :— Murder, dacoities, assaults and thefts have of late become rampant in the Dhárwár District owing to the inactivity of the police, and people have begun to doubt whether the district is governed by the British or has been made over to the Mogul misrule or the Nizám's Government. If this state of things is allowed to continue it will be very difficult to live in the district. We think the whole police force should be replaced with a view to see if then the state of things would improve. Gambling is carried on at certain places at Dhárwár, but the police have taken no steps that we know of in the matter. Is it not surprising that there should be no detective police force here when so many offences are committed ?

19. A correspondent, writing over the signature of "X" to the Vritta Sudha (79) in its issue of the 8th September, complains of the guraves or worshippers of the idols of Hindu gods in the fort at Sátára, who are said to have had houses there for a long time, having been asked by the military authorities in charge of the fort to remove the idols from the fort and refused permits to go and worship them where they are at present, and requests Mr. Candy, the District Collector, to see that they are allowed to continue the worship of the idols in the fort as hitherto, saying that according to the Hindu religion idols once established at any place cannot be removed from their place, and that a peremptory order to the guraves refusing them permission to enter the fort will be very distressing to the Hindus and will be considered a kind of interference with their faith, which Government has promised to leave uninterfered with.

A complaint of the guraves or paid worshippers of the idols of Hindu gods in the fort at Sátára.

Part II.—Education.

20. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 8th September, speaks in highly eulogistic terms of the Maráthi Powádás or ballads published by Messrs. Acworth and Sháligrám for the genuineness and vigour of their language and the sentiments of devotion, patriotism and martial spirit conveyed therein, and earnestly recommends the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, to introduce a select few of them into the reading books of the Government school series instead of the tame, insipid, and prosaic pieces like the verses on "an ant and the grain of wheat found by it" which they at present contain and which are calculated to make the students quite spiritless and devoid of faith and patriotism.

The Maráthi Powádás published by Messrs. Acworth and Sháligrám and a suggestion to the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay.

Part III.—Railways.

21. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—We have on several occasions drawn the attention of the B. B. & C. I. Railway authorities and Government to the serious inconvenience experienced by passengers in buying tickets at the Churney Road Station, Bombay; but we are sorry to find that with the exception of the facility provided for passengers travelling to down stations nothing has been done to minimise their hardships. There is a wretched little square hole which all sorts of passengers make a tremendous fight for getting near. In the general melee that ensues no respectable man or woman can hope to secure a ticket in time. Especially in the rainy season when it rains in torrents, it is indeed a sight to see how passengers are pushing one another out on the road. There is no sufficient standing room even for the passengers, and unless they buy tickets the policeman does not of course allow them to go upon the platform. The Grant Road Station is far away from the town and almost all the passengers for Gujarát begin their journey at the Churney Road Station. It is nothing short of disgraceful that the Railway Company cannot make better arrangements for the sale of tickets. The station-master, when the matter is referred to him, is good enough to admit the existence of the serious hardships experienced by the passengers, but he says that, as the authorities do not take any notice of the matter, he is helpless. The inconvenience to second class and first class passengers is increased tenfold by the delay caused in filling up a wretched thin piece of printed paper which the railway authorities issue instead of tickets. The B. B. & C. I. Railway makes something like five or six hundred rupees at the Churney Road Station every day, and it is nothing but a scandal that it should treat passengers in the manner we have described. No decent man or woman can hope to obtain a ticket in time to catch a train, when the passengers are pushing one another, unless one is prepared to have his clothes soiled or torn and his turban thrown off his head. The other day a High Court Pleader wanted to report the matter to the authorities by recording his complaint in the complaint book, but he was informed that the system of keeping such books had been abolished. We again invite the attention of the railway authorities to the matter, and expect Government to interfere since the company has done nothing to remove the long-standing complaints of all classes of passengers.

Inconvenience felt by passengers in buying tickets at the Churney Road Station of the B. B. & C. I. Railway.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Remarks on the attitude of the Bombay Government towards the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

22. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—It will be seen from the reply of the Bombay Municipal Corporation to the rule of Government and from the speeches made at one of their meetings that their case is exactly similar to that of the Poona Municipality. In issuing their ultimata Government shut their eyes to the previous history of the bodies, refused to see that there was not much difference between their own and the Corporation's work, and that Nasmyth's hammer, as Mr. Geary put it, was put in motion without sufficient cause. The action of Government on both these occasions was as regrettable as it was ill advised. In the interests of self-government and for the sake of the credit of the Government of Bombay it is very necessary that the self-governing boards ought to be treated with greater respect and greater confidence. There are already signs that although men of position are prepared to make a sacrifice of their time and brains for helping Government, they are not prepared to risk their reputation. About a month ago there was a vacancy in the elected seats on the municipal board at Nagar, but no candidate came forth for election. We fear in our own city we are not sure we shall have good people coming up at the approaching elections. In Bombay elections are a very tame affair, and should the good name of the Corporation be allowed to suffer, we have little doubt that the best of men would hold back and would not offer themselves as candidates. Failure of self-government after a successful trial extending over several years would be directly traceable to the discouraging conduct of Government, and we feel sure His Excellency Lord Harris is not prepared to leave such a record behind him. After all that has happened, it will bespeak strength if Government do not withdraw from the position they have assumed, but it will be glorious if they admit their mistake.

The Bombay Government's ultimatum to the Bombay Corporation regarding the maintenance of a Contagious Diseases hospital.

23. The Rast Goftár (89), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—We hope the Government will see the wisdom of putting an end to the unpleasant controversy which they have started by saying that the Bombay Municipal Corporation have shown in their letter good and sufficient cause for closing the infectious diseases hospital at Grant Road when there was not a single patient in it. If, however, the Government, in the plenitude of their power, were to insist upon the Corporation equipping and maintaining an hospital permanently, and if the Corporation were to decline to accede to their demand, then it would be open to them to maintain the hospital themselves and draw upon the municipal fund by an order on the Bank of Bombay for the amount required for the purpose. If Government were to take this extreme step, then an appeal would lie to the Secretary of State. We are reminded that a similar appeal had been made in 1880 to the Secretary of State, in which he had refused to uphold the action of Government. That was a case in which the municipality having refused to contribute Rs. 15,000 a year to an hospital for contagious diseases, Government had compulsorily taken the money. We hope the Corporation will have no occasion to appeal against the decision of the local Government in the present case. But if they are obliged to go to the higher authorities, then they have an encouraging precedent before them.

A house-tax imposed by the Dhandhuka Municipality in the Ahmedabad District and its effect on the people.

24. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 6th September, writes:—The Dhandhuka Municipality in the Ahmedabad District supplies a good example of how small municipalities, as at present constituted, can be made instruments of official terrorism. The house-tax, being a direct tax and at the same time an illogical tax, has been never popular in the mofussil. The history of the house-tax in Dhandhuka makes us suspect that small municipalities, instead of being boons, are curses. The people of that place have been so greatly excited that at present there are about three hundred suits filed against the municipality in connection with the tax. We respectfully solicit Government not to take the hasty step of suspending the municipality till both the sides are heard, or at least till the cases are decided.

25. The same newspaper observes :—From the facts brought to light during the hearing of the suits brought against the municipality of Dhandhuka by the inhabitants of the town it appears that at a general meeting of the municipality held on the 30th April 1889, without any previous notice a change was made in the budget estimates, and that it was proposed by the president and seconded by the Mámlatdár, who is the vice-president, that it should be made generally known that the committee were desirous of abolishing the octroi duties and intended to levy a house-tax instead. These proceedings were conducted in English, whereas generally they are conducted in Gujaráti. Subsequently, when the inhabitants were asked to show reason why the house-tax should not be levied, they brought forward several objections, to consider which a meeting was convened on the 20th October 1889, but the members not being unanimous, it was adjourned to the 28th January 1890, on which day some of those who had been originally against the measure having changed their opinion, a resolution was passed adopting the house-tax, and to this the necessary sanction of Government was obtained. But when the question of framing bye-laws for the collection of the tax was brought forward, it was rejected by a majority of 6 to 4, whereupon the vice-president reported that the municipality should be suspended. The president, however, issued a circular advising those members who were opposed to the framing of the bye-laws to resign. At last one member gave his conditional support to the framing of the bye-laws and his vote being counted, although it was only conditional, those who were for the framing of the bye-laws framed them and bills for the tax were presented to the people in spite of their opposition. In the meantime one of the commissioners, Mr. Vithaldás, having resigned, the vacancy was filled by the appointment of one Mr. Dámodar Kálidás, who also happened to be against the house-tax. The tax was nevertheless levied, and although the Subordinate Judge on appeal issued an order to stay execution, the Mámlatdár continued to collect the tax and fine those who did not pay it. It is said that great injustice has been done to the people in the assessment of the tax. Many complaints have been preferred against the arbitrary manner in which the tax is collected, and the complainants, who are pressed to withdraw the complaints, express their willingness to do so if the present Mámlatdár is removed from Dhandhuka.

Part V.—Native States.

26. The Din Mani (81), in its issue of the 8th September, observes :—If the telegram published by the Morning Post, that the Viceroy threatened to resign office if the decision of His Excellency in Council regarding the Senápati and the Tongal General of Manipur were not confirmed, be true, it shows that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has been carried away too much by uncontrollable anger, while the prosecution of the Bangabasi affords an example of his self-will. He appears to have taken leave of justice and fair-play. We, however, remind the Anglo-Indian officers that the just English nation watches their actions and that the Natives have also learnt to watch their own interests. The Englishman has contradicted the telegram published by the Morning Post, but in order to remove the misunderstanding of the people it is necessary that it should be authoritatively contradicted. Until this is done the impression will gain ground that the unfortunate princes of Manipur have been the victims of His Excellency's unbounded fury.

Telegraphic message alleged to have been sent by His Excellency the Viceroy to the Secretary of State for India in connection with the sentences passed on the Manipur princes.

27. The Kaiser-i-Hind (88), in its issue of the 6th September, writes :—It is a matter of profound regret to us that there is such a woeful lack of statesmanship in the Imperial Council of the Empire in these eventful times. What with all kinds and degrees of troubles and complications in the Foreign affairs of this great country, troubles and Resolution of the Government of India regarding the recent events at Manipur, criticised.

complications East and West which in the ripeness of time are as certain as fate to break out in a tumultuous storm leading to untold loss of life and treasure, and what with the existing internal dissatisfaction, unrest and distrust, such a resolution as the one dealing with recent events at Manipur is calculated neither to allay that dissatisfaction and distrust nor to command even a qualified approval from the people at large here and in England. The resolution, which is in reality a reply to the late appeal of Mr. Manmohan Ghose on behalf of the accused princes, is, in our humble opinion, pitched in an entirely false key. Political expediency and political sagacity alike would have dictated abstention from so unrighteous a declaration as is made therein. To say that the code of international politics and international ethics is inapplicable to a "protected State" like Manipur is to say that the Government of India in its relation with Native States, whether dependent, semi-independent or independent, is not bound to recognize the solemn obligations which the ordinary laws of humanity and justice inculcate. For, after all, what is the code of international politics? Is it not, when reduced to first principles, the code by which justice is dealt with between man and man? It is nothing but that great unwritten code implanted in human nature by Providence—that prompting of the human conscience which teaches that in all our acts we should be guided by a spirit of righteousness and fair play. To despoil a neighbour of his life and property is a thing condemned from the days of Moses. It is in essence that unwritten moral law of the universe which has been recognised by all civilized nations from times immemorial. It was not writ to-day or yesterday. It is coeval with the creation of Nature. Hence when so powerful and civilized a Government, a Christian Government, like that of British India, which has more than once solemnly proclaimed that the foundations of its empire rest on the principles of righteousness—that righteousness which exalteth a nation—when such a Government actually casts to the wind its principles and declares in so many words that its relations with Native States are not bound by any such righteous principles, it is clear that it has violently drifted from its old moorings and has shaken the foundations on which its power rests. It is a proclamation urbe et orbis that Might is Right, that in the governance of this great country it is a law unto itself and an exception to that higher and holy law to which even the most powerful nations have to submit. It is a revival of the exploded doctrine of unmitigated autocracy which swayed Europe a century ago—the doctrine of the divine right of kings to govern as they like. And to us it is amazing that when divine rights, earthly providences, mortal gods and such like shibboleths have been long since interred in the grave in Europe, when even Holy Russia has been made painfully alive to their meaninglessness by the awful events that have transpired and have been transpiring there for the last twenty-five years, the Government of India should be the Government to resuscitate them here! There is such a fatal blindness, such an ominous doom in that declaration that, we are afraid, it is certain to lead later on to more portentous events than those we have lately witnessed. It cannot be that sagacious statesmanship could have dictated such a resolution. For even before the ink with which it has been written is dry, we notice that it has met with universal disapprobation. The history of the recent revolution has already made a deep impression on the minds of honest Englishmen. They think that from the beginning to the end, it was a political blunder of the first magnitude. Parliament set its seal of condemnation in no uncertain tones. And though inconsistently enough Lord Cross has tried in his despatch to whitewash the conduct of the Indian Government, his emphatic disapproval of the action which culminated in the disaster of March 25th, was in itself sufficient to warn that Government from again tempting fate and plunging into a sea of errors which are certain to lead to another and stronger expression of condemnation when Parliament meets again. Neither the trials nor the sentences could be justified, even though the previous consent of the Secretary of State has been extorted. They belie even our ordinary notions of justice and equity, let alone international codes of law, order and morality. It will not protect its action from the criticism of that august assembly, as it has not protected it, we see from the files of the latest English papers, from the adverse criticism of the press, friendly and inimical alike. We need not encumber this article with extracts from these in confirmation of our statement. All that we say is this: that we feel humiliated by the resolution which exposes our Government to the jibes and sneers of impartial critics. Nay more, we feel deeply aggrieved because it distinctly tends to alienate the affections of the people and the princes, which it should be its constant care to nourish and strengthen in these troublous times, with the political sky in Europe and Asia alike surcharged with the electricity of the coming storm. Verily, India requires at its helm a Viceroy and Governor-General of the greatest firmness and sagacity to steer it through that political hurricane which, say what you will, is certain to burst sooner or later, if such a policy is to find general expression in all its acts, whether in relation to the welfare of the people or the feudatories. Evidently, we are approaching the eruption of another political volcano.

28. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 7th September, writes:—Having due regard to the facts that Kula Chandra Singh was only provisionally recognized by the Chief Commissioner of Assam (the late Mr. Quinton) as Regent of Manipur after the forcible expulsion of the recognized and acknowledged ruler, Mahárája Sur Chandra Singh, and that the said provisional recognition had had to be confirmed by the Government of India; that the Government of India was itself in favour of the restoration of the expelled Mahárája; and that its final decision about recognizing Kula Chandra Singh as Mahárája was not publicly announced, before the revolt broke out at Manipur;—having due regard, we repeat, to these facts, it would have been in our judgment proper and fair to treat both Kula Chandra Singh and Tekendrajit Singh as usurpers, and their resistance to Her Majesty's authority as only a continuation of their original offence of forcibly expelling their elder brother and ruler in September last year. In our judgment such a view of the Manipur muddle would have shown an equitable and proper appreciation of the whole situation, and on the assumption that such a view is correct and sound, we cannot understand how the State of Manipur can be regarded as having offended in the slightest degree and to have become liable to the penalty of annexation. If Mr. Grimwood and Mr. Quinton had not practically connived at the original offence of the two usurpers, and if the Government of India also had not by its delay allowed the two usurpers to enjoy in peace for a period of six months the fruits of their treachery towards their elder brother and rightful ruler, but had taken prompt action to punish them as they deserved, we should have been spared all the subsequent troubles. In short, the so-called rebellion of March last was only a continuation, and a natural sequence of the original offence of the two usurpers, and the State and its rightful ruler cannot reasonably be held responsible for their action. Viewing the situation as we do, we fail to see how the State of Manipur can reasonably be said to have lapsed to the Crown. Similarly we fail to see how new conditions can be imposed upon the State for the so-called re-grant of it to a new ruler. The proper course would be to reinstate the expelled Mahárája under the old conditions and to associate with him for some reasonable period a capable and experienced officer to assist him in the administration. Even if the action of the representatives of the Government of India on the spot, and of the Government of India itself, in connection with the revolt of September last year, had been quite unimpeachable, the action now taken would have been unfair; but having due regard to the fact that that action was far from unimpeachable, it is scarcely possible to justify the present action in any way. While we consider that the three Manipur princes have been deservedly punished, we cannot, of course, admit the force of the argument used to prove that Kula Chandra Singh was the recognised ruler of Manipur. He was nothing more or less than a usurper, possibly under the influence of his younger brother, Tekendrajit Singh, but certainly a more consummate intriguer than the latter, as the events connected with his assumption of the title of Mahárája on the alleged abdication of his elder brother clearly prove. As regards Tekendrajit Singh, he was no doubt a dangerous character as his antecedents clearly prove, and he richly deserved the extreme punishment that has been already inflicted upon him. But we must express our conviction that any revolt undertaken by these two usurpers, and acquiesced in by the third brother, cannot be regarded as an hostile action by the recognised ruler of the State, rendering it liable to annexation.

29. The Hindustán (108), in its issue of the 6th September, observes:—The extraordinary ambition of Government often leads to bad results, and whenever Government withdraw from a Native State some of its powers it is their fashion to defend their action under cover of the welfare of the subjects of that State. Such reasons were assigned when Government annexed Oudh and Nágpur and appointed an Administrator at Porbandar. In the recent resolution of the Secretary of State for India on the Manipur State an attempt has been made to defend the policy of Government which was severely condemned on various occasions in Parliament. The State, it is true, is not to be annexed, but we think that the proposed change will have a worse effect than annexation. It would have been better if a prince of the blood royal of Manipur had been enthroned, but now as the successor is to be chosen by the Viceroy, it is natural that the new Rája will always try to please and act up to the wishes of the Viceroy and his officers, so that there will be at Manipur virtually no independent administration.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

India in Parliament.

1. In a rambling article headed "What benefit can India derive from British Parliament?" the Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 12th September, explains the constitution of the British Parliament, states to what self-sacrifice Messrs. Lal Mohan Ghose and Dádábhái Navroji have subjected themselves in their attempts to enter Parliament to further the interests of their native country, what disinterested men like the late Mr. Bradlaugh have done in Parliament for India and how at present the Indian Budget and other matters are summarily disposed of at the fag end of the Parliamentary sessions, and concludes with a prayer that Her Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress may be enabled to hasten and bring about the realisation of the expectation of her Indian subjects to secure a few seats in Parliament with a view that the present deplorable and depressed condition of India may be ameliorated by her affairs being fully discussed and disposed of in Parliament with the zeal and solicitude which, on account of the vastness of the country and its population, they deserve.

Remarks on His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government in connection with the prosecution of the Bangabasi.

2. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—The Bangabasi prosecution has been universally pronounced to be a mistake, even by the official and the usually inspired organs of Government. The time chosen as well as the victim pitched upon for teaching a lesson to the vernacular press were as inappropriate as they well could be. The Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is likely to be handed down to history, if things do not take a more favourable turn during the unexpired period of his Viceroyalty, as a Government of huge blunders. The Bangabasi prosecution presents a striking illustration in point. Can any greater mistake be committed by a responsible Government than ignoring its own Legal Member before embarking upon a State prosecution? Sir Alexander Miller, who was credited with the selection of a suitable victim by the Times of India, flatly contradicts the allegation and says he had nothing whatever to do with the institution of the proceedings against the Bangabasi. This is, indeed, very amazing, and but for his unequivocal contradiction in the columns of our local contemporary no one would have believed that the Governor-General in Council meant the Viceroy's Council minus the Legal Member. The fact that Sir Alexander Miller was not consulted clearly shows that the Government of India have somehow or other gone off the rails. It would be very instructive to know at whose instance the proceedings against the Bangabasi were taken. It would be no less interesting to be informed who advised the making of the application against the Indian Mirror alone for contempt of court, when the Civil and Military Gazette, the Statesman, the Pioneer and the Times of India had also commented upon the case sub-judice. All this is at present a mystery. If the series of events that have recently happened demonstrate anything, it is that Lord Lansdowne is in the hands of inexperienced, impatient and short-sighted councillors. Even the Pioneer, the out-and-out defender of officialdom, admits the truth of this fact. But we yet entertain hopes that Government will recede from the unfortunate position they have taken. We are no defenders of writings like those that have appeared in the Bangabasi. We condemn them as heartily as any of the indignant Simla officials. But in view of the circumstances under which the articles were penned, and considering their surpassing folly and stupidity, it would have been better if Government had warned the writer against a repetition of such silly attempts. Lord Canning did precisely the same thing even during the troublous times of the mutiny, and the British Government has since then been so firmly established that it could well have afforded to treat a scribbler with silent contempt. We understand that a Press Association has been recently established at Calcutta. Its promoters should approach Government with a view to induce the authorities to drop the proceedings on the Bangabasi undertaking to behave better in future, and thus allow them an opportunity of withdrawing from the awkward position into which Government have placed themselves. The offending journal has been more than exposed and punished, and it is not desirable for Government to be vindictive in matters like these. We hope wiser and more far-seeing counsels will prevail and Government as well as the Native press will profit by the lesson furnished by the recent occurrences.

Disapproval of the remarks made by the Pioneer on the conduct of the Chief Justice of the Calcutta High Court in the Bangabasi case.

3. The Indu Prakdeh (14), in its issue of the 14th September, writes:—It was not to be expected that the discharge of the accused in the Bangabasi case would meet with the approval of some of the Anglo-Indian papers of the North. The Pioneer is indignant that the Chief Justice, although he himself, as appears from his summing up, was in favour of conviction, and although there was a majority of the jury for conviction, should not have accepted the verdict of the majority as the law required him to do. The Pioneer reads a severe lecture to the Chief Justice on the interpretation of the words "shall" and "may" occurring in statutes, and censures the practice of Judges of reading "may" where the law puts the word "shall." If the learned Pioneer had been a superior court of appeal, it could not have indulged in a more learned disquisition and used stronger language in condemnation of the Chief Justice's judgment. But unbiassed critics will admire Sir Comer Petheram's judicial impartiality and high courage and character in that His Lordship, although himself inclined to convict, was ready to give the accused the benefit of a doubt, suggested by two of the jurors giving their verdict for acquittal. The Bangabasi prosecution has assumed a somewhat political aspect, and Sir Comer acted rightly in declining to convict the accused except on a unanimous verdict.

Lord Wenlock's attack on Mr. Caine.

4. The Gujardt Mitrá (85), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—Lord Wenlock ought to have considered twice before venturing his flippant and unseemly remarks upon the reputed author of "Picturesque India." If the Governor of Madras had to bandy words with Mr. Caine, he could have done so in a private epistle. A public utterance running down an otherwise good and well-meaning countryman is, to our mind, incompatible with the dignity of Her Majesty's representative in India. In His Excellency's speech, which savours of bad taste all round, there occurs one sentence on which different constructions can naturally be put at first sight. "I only wish he had been with me, when I say that he would have been reduced in body and very much enlarged in mind." Such a remark is little short of an express desire on the part of Lord Wenlock for argumentum baculinum. But the interpretation has subsequently been altered so as to mean that criticism on Government measures is just and reasonable when it is indicative of practical experience, which cannot be gained without experiencing a great deal of pain and trouble. The incident is, indeed, extremely unfortunate, both for Lord Wenlock and Mr. Caine.

5. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—We think Mr. Caine made a mistake in taking the communication of his Indian correspondent on trust, and founding some scathing criticisms upon it. It turns out that Mr. Caine had been betrayed into a somewhat exaggerated view of the prevalent distress, and his generous warmth for the people of this country had betrayed him into an unguarded attack on Indian officials. Lord Wenlock spoke under strong provocation, no doubt, but we think His Excellency ought not to have so recklessly given vent to his feelings in the speech delivered by him at Perambore. He affirmed more than once that all that Mr. Caine had written was "absolutely and maliciously untrue." The information with which he was furnished by his Indian correspondent was "absolutely untrue," and his allegation that Government was neglecting its duty was denounced as "an absolute, downright falsehood." There is too much of absolutism in all this, and much else besides, that the Governor was pleased to say in his address. Language of this sort may suit political gladiators fighting in the arena of free English public life, but it is lamentably out of place in the mouth of an Indian Governor. In the Native mind the personality of the ruler is associated with a sober dignity and an exalted impassiveness, which is not supposed to be ruffled by anything that inferior mortals may say. They are supposed to be too elevated in their eminence to be touched or affected by the breath of mortal man. Lord Wenlock ought to have seen that the conditions of political life in India are entirely different from those in England, and we are sure he would have consulted his dignity and position better by abstaining from the use of such instruments of political warfare as may be allowable in a party politician in England. We hope Lord Wenlock will, in his moments of cool reflection, perceive the wisdom of putting up his tomahawk in its sheath and abstain hereafter from the public scalping of any person who is odious to him, until, at all events, his return to his native country. So long as he is Governor of Madras he must consider himself muzzled. A grave rebuke accompanied by an array of facts would have been a sufficient answer from one in his position, and it would have been an answer far more seemly and effective than all his slashing and coarse rhetoric could make it.

6. In alluding to the same subject, the Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 14th September, observes:—The critics of Mr. Caine seem to lose sight of the peculiar circumstances under which, and the particular period at which, his Native correspondent apprised him of distress, and seem inclined to make a personal matter of it, rather than consider the real point at issue. We reserve our remarks on Mr. Caine's rejoinder till we are in possession of the full text, but, in the meantime, we cannot help expressing our approval of the valuable advice he has given to Lord Wenlock to take the Natives into greater confidence, which, if followed, would result in improving the administrative machinery.

7. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—His Lordship of Madras seems to have been furious that he is credited by the reporters with the intention of reducing the weight of the stout temperance reformer who dared accuse his Government of inhumanity and negligence. Opinions differ as to the exact words spoken. Be they what they may, we do not think they ought to have been uttered at all. It was neither dignified nor proper. But, it seems, just now muscular governorship is to the fore, and we tremble for the fate of those who may have the misfortune to enter the field with this new phenomenon of administrative muscularity. It is one thing to wield vigorously the grey goose-quill as Mr. Lee-Warner wields; but it is another thing to flourish the whip or the cane. What are we coming to? Muscular mediocrities who come out as Indian administrators may be tolerated, but the muscularity which masquerades in the habiliment of angels and devils and horse-whippers in turn is surely intolerable. Verily, it is time to enter a loud and vigorous protest against these dancing and cricketing and abusing Governors. They must be made to learn the proprieties of public life and the responsibilities of rulers. Governors who pose as vulgar gladiators had better be reserved for Spanish bull-fights.

8. The Jagadhitechchhu (38), in its issue of the 12th September, observes:—The Englishman of Calcutta says that the allegation about a telegram having been sent by His Excellency the Viceroy to the Secretary of State for India, threatening to send in his resignation in case the sentences passed by him on the Manipur princes were not confirmed, is utterly false and unfounded. We also say the same thing; but why has the editor of the Morning Post, who gave currency to this canard, not been arrested as yet for having done so? In asking this, however, we forget that the editor has a white skin. If the report of the Morning Post be false, we earnestly recommend His Excellency the Governor-General to contradict it authoritatively. The Morning Post has again and again repeated its allegation about the telegram, and if Government do not take early steps in the matter we shall say that the present Government of India are partial and are guided in their actions by the principle that "might is right," and then they should not resent our remarks. If the speech made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne in the Viceregal Council, in which he denounced the Amrit Bazar Patrika for its writings about Kashmere affairs, and the Official Secrets Act have any meaning, His Excellency's attitude of indifference to the conduct of the Morning Post requires an early explanation.

Suggestions to Government in connection with the Morning Post newspaper.

9. While writing on the question started at the Industrial Conference held at Poona, whether English and other European capitalists should be invited and encouraged to open agricultural banks in India or whether the Indians themselves should start such banks with English and foreign capital if necessary, the Shri Shivdji (66), in its issue of the 11th September, warns Government and the advocates of banks intended for bettering the condition of the Indian agriculturists against the idea of allowing foreigners to open such firms, saying that such a step, instead of proving a blessing to the poor Indian rayats, will only serve to add to their misery and will prove productive of much difficulty in the efficient performance of the function of government, and in support of its assertion refers to the agitation set up by English residents of India against the Ilbert Bill and to the frequent instances of oppression and high-handedness of the indigo and coffee planters against the Indian labourers working under them, and adds that the policy of even European countries is similar to the one suggested by the paper, since they never countenance foreign settlements, though they allow foreign capital to be invested in native industries and mercantile concerns.

The question whether agricultural banks should be opened by foreigners or by Indians with foreign capital.

10. The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 12th September, gives a brief account of the way in which the titles of 'Ráo Sáheb,' 'Ráo Bahádur,' 'Diwán Bahádur,' 'C.I.E.,' &c., have been conferred on persons, whether officials or non-officials, for the last forty years and upwards, saying that these titles on account of the multiplicity of their recipients have lost their original value, which was very high when they were bestowed on a limited number of persons, that the persons honoured being generally unknown to those in whose gift the honours lie, and the honours being conferred in compliance with the recommendation of officers like Collectors, Political Agents, &c., sometimes even undeserving persons succeed in obtaining all these titles except those of 'Diwán Bahádur' and 'Mahámahopádhyáya,' which are bestowed only on persons possessing the qualifications prescribed by Government, that all other titles are obtained either by flattery or by interest, and that therefore Government, in order to preserve the value of their honours both in the eyes of the general public and their recipients, should be very careful in bestowing them after due enquiry into the qualifications of the persons proposed to be honoured.

The bestowal of honours, titles, &c.

11. The Sind Sudhár (161), in its issue of the 5th September, writes:—Many persons are anxious to know what decision has been passed in the matter of the "Mourosi Haris" of the Shikárpur District. This subject was inquired into by Dr. J. Pollen, and the result reported by him more than three years ago. In 1889, when Lord Reay paid a visit to Sind in order to open the Sukkur Bridge, the Sind Sabha, finding an opportunity, represented to His Excellency that owing to the delay which had already taken place in the disposal of the question the Zamindárs were in great suspense, and prayed that a decision be passed at an early date. His Lordship replied that he was about to proceed to Mahábaleshvar, the climate of which was very agreeable, and there he would think over the matter and communicate his decision. Although more than two years and a half have passed since the above reply was given by the Governor, no decision has yet been pronounced. We are informed that some time back Government called for further information in connection with this subject and that it was submitted to them many months ago. The existing mode of transacting Government business is complicated and dilatory. Much correspondence must be carried on in order to obtain sanction to do anything. Moreover, all Government work is done covertly. It is not a wise policy to entertain suspicions or to allow any question to lie pending for years. In the present instance, the Zamindárs and Mourosi Haris are very anxious to know what decision has been passed by Government in their case. When Dr. Pollen was appointed to institute an inquiry, it was expected that the matter would soon come to an amicable settlement. As the question has remained undisposed of for many years now, we hope that Government will give its decision at an early date and remove the anxiety of the parties concerned.

A request to the Bombay Government to pass its decision in the matter of the "Mourosi Haris" in the Shikárpur District.

12. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—

Further steps in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

True it is that the proposed memorial, and the agitation which it is determined to make regarding the lamentable Rájábái Tower tragedy in the House of Commons, are doomed to disappointment. But the community is strongly of conviction that the moral effect of their exertions in the matter will lead to great public good. The question of the conduct of the police, and many other matters now behind the scenes, will be openly debated; and the deplorable inefficiency of the city guardians as much as the unfounded prejudices of the misguided Government of Bombay and its unblushing and unjustifiable insinuations regarding the hypothesis of suicide, will be criticised in a manner to leave no doubt as to the necessity of performing that lustration wholesale of the Bombay police force of which we have off and on spoken from the very first day of the horrible tragedy. That would be a net gain which the community as a whole will derive at the expense of the agitation of the Pársis. It is an uphill and unequal fight. But the Pársis are cheered in so fighting, with the absolutely moral conviction of truth and righteousness being on their side.

13. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—

Necessity for improving the police organization.

We are sorry to have to record this week the case of a very gross outrage committed by two police constables and two others upon a Mahomedan woman by name Chhotibi at Ahmedabad. It seems that this unfortunate woman and her husband made a halt at the Ahmedabad station on their way to their destination. Their presence attracted the notice of two police constables by name Elia Bux and Haji Khan. These two scoundrels and two other rascals approached the couple and informed them that the Inspector Sáheb wanted to see them. The poor husband and wife, unaware of the nefarious designs of the ruffians, accompanied them as far as the Kakaria Tank, when the husband was pounced upon by the conspirators and tied hand and foot to a tree. One of the monsters was posted there to keep watch over the helpless husband and the others carried out their grossly nefarious and immoral design in his presence. Such are the facts as reported by our Ahmedabad correspondent last week and related by the local vernacular papers. The case was tried by the Sessions Court at Ahmedabad only a week ago and three of the monsters have been sentenced to transportation for life and the fourth for ten years. This punishment is certainly well-deserved. The case is of such an aggravated character that the Sessions Judge is reported to have said that he would have inflicted a more severe punishment upon the accused, had the Indian Penal Code permitted him to do so. A more aggravated form of offence by policemen who are to guard the life and property of the public, it is difficult to conceive. It was only the other day that a contemporary reported a case in which a policeman in the Deccan was convicted of having committed an outrage upon a female beggar in a street. The particulars of this case have not been fully reported in any of our Maráthi contemporaries that we have read. The two cases and the others to which we recently alluded suggest very disquieting reflection, and the question is whether Government can safely ignore the appeal made to them by the public and the Indian National Congress for the reorganization of the Indian police system. If Government would seriously collect all cases of police oppression throughout the country, we have not the slightest doubt that their number as well as nature would induce the authorities to take up the question in right earnest. As things stand, neither Government nor the press nor the public associations have made a persistent effort to collect facts. In the meanwhile, people are losing confidence in the police. The growing feeling of distrust and even contempt which such instances of police zoolum must necessarily engender in the popular mind is not conducive to the best interests of administration, and we again invite the attention of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government to the pressing question of the improvement of the police organization.

14. The Gujarát Mitra (85), in its issue of the 13th September, observes:—

Alleged tardy and expensive justice under the British rule.

The administration of justice is very tardy and expensive under the British Government at present, while formerly it could be promptly obtained as the legal machinery was simpler and did not require the aid of subtle lawyers. Though long delays are caused in deciding cases, Government, instead of trying to diminish this inconvenience by increasing the number of judicial courts, have been abolishing some of the existing ones, as they have done the Assistant Judge's Court at Surat. This is a stigma on the British administration, which otherwise deserves praise for many reforms, and we recommend the authorities to see that a law-suit is decided within three months from the time it is filed. We are sorry that some of the Native States have introduced into their States the English system of dispensing justice.

Remarks on the orders issued by the Sadar Court in Sind regarding the travelling and other expenses of witnesses.

15. A correspondent, writing to the Sind Sudhár (161) in its issue of the 12th September, observes:—Under the orders contained in the Criminal Courts Manual issued by the Sadar Court, the travelling and other expenses of witnesses are liable to be recovered from the parties only in summons cases, while in cognizable and non-bailable offences such expenses are borne by Government. It will thus be seen that for cases which do not fall under any of the above categories no provision is made for regulating the payment of expenses to witnesses when summoned by the mofussil Criminal Courts. These persons when served with processes are obliged to neglect their avocations, to leave their homes, to defray their travelling expenses out of their own pocket, and to continue attending the court for two, three and sometimes even four days, i.e., until their evidence is taken down. Among these persons may, not unfrequently, be found several poor people who subsist by their daily labour. Such people, when summoned by Criminal Courts, are obliged to contract debts in order to pay their travelling expenses and to meet the cost of lodging and messing at the Magistrate's camp. A large number of cases tried by the mofussil Criminal Courts consists of those falling under Sections 323 and 498 of the Indian Penal Code, and in such cases the complainants invariably summon many witnesses, and they are paid neither by the court nor by the party.

Remarks on the proposed change in the establishment of the District Court at Surat.

16. A correspondent, writing from Surat to the Gujarátí (84) in its issue of the 13th September, observes:—A good deal of dissatisfaction has been evoked here on account of a proposed change in the establishment of the local District Court. It is reported that Mr. Nandsukhlál, Clerk of the Court, who is on leave, has been asked to retire, though he is quite competent, physically as well as mentally, and instead of promoting one of his subordinates who naturally look up to the coveted post as a reward for their long service after tedious waiting, a Broach gentleman is going to be placed over their heads. I have nothing to say against the new-comer personally, but the nomination is open to exception on principle. In the first place, it is not easy to see why the present permanent incumbent should be forced to retire, and, in the second place, it is still more difficult to understand why the claims of competent men from the personnel of the District Court itself should be altogether ignored. I hope the matter will engage the attention of the High Court Judges and Government authorities in time.

Alleged corruption among the bailiffs and a request to the authorities in the matter.

17. The Ahmedabad Times (92), in its issue of the 16th September, observes:—The authorities presiding over Civil Courts are scarcely ignorant of the fact that the bailiffs and clerks under them, whose business it is to serve summonses and execute warrants, decrees, &c., are in the habit of exacting illegal gratification from the parties, and we are sorry that no attempts are made to stop this evil practice. We therefore request the civil officials to issue strict orders to their subordinates not to demand or accept such gratification and also to notify the same in a prominent place in their courts and authorize people to make such complaints personally as they have to make against these clerks and bailiffs on this score.

Rumoured appointment of Mr. Webb as Acting Prothonotary of the Bombay High Court considered a job.

18. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—We take some credit to ourselves for having been the first to ring the tocsin of alarm and to unearth the job which was being nursed by the Bombay Government in violation of all rules and regulations—a job which we still consider to be one of the worst and most inexcusable for any civilised government, careful of the interests of its people and regardful of the efficiency of criminal justice, to perpetrate. Though the raving maniacs of Anglo-Indian society screamed and shouted to the top of their voice and displayed phenomenal "clannishness," which was utterly un-English, the Bombay Presidency Association, as representing enlightened and impartial Native public opinion, was not daunted in entering in succession two vigorous and manly protests against the Webb job. The agitation has so far succeeded that the perpetrators have been confounded; while the Secretary of State in Council is still in a fix how to extricate the local Government from the impasse which its jobbing propensities have created. How to justify the appointment recommended and how to uphold the supposed dignity of that Government without subjecting it to public humiliation, are questions which are still anxiously engaging the attention of the Great Mogul and his responsible advisers at Westminster. The House of Commons, through some of its members, has already put a spoke in the wheel of this scandalous job. This has further complicated matters. For though it may be that the Secretary of State is willing to justify the job, there is the fear of Parliament severely questioning it next session, and giving not only an uncomfortably bad half-hour to the jobbing party all round, but closely scrutinising the broad constitutional aspect which underlies the controversy. Thus, while the Webb job is hanging fire, it seems that there is the danger of another and even worse job being soon perpetrated; and it would require all the strength and vigilance of the same enlightened body which is the representative of Native thought and Native aspirations in this city to instantly expose it. This time it is, as the rumour goes, the High Court which is to earn the reproach of not being above committing a job. It is said that Mr. Webb is to have the acting appointment of Prothonotary to the High Court during the absence of the substantive incumbent. Now, the learned Chief Justice and the Judges of the High Court may be respectfully asked whether they are serving public interest and whether they are doing justice when they pass over better and more deserving gentlemen who could fill that acting place and contemplate nominating Mr. Webb? What are the reasons which have weighed or are weighing with the learned Chief Justice and his colleagues in offering him that post? The public is, indeed, curious to know whether in the whole Bombay bar Mr. Webb is the only applicant for a Magistracy or a Prothonotariship? Is he the only counsel about the earning of whose bread the Government and the Judges alike seem to be so eagerly alive? Such a feeling would be rational if it were known that Mr. Webb had in any way distinguished himself by rendering eminent public service. Our respect and faith in the absolute impartiality of the Judges of the High Court is so great that we are astonished to hear this rumour that has come to our ears. We are loth to put credence in it, because we do not think that those who are set up in exalted places to do strict justice between man and man will so far forget themselves and sully the purity of their ermine as to be privy to such a monstrous job. For the sake of the traditional impartiality of our local bench, and for the sake of the purity of the British Indian administration itself, we devoutly hope that the rumour will turn out absolutely untrue.

19. The Gujarát Mitrá (85), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—

Approval of the appointment of Dr. K. R. Kirtikar as Acting Health Officer of the Bombay Municipality.

We are exceedingly pleased to hear that Dr. K. R. Kirtikar is again called upon by the Bombay Municipal Corporation to fill the place of Health Officer, in which on former occasions he has worked with credit. [Several other newspapers approve of this appointment, and express a hope that Dr. Kirtikar will one day be appointed permanently as Health Officer in Bombay.]

20. A correspondent, writing to the Lok Bandhu (139) in its issue of the 13th September, says that since the arrival of Ráo Sáheb Shrinivás Venkatesh at Karajgi as the Mámlatdár of the place, the existing schism among the people has been widened by his siding with one party in consequence of his relationship with one Ballári Dásappa and some other persons belonging to one party and his father carrying on business in the táluka, that his partiality to one party results in injustice to the other and makes the function of protecting the people very hard, and that if the Mámlatdár be removed from the place everything will go on smoothly with the people.

A request to Government to extend the Gambling Act to Mahudha in the Kaira District.

21. The Svadesh Bandhu (129), in its issue of the 16th September, praises the police authorities at Mahudha in the Kaira District for keeping good order and peace in the town, says that the number of thefts at that place has been greatly reduced of late, and supposing that occasional thefts are committed by gamblers recommends the authorities to extend the Gambling Act to that place without delay.

Part II.—Education.

Remarks on the proposed changes in the Matriculation standard of the Bombay University.

22. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—The world is rapidly changing and India too is moving with the times. But the changes in the Bombay University curriculum have been so frequent during the last decade, and in some instances they are likely to prove so hard and annoying, which is the inevitable result of all changes, that it is to be hoped that in the interests of University education the course now proposed by Professor Oxenham will not be tampered with except in the event of an overwhelming necessity. The institution of a separate examination for those who do not wish to prosecute their study at the Arts colleges has rendered it necessary to revise the Matriculation course, and the changes now proposed are in some respects very important. The present system of giving a poetical passage for paraphrase, with the option of translating a vernacular passage into English, was the most foolish and iniquitous one that could possibly have been devised. We are glad this feature has been done away with in the proposed course. In English there will be two papers, one containing one or more passages for paraphrase and an exercise or exercises for composition and the other containing questions in grammar. The second change is one which will evoke a good deal of discussion. The French, German, Portuguese and the Persian have been transferred from the group of classical languages to that of vernaculars. It is a pity that, while on the continent of Europe and America there has been a decided reaction in favour of modern languages, our antiquated educationists should compel Indian students to take up Latin and Greek, which are more or less useless to them in their future career. There will be one paper in each of the classical languages recognised by the University, viz., Sanskrit, Latin, Greek, Arabic and Hebrew, and all students will be required to devote more or less attention also to their vernaculars so as to enable themselves to translate from and into English. The scheme as drafted does not mention when it is to come into force. Those who have already taken up Persian for their second language will have to take some other for their classical language. This means that some of those who are now learning in the fourth, fifth and sixth standards must adapt themselves to this change at once. We strongly protest against this oppressive regulation, and we hope some Fellow of the University will place an amendment before the Senate for postponing its operation till the end of the year 1895.

23. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 13th September, writes:—The next meeting of the Senate is to decide what the future entrance test is to be. It is proposed to raise the present standard by making the second language and the vernacular both compulsory and adding a composition paper in English. In the interests of the candidates we feel bound to protest against this policy. The University course has already been changed from three to four years, and it is further proposed to raise the entrance standard so as to take up an additional year of the candidate. A future candidate for the degree will thus have to sacrifice two more valuable years of his life at the altar of the alma mater. And all this for what? Not for any real gain, but simply to please the vanity of some demi-gods of the University, who believe, and honestly believe, that boys of this generation are so much deteriorated in intelligence that they cannot grow wise in as short a time as these demi-gods did of old. If the present entrance test must, therefore, be improved and distinguished from the University School Final Examination, we should suggest that it should be abolished altogether and the Previous Examination should be made the entrance test instead. This will secure the necessary result without imposing fresh burden on the innocent candidates.

Protests against the appointment of Mr. P. B. Joshi as a Maráthi Examiner in the ensuing School Final Examination of the Bombay University.

24. A correspondent, writing to the Native Opinion (15) in its issue of the 13th September, and another writing to the Kesari (43) of the 15th instant, protest against the appointment of Mr. Purushottam Bálkrishna Joshi, an assistant in the Judicial Department of the Secretariat, as a Maráthi Examiner in the ensuing School Final Examination of the Bombay University, saying that he has neither received any college education nor distinguished himself as a Maráthi scholar, and advise the Fellows of the University to veto his appointment.

PART III.—Railways.

Grievances of passengers on the North-Western Railway.

25. The Pirbhat (160), in its issue of the 5th September, writes:—The more profit the North-Western Railway authorities realize from the passenger and goods traffic, the more they diminish the convenience of passengers. The passenger train that starts from Karáchi at 7 A.M., being a convenient train, more passengers travel by it than by any other passenger trains. Notwithstanding this, we are surprised to see that only one intermediate class compartment is attached to this train. This compartment seems intended for all passengers desirous of travelling by that class, whether they be European or Native, or whether they be male or female. Moreover, it is not provided with water closet accommodation. We are unable to understand on what considerations the railway authorities allow passengers to sit in this compartment promiscuously, seeing that if a male passenger enters a third class carriage intended for females he renders himself liable to criminal prosecution. Is it not then absurd to allow males and females to sit together in the intermediate class compartment? Again, if there is no water closet accommodation in the intermediate class, what is the difference between it and the third class? This is a very unsatisfactory arrangement, and we hope that the railway authorities will see to it and remedy the evil complained of.

Alleged outrage by railway servants on respectable ladies and suggestion to the authorities in the matter.

26. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 13th September, complains that crimes of outrage by railway servants on respectable ladies travelling on the Indian railways are increasing for the reason that such culprits are not adequately punished, while in some cases they even go scot-free, but is glad to notice that a similar outrage which occurred in Burmah a few months ago has been properly dealt with and says that a case of this kind has recently occurred on the E. I. Railway, in which three persons attempted to outrage a young girl of 14 years travelling in a second class compartment reserved for ladies, between the stations of Luckeesarai and Jamalpur, regrets that the offenders have not yet been arrested, and fears that after some time the matter will be hushed up. The paper observes that the offenders are generally railway servants because they have special opportunities and knack for committing such mischief, and recommends the authorities to employ special police officers and to place them in close vicinity to the ladies' compartments on railway trains.

PART IV.—Native States.

Arrangements made by the British Government regarding the Manipur State.

27. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 17th September, writes:—As anticipated, a child five years old has been selected for the throne of Manipur with the title of Rája. A British officer will rule that principality during the minority of the prince. This is not a bad arrangement. It will inspire confidence in the Native States and show the honesty of purpose of the British Government. Anyhow the end has been secured, namely, that of strengthening the North-Eastern frontier. It is to be hoped that an officer in sympathy with the State will be appointed. Such an officer will preserve the interesting character of the State and not allow it to be a prey to innovations and fads. Some arrangements should also be made for the deposed family.

28. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 15th September, observes :—The Government of India did not care to reinstate the ex-Mahárája of Manipur because he proved himself a coward by running away from the country when a revolt broke out in his State in September last, and by taking shelter under the British rule, for it is just possible that if he had manfully repelled the rebellion even by asking the aid of the British Government, the present crisis would never have occurred. It was not unexpected that Government would select a minor prince for the gádi in order to be able to freely introduce various reforms into the State, and we therefore do not think that anybody has cause to complain against the choice made by Government. We only hope that Government will appoint an able, experienced and sympathising Political Agent for the State.

29. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 15th September, observes :—The selection of an infant prince for the Manipur throne in preference to the ex-Mahárája is sure to meet with general disapproval, and the impression will gain ground that the Government really wished to annex the State, but that fearing the censure of the British public they have had recourse to this make-shift. We think it would have been better if Government had chosen the ex-Mahárája and put the State under a good British Resident.

30. The Subodh Patrika (17), in its issue of the 13th September, writes :—

Propriety of the Native Princes in India contributing towards the cost of gatherings like the Congress of Hygiene held in England, questioned.

It is hard to see the propriety of the Native Princes in India contributing towards the cost of such gatherings as the Congress of Hygiene held in England. That country overflows with enlightenment, wealth and public spirit, and India subscribing to the current expenditure of such movements which the leaders of society start there is little less than sending coal to Newcastle from a place which is not over-supplied with it. Let us, however, not be misunderstood. The Indian Princes, like the Indian Government, may well co-operate with the movements referred to by supplying information and materials for carrying out their objects, and such expenditure as would be necessary for that purpose would be legitimate; but not so the cost of the gathering itself. Even this may be contributed by private Zamindárs and wealthy individuals, who, in giving, part with what is their own ; but the case is otherwise with the ruling princes, whose liberality has to be exercised at the expense of their subjects, and whose conduct in spending money on other objects than their welfare would not escape comment at other times.

31. A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 17th September, writes :—I went on a pilgrimage to the seat of the goddess Ambáji in the Mahi Kántha Agency on the 14th May 1891 and was shocked at the sight of about four or five hundred goats slaughtered and offered as sacrifices to the goddess and their trunks carelessly thrown about on the footsteps of the temple, which had become full of gore. On enquiry I learnt that this horrible offering was made then for the first time as the Rajputs residing in the neighbouring villages had obtained permission from the Chief of Dánta to hold a fair that day and to offer their sacrifices to the goddess. In addition to the sacrifice of a large number of goats, about 150 buffaloes were also slaughtered in front of the temple, and this wounded the feelings of the high-caste Hindu pilgrims. I request the Chief not to sanction such sacrifices as will deter high-caste Hindus from visiting the place and will result in a diminution of his revenue from the temple.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 12th September, writes:—We learn that it is under contemplation to locate the new office of the Director of Agriculture and Land Records of the province permanently at Chikalda, and fail to see the propriety of the proposal. It was more than once that the question of locating the office of the Conservator of Forests at Chikalda was moved, but at each time the Resident withheld his sanction to the proposal, and it would be, indeed, a matter for surprise if the Resident approved of the present proposal. We should say that as almost all the head offices of the province, and especially that of the Commissioner, are at Amráoti, as a matter of course the office in question should be located at Amráoti.

The question of the location of the new office of the Director of Agriculture, Berár.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Security of the British Indian dominions and a suggestion to the Government of India.

1. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 24th September, has an article headed "The signs of an approaching war in Europe," in which it says:—Russia, France and Turkey are said to have formed an alliance, but they can do very little harm to the British power in Great Britain and Ireland, which, having the most powerful armada in the world and being girded by the sea on all sides, is proof against any foreign invasion. Once in her most prosperous times France had invaded England with her naval forces, but in that invasion she was utterly vanquished. Now, therefore, none of the three European allies above mentioned can venture to take any aggressive steps against England in Europe. It is only in India that these three powers are in a position to give some annoyance to the English. Russia will approach India by land near Herat and there carry on its intrigues, and France and Turkey can block the Suez Canal against English ships. But though this may take place, we do not think England has any reason to be afraid of these three powers. So long as the twenty-five hundred millions of her Indian subjects are loyal and ready to fight with their foreign invaders, England need apprehend no harm from any power in the world. If India had not been fortified by the loyalty of its subjects, Russia could have in no time swallowed up the country. Evidently the English must, therefore, be always on the alert to keep this fortification in a sound condition. England has hitherto done much good to India, but much has as yet remained undone, and we recommend the Government of India to be ever alive to the interests of the Indian people and to make the British Indian rule firm by keeping the subjects always in contentment and happiness.

Disapproval of the trans-frontier policy of the Government of India.

2. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—The scare touching the Cossack casting wistful glances across the Hindu Kush has not succeeded. The stout exploring party of 500 strong in search of fresh strategical fields and outposts has now dwindled down to a modest hundred of cavalry and infantry. The Russians are now supposed to have moved off beyond the Alichor Pamir. Has the movement satisfied the Staff Officer at Chitral? It does not seem like it. For it is clear from the hasty journey of Colonel Durand from Gilgit to Simla, his interview with the military authorities there, his hurried return to Gilgit, the reinforcement now ordered of 200 Goorkhas and as many as 6 British officers, and the proposed tour of the Viceroy to Kashmere—all these are so many indications of something seriously brewing in that remote part beyond the Hindu Kush. Only the other day, when an honourable member of the House of Commons questioned the Under Secretary of State with regard to Gilgit and Chitral, it was observed that the little garrison at the former outpost was Kashmere's own troops and there was nothing unusual going on there. We thought at the time that that was, as usual, an evasive answer just enough to tide over any further questioning till the session was over. The Simla hierarchy have now a free hand. They will have no fear of any member questioning about their questionable actions on the remote frontiers till at least the next six months. So they are now slowly showing their hands. Why has a Goorkha detachment with as many as six officers been suddenly found necessary to be hurried off to Gilgit and beyond it? It is undoubtedly to checkmate the Russians in the Pamir, which is no man's land. Nothing could prevent it from taking a debouch south-eastwards from Little Pamir and appearing at Rukshan quite in the vicinity of Hunza Nagyar. For we may depend on it, the Russians are sure so to make their appearance as soon as the Goorkhas are posted at Gilgit or told off to march further north in the direction of the Great Pamir. Such a condition of affairs is eminently calculated to bring about a collision and the consequent scare of "to arms! to arms!" People should remember that with such a cry, the first thing would be to have a further increase of 20,000 soldiers and the practical carrying out of that proposal so recently formulated by Colonel Young touching raising double battalions of Native infantry and increasing the staff of British officers. Sir Frederick Roberts has already blessed it in his capacity as president of the meeting before which that gallant Colonel read his paper on the subject. It might then be not unlikely that, ere Christmas approaches, India may again be plunged in further heavy military expenditure of a permanent character, and possibly witness some new dénouements still in the womb of time. And yet our people sit blind with folded hands. We think now is the time for a strong and reasonable agitation against this utterly insane transfrontier policy of the military advisers of the Government of India which so greatly embarrassed Indian finances in the past and has thrown on the tax-payers oppressive burdens. Three krors of enhanced taxation and the absorption of one kror of the annual growth of revenue are thus absolutely wasted every year on the so-called immunity from possible external attack, but which is only an insane preparation for an aggressive and uncalled for "spring forward."

Expected appointment of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught as Commander-in-Chief in India after Sir Frederick Roberts' retirement.

3. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 16th September, writes:—It appears to be tolerably certain, though of course it has not yet been officially announced, that the Duke of Connaught will be Commander-in-Chief in India on Sir Frederick Roberts' retirement. During the Duke's sojourn in India in various capacities he had made himself agreeable to people of all classes, and the regret felt at his departure may be judged from the numerous demonstrations which were clear evidence of the esteem and popularity he had succeeded in winning, and India will now undoubtedly rejoice to see again in her midst one of Her Majesty's sons which gives her an opportunity of testifying her affection to the Queen-Empress through the medium of her children. What makes the rumour of the Duke of Connaught's appointment all the more likely is the fact of its being a stepping stone to a post for which he is predestined, viz., the Commander-in-Chief of the British army. The growing infirmities of the Duke of Cambridge and his advanced age render it impossible for him to attend to his multifarious duties for any length of time. He sadly needs a successor on whom to throw the mantle, and that will probably be found in the Duke of Connaught.

Comments on Sir Charles Pritchard's ábkári administration in the Bombay Presidency.

4. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 25th September, writes:—The reported promotion of Sir Charles Pritchard to the Council of the Viceroy, if true, is undoubtedly due to his high abilities as an administrator. We doubt if there are half a dozen English officials in India of the same mental calibre. But although a first-rate administrator, Sir Charles has proved himself singularly deficient in those qualities of head and heart which go to make a statesman. Naturally a hard-hearted man, he has throughout lacked that sympathy with the masses and that spirit of moderation and compromise which are essential to an Indian statesman. His ábkári administration has wrought much misery to a large portion of Her Majesty's subjects. We have no desire to under-rate the necessity or the difficulties of bringing the liquor trade, as it existed in 1878, under proper and adequate control. But surely it was neither necessary nor expedient, in order to do this, to proscribe raw toddy and to deprive landowners of their trees by placing an outrageous tree-tax upon them, and to deprive the masses of a healthful drink, which was their only luxury. The consequences of this short-sighted policy both to the people and to the Government have yet to be told. Though it has brought in an increased revenue to Government, we believe that the increase has been purchased at the enormous cost of the name and fame of the Government for right dealing with its subjects. The cultivating and labouring classes throughout Gujarát and the Konkan, who have been deprived of their trees and of a cheap and harmless drink and food in the shape of raw toddy, cannot be blamed if they have ceased to believe in the benignity of a paternal Government, which has thought it proper to bring about these things all in its own interests. It was not necessary, as we said, in order to regulate the trade in liquor and toddy to destroy it altogether and to create exclusive farms, which have only gone to fatten a few monopolists at the expense of a numerous class of small traders. As for raw toddy, the losses to Her Majesty's subjects have been much greater. The landowners have lost the benefit of nearly 90 per cent. of their trees owing to the tax having been raised twenty-fold in some cases. The toddy trade, which maintained a large class of Agris and Bhandáris, has been destroyed, throwing out of employ hundreds of thousands of persons, who have been in a state of semi-starvation ever since. The most lamentable result, however, has been the cutting off of a large supply of good and harmless drink, the drink of the poor, which supplemented their scanty food and which they could not well afford to lose. In any other country except India such proceedings would have raised a commotion, which it would not have been easy to allay. And though the Indians have been patient under these privations, it would be a great mistake to suppose that they do not acutely feel the injustice. This is the net result of Sir Charles Pritchard's brilliant ábkári administration. It was in view of this that a contemporary, about four years ago, asked if the C.I.E. was conferred upon Mr. Pritchard for his having "earned the curses of the masses." We regret to have to add that the question is as pertinent to-day as it was then.

His Excellency Lord Wenlock, Governor of Madras, and Mr. Caine.

5. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 16th September, writes:—It had been recently announced that in a speech made by the Governor of Madras on the occasion of an address presented to him he characterized the accusations of Mr. Caine against him as deliberate falsehoods and unjust allegations. Mr. Caine now warmly returns the attack and actually adds insult to injury by declaring that his informant of the distress at present prevalent in the Madras Presidency is a learned Native gentleman whom he would unhesitatingly believe in preference to Lord Wenlock. Mr. Caine's conduct clearly shows that he is below retort, and it would be an idle waste of words to treat his allegations with any sort of deference. When the whole Indian press has set the seal of unqualified approval on the Governor's measures and remedies during the dire distress in the Madras Presidency, and when one and all are filled with admiration at the unflagging energy and untiring industry of which we have had so many instances of late, it is evident how little weight could be attached to the insinuations and accusations of any man, whatever may be his repute as a statesman and in whatever journal he might be pleased to reveal them to the public.

Defence of Mr. Caine.

6. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 19th September, writes:—Notwithstanding all that Lord Wenlock has said about Mr. Caine in his recent speeches, we are not disposed to disbelieve all that the latter has said. To charge Mr. Caine with falsehood and misrepresentation is to do him great injustice. His mission in India was not to revile the British administration, but to point out in an independent way how matters stood and where they required most looking into. In this his most implacable enemies are bound to admit that he has acquitted himself in a way in which few others could have done. He may have erred as any man would have, working under the circumstances. He could get no reliable and true information from official sources, and had of course to seek it elsewhere; and in this he might have been misinformed. Was this his fault? It is generally believed that a large number of district officials are averse to letting the people know that there is distress in their districts. But there are some who do not even mind superior authorities and report the actual state of affairs. How many able District Magistrates had to pay for their straightforwardness during a famine in the time of a former Governor of Bombay, our readers are not perhaps unaware of. In taxing Mr. Caine Lord Wenlock took credit to himself. But whether people would give him the credit is doubtful. The most abject parasite of the Governor would be compelled to admit that the truth lies between the extreme statements made by Mr. Caine and Lord Wenlock. The latter should not have entered into such a controversy. The official report would have proved quite enough to refute any misstatements and his dignified position demanded the omission of any reference to Mr. Caine. But as he has chosen to speak for himself, it might be inquired from him whether there is a famine in Madras or not? The official report, as published in the Gazette of India, showed that the distress was dire. Thousands of people have been hopelessly ruined, their cattle are dead and are dying, their lands are mortgaged for food and their implements sold to pay, it is stated, taxes. If this is not a famine, we should like to know what is? Where does distress end and famine begin?

We are not to call it famine, we presume, until thousands of persons actually die of starvation. But why should Lord Wenlock deny the existence of a famine? Surely, nobody charges him with having brought it on or accuses him of any neglect. Speaking about the cattle, the Governor said that old and useless animals were dying, as if that was a very trivial matter. Now, when the distress assumes a graver form the Governor might say that the old and useless men were dying. Nothing is gained by not laying bare all the circumstances when distress is on; on the contrary, much is lost. We block private charity. We do not think Lord Wenlock could have managed to change the agricultural aspect of the country during his hurried tour, nor could we have expected it from him. All that he was required to do was to ascertain the extent of the distress and to take adequate measures for the relief of the people. Had his head-quarters been at Madras for months back he would have been in a better position to know all about Madras. By removing to the hills Government are prone to lose touch of the people.

Annual contribution by the India Office to the Imperial Institute, London, disapproved.

7. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 24th September, disapproves of the annual contribution of £1,000 for five years to the Imperial Institute, said to have been sanctioned by the India Office, as being hardly calculated to do any good to this country, apprehends that this contribution may be increased after five years, and regrets that India should have no voice in the matter of expenditure from its treasury. The Jám is anxious to know if a similar contribution has been sanctioned by the Colonial Office for the benefit which the Colonies will derive from the Institute.

Withdrawal of the Bangabasi prosecution.

8. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 26th September, expresses satisfaction at the manner in which the Bangabasi prosecution has come to an end, congratulates all the parties concerned on such an amicable termination, saying that the Native press will always thank Government for their outspoken statement about the legality of honest and independent criticism on the measures of Government, and advises the Native press to be careful in the future in their comments since Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code is pronounced to apply to seditious writings.

An open letter to His Excellency Lord Lansdowne anent the Bangabasi prosecution.

9. The Hindi Punch (107), in its issue of the 20th September, addresses 'an open letter to His Excellency Lord Lansdowne' to the following effect:—In undertaking the prosecution of the Bangabasi, Your Lordship has not given proof of much political wisdom and tact, and the propriety of that action has been open to serious doubt, as you will have seen from the disappointing result of the trial. All your energies have been wasted and there has been much ado about nothing; but it is now sincerely hoped that the result of the Bangabasi prosecution will teach you better ways. Such action is fraught with much danger and is unprecedented in the history of British administration.

A suggestion to Government to accept the apology reported to have been tendered by the accused in the Bangabasi case.

10. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 19th September, writes:—The recent information on the Bangabasi case is that the defendants have presented a petition to the Government praying that the case may be withdrawn. They allege they had not the slightest intention to excite disaffection, though, perhaps, the articles in question had a tendency to unsettle the public mind and generate a factious spirit. They now beg pardon for their carelessness in giving publicity to what was purely the outcome of a heated imagination. We hope the Government will accept this humble and contrite apology and withdraw the case. To persist in witnessing its termination and in attempting to "run in" the accused would hardly be in conformity with the dignity and prestige of the Government. Moreover, as the editorial functions have now devolved on another, there is a sufficient guarantee against the repetition of any improper allegations, and India would feel poignantly if the Government clemency could not extend towards pardoning those who crave forgiveness in all humility.

Remarks in connection with the murder cases recently tried before the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court.

11. After giving a short review of the five murder cases tried at the current Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court, in three of which the accused were Europeans, the Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 24th September, says:—The motive which impels us to notice these cases is a desire not to question the verdicts of the juries, but to draw the attention of Government to an evil which has, we dare say, struck many others besides ourselves. The question is whether it is not advisable to prevent European soldiers from going about with arms in their hands? Murders of Natives by shooting them have been innumerable in the past, and in most of the trials the prisoners have escaped punishment on some excuse or other. Not to go far back, one of the recent cases which created quite a sensation, both in this country and in England, was the Dum-Dum murder case, which ultimately resulted in the acquittal of the prisoner O'Hara on a technical law point, although sentenced to death at first. It was then thought that the sensation created by the entirely unexpected result of the trial would lead Government to adopt such a measure as we have now ventured to suggest. The present cases again forcibly draw attention to this question. Although, for instance in the Mhow case, the prisoner was acquitted, it is not doubted that the boy Rámrattan was shot, the only point at issue being whether it was the accused who shot him, or some one of his comrades who ran away. With reference to our point, we beg to notice the evidence of Sergeant Alfred Morris who was examined as to the arms and ammunition left with the soldiers. Although he denied that any Martini-Henry rifle or ammunition was left in the hands of soldiers, he admitted that during a volley firing a man might be able to secret a cartridge, and that in certain cases parties of three men were allowed to go out with sporting rifles and ammunition. Dr. Bruce Jervis, the Staff Surgeon, said that the wound was apparently caused by a Winchester, or Express, or a Martini-Henry bullet, converted into an Express by being cut. He said that such bullets were frequently so cut for sporting purposes, and admitted that he had himself done so several times. The learned Advocate-General also said that "despite the evidence of the non-commissioned officers to the contrary, it was a well-known fact that soldiers did at times get hold of cartridges, and as a consequence many terrible tragedies took place now and again." Mr. Justice Bayley himself disbelieved the story of the murder by the accused, although His Lordship admitted that the case was certainly a strange one as it was clear that the boy had been shot. His Lordship said, "Was it likely that a young man like the prisoner, being told not to pick up the cucumbers, would have retreated a few yards and deliberately shot the villager?" His Lordship thought that "such a thing was not probable, being confident that a man like the prisoner, who was well educated, would require much more provocation before he would be guilty of such an act." Be that as it may, what we are concerned with is the possession of arms by soldiers and the frequent tragedies in which Natives lose their lives. It is a very grave question, and Government is bound to see that no soldier is allowed to go about with arms. Natives have been crying without avail for permission to possess arms for protection from wild beasts, &c., but Europeans are allowed to roam all over the country with arms for indulgence in sport. We are not concerned with the Zanzibar case, and therefore we let that pass. In the Ahmednagar case, the arm in question was the sword; but this arm has not put itself in evidence so much as the rifle or revolver. A sword requires a hand to hand debut, while a rifle can be used from a respectable distance, and in the event of the death of a Native from a shot, the plea of defect of vision or the Native being mistaken for an animal is always readily put forward in many cases. But the result to the Natives is all the same; they lose their lives for nothing. The matter is too serious, indeed, for Government to wink at any longer. If there are any standing orders in the matter, for aught we know, they have proved ineffectual, and there is a clear case for more rigorous orders. We hope our appeal will not go in vain. [The Akhbár-e-Soudagar (94), in its issue of the 24th September, also expresses similar sentiments and urges upon Government the necessity for making strict rules, prohibiting soldiers from taking arms and ammunition when off duty.]

12. The Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 25th September, observes :—Five murder cases have been recently disposed of in the present Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court, of which two have resulted in the conviction of the accused, Natives, while the remaining three, in which all the accused persons were Europeans, have ended in their acquittal of the charges of murder. This strange incident has evoked much public criticism and caused surprise amongst the people. An opinion generally prevails amongst the educated section of Native society that it is difficult, nay almost impossible, to satisfactorily prove charges of murder against European criminals. The difficulty of bringing in strong and sufficient evidence against them is experienced not only in the Bombay Presidency but throughout the country. When a European is charged with the murder of a poor Native he is acquitted for want of sufficient evidence. This defect is, many a time, supplemented by the existence of some legal technicalities. In the recent murder case of a horse-keeper at Ahmednagar, the culprits, who would have been sentenced to be hanged by men of common sense, have been honourably acquitted owing to the existence of some legal technicalities. It is also a strange coincidence, which has caused much public surprise, that in trying European criminals the Court is always presided over by the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley, whose decisions in a majority of such cases are in favour of the accused persons.

13. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 26th September, observes :—The result of the trial of the five murder cases that recently came before the Bombay Sessions Court will hardly meet with public approval. In two of them European soldiers were accused of murder, but they were acquitted, while the Eurasian prisoner in the third was sentenced to only one year's imprisonment for a minor offence because there was not in the eye of the law sufficient evidence to bring the charge of murder home to them, but the public is much disappointed and feels itself not sufficiently protected, because it thinks that European offenders, though they may be arrested and put on their trial, are acquitted on the ground of insufficient evidence and thus encouraged to continue their dangerous practice of shooting Natives. We wish that some energetic person would collect in book form statistics of such cases within the last ten years and widely circulate them both in India and England.

14. The Hitechchhu (86) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 24th September, observes :—The number of murders of Natives by Europeans is increasing, and it is much to be regretted that many of the offenders should escape scot-free because the police either fail to detect the real offenders or to produce evidence sufficient to uphold a conviction. European juries, too, perhaps have leanings towards their own race, and such acquittals create an impression among the illiterate people of the mofussil that Europeans have, as it were, a license to murder Natives with impunity ; but it is not desirable in the interests of Government that such an impression should be allowed to gain ground. Very recently a case of murder, in which a European soldier of the Middlesex Regiment was charged with causing the death of a Native at Mhow, was tried by the Bombay High Court and the prisoner was acquitted, and we request Government to send for the papers in the case and ask the police to find out the real offender if the discharged prisoner cannot be convicted of the guilt.

15. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 21st September, writes :—There has surely been miscarriage of justice in the Mhow murder case. The verdict could not, indeed, be otherwise than it was on the evidence placed before the jury. There was a total absence of evidence identifying the accused as the offender, and, as far as the evidence went, it was right that the accused was acquitted. But justice can hardly be considered to be satisfied with that result. There has been unquestionably a violent death. The Surgeon's evidence proves that the death was caused by a gun-shot. The question is, who caused it ? The allegation of the prosecution is that three privates of the Mhow cantonment got into a cucumber field and helped themselves to the cucumbers. A cultivator, who was watching the field, gave them chase, and as the three thieves ran out of the field one of them turned back and fired his gun at the cultivator and shot him down dead. Who is the individual who fired the shot ? Cannot this person be discovered ? What a spectacle of incompetency the Mhow Police show if they cannot spot out the real culprit in a case of murder committed in broad day light by means of a gun-shot? There are all the circumstances of publicity in the case, and yet the offender escapes being brought to justice! This is one more case of the scant regard for Native life which Europeans, especially European soldiers, in India manifest. A contemporary gravely says: "No reasonable person will believe that an English soldier would commit a cold-blooded murder on such paltry provocation as he (the deceased's brother) suggests." Indian experience, on the other hand, is that sometimes no provocation is needed, and often the slightest provocation is enough for a European to take away Native life. It may seem hard to say so, but it is a fact which could be proved by numerous instances, that the prevailing European sentiment (we do not speak of cultivated Europeans) is one of contempt for Natives and callousness of suffering as regards Native life. To protect helpless Natives against this feeling, could not cantonment authorities and other military officers take some measures so as to make the British Tommy Atkins innocuous when he is abroad on his sprees or walks?

16. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—The House of Commons had some time before called up for a return of murders of natives of India by Europeans. This would show how necessary it has become to find out means to protect ourselves. In a recent murder case the Bombay High Court has let off an accused soldier for want of evidence. The circumstances of the case are sufficiently startling, and in the interests of justice and peace Government is bound to require the police to trace the criminal or to trace the crime to the doors of the accused. Should such offences remain undetected, who can think his person safe?

Alleged difference in the administration of law to Natives and Europeans and disapproval of the sentence provided by law for the offence of murdering a wife for her adultery.

17. The Shubh Suchak (67), in its issue of the 18th September, refers to two murder cases tried by the Madras High Court, in one of which one Rámchandra was, says the paper, sentenced by Mr. Justice Sheppherd to suffer the extreme penalty provided by the law for murdering his wife and her paramour in a state of excitement at seeing them in the criminal act, although he was found not guilty of the offence of murder by three jurors and was recommended for mercy by three others, while in the other one Martin, a European fitter serving on the Madras Railway, was let off with a fine of Rs. 50, though found guilty of the offence of kicking a poor female servant so cruelly that the kick resulted in the woman's death. These two cases, continues the paper, show how differently the law is administered to Europeans and Natives. There is a vast difference between a death caused in a state of excitement at the infidelity of one's wife and the one brought about by kicking an innocent female. Natives are so sensitive of their wives' marital faithlessness that they are reckless of their own life in avenging it. Thousands of men have been up to this time sentenced to death for this offence, but the severity of the punishment has not in the least diminished the number of these offences. The feelings of Natives being taken into consideration the extreme penalty of death should not certainly be provided for this offence. How is it that the section in the law dealing with such offences has so long remained unamended under the civilised rule of the British, and a Native is sentenced to death even when he commits homicide in an excited state of mind, while a European who high-handedly kicks a woman to death is let off on a small fine?

18. In reference to an appeal presented by Mr. Ganta, a Barrister of Madras, to the Government for the mitigation of the sentence of death passed in the case of Rámchandra above referred to, the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 24th September, observes:—Severe punishments are dealt out by European Judges because they are incapable of conceiving the feelings of a Hindu or a Mahomedan even on the mere suspicion of adultery by his wife. As long as the minds of our people are not so moulded as to regard pecuniary compensation for the adultery of their wives sufficient, it is the duty of both the Government and the judicial courts to treat them according to their own notions. The principle that laws should be framed in conformity with the notions of the people for whom they are intended must be acknowledged by the English Government.

Adultery is not a criminal offence in England, while it is reckoned as such in our country. The reason of this is the difference between the feelings of Hindus and those of Europeans in this matter. When a case of this nature comes before European Judges, they decide it from their own point of view.

Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, and the local police.

19. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 21st September, writes:—The sharp rebuke administered by Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, to the police for their conduct in a case of indecent assault recently tried by him must have fluttered the official dovecotes, but the rebuke is, in our opinion, richly deserved. His reference to the late and the present Police Commissioners was, indeed, unhappy and uncalled for, but the conduct of the police officers concerned in the case is surely reprehensible. We have no prejudice against the police, but if the facts are as disclosed in the case, we should like to know what their justification is for their conduct. Here is a man who is arrested on a complaint, which itself disclosed only a non-cognizable offence. He is placed before the Magistrate and is let off on his own recognizance. He is again taken into custody, questioned about his evidence, and detained for three hours. What right had the police to deprive the man of his liberty in the first instance, and again after his release by the Magistrate? In reference to the depredations by swindling gangs they complain they have no powers of cognizance in such cases. The wealthy are thus left at the mercy of swindlers, because the police have no powers of interference. In the case of the poor, however, the police deprive them of their liberty even in cases where the law plainly protects them from such molestation!

20. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—It is hard not to see the reasonableness of the strictures of Mr. Hamilton, the Second Presidency Magistrate, on the conduct of the Bombay Police passed in disposing of a charge of outrage on last Tuesday. The complainant in the case, a woman, charged the accused with having outraged her modesty on a public road. The latter was arrested by a police constable and taken before a Police Inspector, who placed him before a Police Superintendent. The Superintendent directed that the man should be sent up for trial before the Magistrate, but, in the meantime, liberated him on bail. Notwithstanding this, the man was again taken into custody by the police constable and kept in a chowky for three hours. The Magistrate, after a careful enquiry, found that the man was innocent of the offence, and that the case was got up by the woman through malice. But the strongest part of the case is that the police meddled with it, although the offence was non-cognisable. When a good deal was said in the papers recently about the raids of swindling gangs, and the question was asked why the police were inactive, the apologists of the latter, who never lose an opportunity to praise their efficiency, tact, and discretion, and all that sort of thing, naively put in the plea that the police were helpless in the matter, because the offence of swindling was non-cognisable. How are we to reconcile their inaction in the latter class of cases with their action in the non-cognisable case disposed of by Mr. Hamilton the other day? Men of questionable character hire big houses and large rooms, furnish them with rich furniture at 4 or 5 in the evening, cheat people by personating Rájas of Native States, and the next morning the furniture and the Rájas are nowhere and the houses and rooms are found empty, shorn of all the show of the previous evening. This goes on in Bombay, and the police are nowhere! Is it a wonder that there should be a general feeling of insecurity in the town, and that the criminal classes should think themselves rampant when things of this kind happen and the much belauded Bombay police take it all easy?

21. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—In their vagaries and excesses, such a strong organization as the Bombay police can only be checked, however slightly, by a powerful and independent magistracy. This is all the more necessary in a country like India, where poor, ignorant Natives can be successfully worked upon for purposes of oppression or extortion. In our city we are pleased to notice the firmness and independence displayed by Mr. Hamilton in the trial of some of the police cases brought before him.

22. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 23rd September, writes :—

Proposed abolition of the grain compensation given to the Native sepoys disapproved.

A contemporary has raised the question of stopping the grain compensation of the Native army and substituting the issue of grain ration by the Commissariat. The proposal cannot have originated with any one who knows the Native army. The payment of grain compensation is unequal and cannot be made equal, because of the variation in grain prices in the various districts. The Native soldier knows of the existence of this inequality and has discovered that Government cannot act more fairly to the sepoy than they are now doing. Consequently the sepoy has accepted the inevitable and is content. He has now been content with his grain compensation rate for many years, and, whether the monthly sum he receives for dear grain be little or much, he not only accepts it willingly, but regards it as one of his dearest pecuniary privileges. Theoretically, he is supposed to provide himself with more food with the rupee and a half or two rupees that are paid him as compensation. But that is not what he actually does with the money. And it is injudicious to pry too closely into how he spends the compensation. He wishes to be left alone to manage his own feeding business, except when he is in the actual field and cannot possibly purchase his own food. We cannot protest too strongly against the new proposal to abolish the grain compensation of the Native army, for, we know it will be resisted and will cause ill-feeling. It will, moreover, be regarded as a breach of faith to the army. The sepoy in cantonments has never felt that he could not provide his own rations and feed himself to his own approval. He will never willingly accept a Commissariat mother to provide his food, except when he is on field service. Eight or nine years ago the question of the rate of compensation to be paid to the army was actively discussed and the several proposals that were made by military officials were eagerly talked over in every military garrison in the country. Government were then informed that this was a tender question in the army, and were advised to make the concession as full as possible. This was done, the army was content, and it continues contented still. To raise the question of abolishing the compensation, accompanied as it may be by an offer of more food per fighting man, will be badly received by the sepoys everywhere. We say emphatically, let the question rest.

23. The Indu Prakash (14), in its issue of the 21st September, writes :—

Extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act to parts of the presidency other than the Deccan disapproved.

The proposal to extend the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act to parts of the presidency other than the Deccan districts is once more revived in connection with the visit of Lord Harris to Simla. It is believed that His Lordship will press for the settlement of the question. The Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act is a very special kind of legislation. The political and economic effects of its extension it is not easy to anticipate. The Act has been ten years in operation in four of the Deccan districts, and the results of its working are, if we mistake not, not altogether good. Looking at it purely from the rayat's point of view it has perhaps done some good, in so far as it has relieved him of a large quantity of debt. But it is questionable whether it has improved his habits or increased his saving power. It has had, however, one decidedly sinister effect. It has ruined the banker class, and the ruin of that class cannot be for the good of the country. The Act has a levelling effect. Whereas before the Act came into operation the rayats alone were poor and the sáwkárs had means to maintain themselves and the rayats, now the rayats continue to be poor (at any rate, they have not much improved in sustaining power) and the sáwkárs have also been reduced to poverty. We know several families up-country who maintained themselves on petty banking in kind or money, who are now absolutely thrown out of occupation. Thus in rescuing one class the measure has ruined another, and the whole country is reduced to one dead level of indigence. The woes of the rayats have so deadened the feelings of certain people towards sáwkárs and raised a hostile prejudice against them that in their estimation they seem to deserve no consideration. To our mind the impoverishment of the sáwkárs is as great an evil as the impoverishment of the rayats, and no measure which has such a ruinous effect on any class of people should be given a wider extension than may be absolutely necessary. The Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act was a heroic remedy called for by heroic conditions. No such conditions exist, as far as we know, in any part of the presidency except the Deccan districts, and we apprehend there is no need of the application of the Act outside those districts. In any case, Government should ascertain independent public opinion in the districts not yet affected by the Act. Government appointed a special officer, Mr. Woodburn, to report upon the condition of the districts in which the Act has been in operation as well as those in which it is not. That report should be published together with the opinions of Subordinate Judges working the Act. Then the public would have means of judging how far the Act has been a blessing or a curse. When public opinion has expressed itself on the report, Government may shape its course accordingly. But until the public has an opportunity of knowing the precise conditions of the problem, we do not think Government will use a wise discretion in ordering an extension and permanency of an Act which all prima facie considerations would seem to condemn.

Disapproval of the transfer of the Karjat Táluka from Thána to the Kolába District.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 24th September, writes :—The question of re-arranging the district of Thána is now occupying the mind of the official world, and like the lopping off of branches of a tree, the district is being deprived of its tálukas at every turn. With the transfer of Panvèl to the district of Kolába, the process, we thought, would stop, but it now transpires that the táluka of Karjat also is to be transferred to that district. By what process of ratiocination the proposer of this transfer lighted upon this step we cannot pretend to know, but any one who has travelled by rail can at once see that the said táluka is a more natural alightment of Thána than it could possibly be of Kolába. An approach to Thána from Karjat by rail is comparatively a shorter cut than the approach to Kolába by land. The rayats of Karjat, who have lost no time in petitioning the Government against the said proposal, adduce very cogent arguments against dismemberment. In any such matter the convenience of the rayats ought always to have a preferential claim, because he cannot command, as much as an official does, all the appliances of movement in a district. The petition of the Karjat rayats takes a broad view of the whole question and discusses it from various standpoints, with the conclusion that the execution of the proposed transfer would expose the Karjat rayat to innumerable difficulties. Of course, before the said dismemberment takes place the principal officers will be consulted in the matter, and we have every hope that they, too, will support the arguments advanced by the memorialists. The proposed dismemberment is not only a question of distance; the land tenure and other financial features of the táluka are so similar to those of the tálukas, say the memorialists, that any proposal of transfer is quite unreasonable on the face of it.

Frequent changes of Deputy Collectors, Mámlatdárs, Chitnises, &c., in the Northern Division recommended.

25. The Praja Mat (118), in its issue of the 19th September, expresses surprise that Government should make it a point to apply the transfer rules to petty officers like the Talátis and should neglect them in the case of highly paid officers like Deputy Collectors, Mámlatdárs, &c., and mentions in this connection the names of Ráo Sáhebs Parmánanddás Surajrám and Nágardás Gopáldás, Mámlatdárs of Chorási and Olpád sub-divisions of the Surat District and natives of Surat and Olpád, respectively, and that of Becharlál Jivanlál, Mámlatdár in the Ahmedabad District and a native of the same district. The paper regrets that such a deplorable state of affairs should exist in the time of such an able and experienced Chief Secretary as Mr. Mackenzie and observes :—Mr. Carvalho, Assistant to the Commissioner, N. D., has been serving in the office of the Commissioner since he took up Government service twenty-five years ago, and nearly half of this period he has passed in his present post of Assistant to the Commissioner. He is doubtless an experienced hand, but he has not been paying due regard to the relative claims and merits of Mámlatdárs and others for preferment. It seems either that Mr. Carvalho is tired of his present appointment or that his memory has begun to fail him and Mr. James, late Commissioner, intended to transfer him. It was only recently that we complained of first class magisterial powers having been conferred on Ráo Sáheb Kirpáshankar Bhagwán, Mámlatdár of A'nand, in supersession of about seven Mámlatdárs and also of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Gopálji Gulábbhái as Acting Mámlatdár in preference to Mr. Mánekbái of twenty years' service.

26. The Dhárwár Vritt (31), in its issue of the 24th September, publishes an unconditional apology tendered by the correspondent of the Lok Bandhu (139) to the Mámlatdár of Karajgi for making in its issue of the 13th September certain false imputations against him, in which the apologist expresses regret for having made unfounded allegations calculated to injure the Mámlatdár's reputation and to cause him mental pain.

Apology to the Mámlatdár of Karajgi in the Dhárwár District.

27. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 22nd September, observes :— The hand-bill entitled the 'Janmáshtami or the Gokulashtami' issued some time back by the Bombay Tract and Book Society is calculated to seriously wound the religious feelings of the Hindus, as a false and very reproachful story is mentioned therein of the Hindu god Krishna being in illicit love with his sister Subhadra, and we think that Government are bound to put a stop to such publications at once in order to prevent a disturbance of the public peace. We request our Hindu brethren to have recourse to legal proceedings against the mission society without doing anything towards retaliation. We also ask Government and the local police if it is not their duty to stop the publication of such objectionable hand-bills under Sections 295 to 298 of the Indian Penal Code.

A hand-bill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society and the offence given by it to Hindu society.

28. One 'B. P.' writes in the Dnyánodaya (12) of the 24th September to say that he is the author of the hand-bill which has become a subject of much comment among the Hindus, that in making the statement in the hand-bill to which exception has been taken his intention was not to revile Hindu gods and thereby injure their feelings, but simply to turn their minds from the worship of gods like Krishna towards Jesus Christ, the saviour and the only true god, and that the statement in the hand-bill about the criminal intimacy of Krishna with his sister Subhadrá is based on the following paragraph, which, says the correspondent, is taken from page 153, Vol. I of the History of India from the Earliest Ages by J. Talboys Wheeler, Assistant Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department, Secretary to the Indian Record Commission, author of the Geography of Herodotus, &c. : "In the older tradition Subhadrá is said to have lived in criminal intimacy with both her brothers. This tradition is universally known and believed by the people in spite of the story of the marriage of Subhadra, and the Musalmans frequently taunt the Hindus with the fact. The Pandits reconcile the stories by a fiction of there having been two Subhadrás. As to Krishna's proceedings, they are explained away as máyá."

29. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 19th September, writes :—We would ask the Deputy Post Master General for the convenience of persons having to tender messages at the City Sub-Post and Telegraph Offices in Karáchi to place another telegraph instrument and allow an additional hand, as the Native merchants complain of the inability of the present staff to cope with the message traffic, especially after 6 P.M.

Necessity for increasing the staff of the City Post Office and Telegraph Office at Karáchi.

PART II.—Education.

30. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 21st September, says that candidates for the Bombay University Examinations believe that success in these examinations depends as much on good luck as on good preparation, nay even more on the former, and that the University must remove this belief by taking measures to put an end to the alleged practice of examiners of examining five hundred answer papers in three hours. This allegation is, in the opinion of the paper, not altogether unfounded.

University examinations and the duty of the Bombay University.

31. In replying to the protest against the appointment of Mr. P. B. Joshi as Maráthi Examiner in the University School Final Examination published in the Native Opinion (15) of the 13th September, another correspondent 'A. B. C.' writes in the same newspaper in its issue of the 20th September, saying that he is rejoiced to find that the

Mr. P. B. Joshi's appointment as a Maráthi Examiner in the ensuing University School Final Examination.

Syndicate has at last suitably recognized the merits of a man of Mr. Joshi's abilities, "whose knowledge of English is superior to that of most graduates" and "who possesses much natural literary talents," that Dr. Mackichan, Principal of the Free Church College, in which Mr. Joshi was a student, entertained so high an opinion of his qualifications that a few years ago he strongly recommended him for a teachership of Maráthi in the University of Cambridge which was then advertised, and that Mr. Joshi is well known to Doctors Darmesteter, Leitner and Oppert in connection with his literary labours.

32. The Indu Prakásh (14), while writing about the same appointment in its issue of the 21st September, says that Mr. Joshi's appointment, of which it disapproves, shows that the present is a time for men of obtrusive habits and not for men of a reserved disposition, and is such as lowers the dignity of the office of Examiner, so much so that men of the ability of Messrs. Pandit and Gunjikar will have hesitation in accepting it, and that it is extremely to be regretted that recommendation and interest should retard the progress of education.

The Rájkumár College, Rájkot, and a suggestion to the authorities.

33. The Gujarát Darpan (83), in its issue of the 20th September, observes:—The Rájkumár College at Rájkot has hardly fulfilled the high expectation formed of it, as a majority of the princes educated at the College have not been found worthy rulers, but seem to be addicted to various vices. This is due to the defective system of education in force at the College. The students are educated according to English ways and taught English games and plays, while no care is taken in imparting to them such instruction as may make them good and able administrators. It is to be regretted that the Kárbhárís' Committee in charge of such an expensive institution should not think of improving its ways, and we request the Political Agent and the educated Diwáns of the several States of Káthiáwár to take prompt steps in the matter. [The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 19th September, expresses similar sentiments and adds:—Hardly any one of the princes educated at the College has matriculated. They get long vacations, their studies are greatly neglected, and great attention seems to be bestowed upon games. The College staff is also paid very handsomely, but none of the members of the Committee ever think of remedying this evil and improving the College course. The princes studying at the College waste their pocket-money in pleasing the Principal and other College authorities instead of spending it on their own education.]

Appointment of a European lady as a Superintendent over the Female Training College at Hyderabad, Sind, disapproved.

34. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 16th September, writes:—Mr. Jacob has laid the Sind public under a deep obligation by establishing the Female Normal College at Hyderabad. One of the chief obstacles that stand in the way of female education is the sad want of trained female teachers. If the College be successful, female education in Sind will receive an extraordinary impetus. But we have one thing to complain of, and that is the appointment of a European Lady Superintendent. The appointment of a Native Lady Superintendent would have cost much less and been more advantageous, for a Native lady can be more in touch with Native ladies than a European. Efficiency cannot be a ground of excuse, for the services of many Native ladies as efficient as European ones can be now-a-days secured, and that with less cost and more advantage.

Part III.—Municipalities.

The question of making adequate provision for preventing the spread of dangerous diseases in Bombay, and the proposed appointment of a committee in the matter.

35. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 24th September, writes:—Government propose to end the dispute with the Bombay Municipal Corporation in regard to the responsibility for the treatment of "dangerous diseases" by appointing a committee who shall report to Government "what may reasonably be considered adequate provision of measures for preventing and checking the spread of these diseases." Government request the Corporation to "permit the Acting Municipal Commissioner" to serve on the committee. The intention of Government is foreshadowed in this proposal. The committee will sit and will decide the extent of permanent hospital accommodation with establishment which should be provided by some authority. As to which authority will be saddled with this permanent expenditure there can be no reasonable doubt. Government will draw lots, both for themselves and the Corporation, and the lot will fall on the Corporation, and the Corporation will be told to maintain the hospital or hospitals. This is all "according to cocker" and is all plain sailing. But in appointing this committee Government are making quite a new departure in matters concerning "dangerous diseases," and in doing so they will be going behind the spirit, if not the letter, of the sections of the Municipal Act which bear on these diseases. In the first place, Government have accepted a new definition of "dangerous diseases" to that which was contemplated by the Municipal Act. In that Act, cholera, prevailing only in an epidemic form, and measles, were the only diseases embraced in the expression "dangerous diseases." The medical advisers of Government have not only informed Government that cases of these diseases should not only not be admitted into the wards of general hospitals, but that they should not be allowed anywhere within the premises of these institutions,—not even in temporary buildings on spare ground in the compound, but have advised Government that the English system of separating all kinds of contagious or infectious disease should be carried out in the general hospitals of Bombay. In England, typhus, scarlet fever, diptheria, measles, and one or two other diseases are excluded from general hospitals. It is now well known that erysipelas, puerperal fever, and several other diseases are communicable. Phthisis is not excluded from the list, and, as science advances, other diseases will be added. If Government have accepted the advice of their medical advisers, which they appear to have done, the number of "dangerous diseases" will be so considerably multiplied that the so-called general hospitals will have empty wards, and the "adequate provision" people will be saddled with the treatment of all the sick of Bombay. Government will probably express their astonishment at this result, but will not be sorry to be relieved of much of their present hospital expenditure. Of course, it will be a part of the duty of the Government committee, not only to report on the number of hospitals required for the treatment of "dangerous diseases," and the amount of accommodation that should be always kept available in these hospitals, but also to name the diseases which should be regarded as "dangerous diseases." Who on earth introduced the expression "dangerous diseases" into the Municipal Act we cannot say. But that it is an expression that includes tooth-ache, belly-ache, heart-ache, ear-ache and head-ache cannot be denied, for every disease, whether of organ, tissue or secretion, is dangerous. Drunkenness is dangerous and the Government advisers have a perfect right to call it a disease, and a dangerous disease. So is opium or arsenical poisoning. The committee must, by some ingenuity, get out of the nonsensical expression "dangerous diseases," and express what they mean by contagious and infectious disease hospitals in some other way. The Corporation can make no representation at the present moment. They have communicated to Government how they view their own liabilities. Government are now proceeding without the Corporation, and have intimated that they will not "at present enter into the arguments put forward by the Corporation," meaning probably their own previously accepted responsibility for treating all dangerous diseases, except when they are prevailing as epidemics. What the upshot of the committee's report may be remains to be seen. But if new responsibilities and liabilities of a vaxatious kind are to be thrown upon the Corporation, the Corporation should protest as strongly as they can to prevent themselves being saddled with the treatment of one-half of the hospital patients in Bombay. If the English hospital policy is to be applied to the general hospitals of Bombay, and if English scientific opinion in regard to contagion and infection of numerous diseases is to be accepted, the municipal hospitals of the future will be the hospitals of Bombay. Every patient in a general hospital has the right to demand that patients suffering from phthisis shall not be admitted into general hospitals, and the medical advisers of Government cannot gainsay this opinion, especially in hospitals whose walls and floors are studded with the sputum of phthisis. The new departure of refusing admission to patients in the general hospitals who may be suffering from communicable diseases, is a matter fraught with far-reaching consequences. Doctors are the very worst advisers in matters which may exercise a wide political influence, and it behoves Government to be very careful before accepting the dangerous principle which their medical advisers have so light-heartedly placed before them. These medical advisers may never wish to see a case of communicable disease, and yet they are willing and anxious to teach medicine and surgery with the role of medical and surgical pathology omitted. We are, indeed, coming to something, and the Cama and the European General Hospitals, both "general hospitals," will have to get rid of a lot of their patients. It appears to us that the whole proceeding of Government is premature and ill-advised. It can lead to no good and may lead to much mischief. It must lead to the compulsory removal from houses of the whole of the civil population who may be suffering from contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases. Government must be consistent, their committee must be consistent, and their medical advisers must be consistent. They start the present hare by announcing their object to be "measures for preventing and checking the spread of dangerous diseases." These should, therefore, be complete measures, or, as Government would themselves wish to express it, "adequate measures." Hence dangerous diseases must not spread anywhere in the city, for if they do spread even in private houses the measures taken to check the spread are not "adequate measures." The only measures that Government can take in order to carry out their own published programme are drastic as well as adequate measures. But this is a new departure in India, and as there is absolutely nothing in the sanitary condition of Bombay to force this departure on the city, Government would be well-advised to seek to amend the Municipal Act in all India to bring it into uniformity with the practice obtaining in English towns and cities. It is neither right nor fair to force a sanitary or a quasi-sanitary measure upon Bombay, which cannot be made applicable to the towns and cities of India. Bombay should object to be made the subject of quasi-legal experiments. The law should be made for all India, when all India will obey it, and Bombay will be "the first city" to show its devotion to public health. But finikin, imperfect resolutions, which will kill more than they will cure, and provoke more opposition than they can easily allay, should not be attempted. Bombay is now perfectly safe from the spread of the so-called "dangerous diseases," and if the Corporation are simply given credit, not only for good intentions but for a readiness to prevent the spread of these diseases at a moment's notice, the Governments of Bombay and India, the Secretary of State and the Mediterranean ports, may all dismiss their fears that these diseases will ever be allowed to spread either beyond the city or within the inhabited limits.

The period of repayment of the Tansa loan by the Bombay Municipality.

36. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—One good result of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay's personal conference with the Viceroy has been the satisfactory solution of the long-pending difficulty about the period over which the different instalments of the Tansa loan raised by the Bombay Municipality are to run A matter like this, which could not be settled by long correspondence for years has been easily settled by His Excellency Lord Harris at one personal conference with the Supreme Government at Simla, and very just praise was bestowed on His Excellency by the members of the Standing Committee when they heard of the personal zeal and interest with which Lord Harris advanced their cause at the Himalayan capital. There are two or three other questions of equally imperial importance pending between Government and the municipality. We hope His Excellency the Governor has succeeded in bringing them to a satisfactory issue, if not to an early conclusion.

37. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—Every citizen of Bombay who has carefully watched the manly and persistent struggle maintained by the local municipality for extension of the period for the payment of the Tansa loan to sixty years will be glad to learn that the Government of India has at last accepted the compromise suggested in the memorial forwarded to them. The representation of the Corporation was so reasonable that it is certainly to be regretted that the Supreme Government did not go a step further and spread the repayment of the whole loan over the maximum period provided in the municipal code. The Tansa undertaking is the biggest of its kind in Asia, and it is not only the present but even future generations that are interested in the measures now taken for providing the city with increased water-supply. If the facilities contained in the code were not to be availed of on an occasion like the present for lightening a tremendous burden on the rate-payers, it is difficult to suggest what larger enterprise would be entitled to more indulgent consideration at the hands of the authorities who have it in their power to grant or withhold their sanction. Although it would have been more equitable if the period had been extended all round to sixty years, it is something to have at least a partial compliance with the wishes of the Corporation. The present relations of the municipality with the Bombay Government cannot be pronounced to be over-friendly, and it is therefore a pleasure to find that the partial concession obtained by the municipality is due to the personal advocacy of His Excellency Lord Harris on its behalf when he was at Simla the other day. We wish His Excellency had succeeded in convincing the Government of India that the grant of a partial concession is not logical in principle, which if sound as to some instalments of the loan must be so all round in the present case. Something is better than nothing, and the Corporation will, no doubt, accept the compromise in that spirit.

Part IV.—Native States.

Remarks on Manipur affairs.

38. In a communicated paragraph, the Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—The choice of a successor to the ex-Maharaja, to the gadi of Manipur, has been at last made by the Government of India, and with that choice, we trust, the curtain will drop upon the Manipur affair. The Supreme Government have bungled in this unfortunate business from beginning to end; and who will say that the final stroke of policy, or impolicy as it may be more fitly styled, is not in keeping with the rest? If the expedition to Manipur, as also the previous mission, were undertaken to punish the late Regent for his arbitrary behaviour in having deposed by sheer force the old Mahárája, and if these steps are expressly approved by the Secretary of State for India on this ground, and on this ground alone, we for one fail to see how the Government of India can satisfactorily account for setting aside the old Mahárája in favour of a collateral boy-prince only five years old. This decision, if final, (and there is no reason to doubt that it is so) sanctions, in effect, the arbitrary act of the late Regent, for which, by the bye, he was to be expelled. We do not know how far this step is calculated to inspire the feudatory princes with fresh confidence in the justice and mercy of the British suzerain,—the main ground on which interference after an unfortunately long delay seems vindicated in the eyes of Lord Cross, as the recent despatch makes but too clear. It may perhaps be urged that the old Mahárája having shown himself so weak as to timidly flee from the country, Government has been justified in setting him aside; but, to say the least, this is a novel argument, and certainly not encouraging to the feudatory Chiefs. Moreover, why the boy-prince should be called simply Rája is equally shrouded in mystery.

39. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 20th September, writes:—A minority regency, of which the boy Chura Chandra will be the ornamental figure head, is to be established at Manipur. That was a foregone conclusion. It is of no use quarrelling over accomplished facts. Neither is it useful to criticise the political ethics of the paramount power in this matter. Let history enter her impartial verdict in the fulness of time. But it is, indeed, most amusing to see the pretensions and arrogant spirit in which the regency is announced. It is observed that the Queen, out of grace, has renounced her claim to annex Manipur! The question is whether the claim is justified? Was the claim substantial or airy? It is very well to say Manipur was a "protected State" from 1851 and adduce proofs in support of the claim. It should, however, be remembered that the other side is nowhere. It has never been allowed to prove that it is not. The Government all through sat in judgment on its own acts and pronounced a decree in its own favour. But has it given the aggrieved a full and fair opportunity to prove to the hilt that its contention is borne out? Suppose that the matter was to be argued out before the Privy Council, where both sides would be allowed to defend themselves to the best of their respective strength and ability; is it quite sure that the Government would be able to establish its claim? And if it could not, how could it say that it has graciously waived that claim? But

and it behoves Government to be very careful before accepting the dangerous principle which their medical advisers have so light-heartedly placed before them. These medical advisers may never wish to see a case of communicable disease, and yet they are willing and anxious to teach medicine and surgery with the role of medical and surgical pathology omitted. we have no inclination to discuss the ethics of this question. We have no doubt in our own mind that the Government has done a great moral wrong and now exercises an act of magnanimity, the utter hollowness of which is too transparent. A long regency is certainly advantageous in a way to a Native raj. But it is not an unmixed blessing. True it is that the strong arm of the paramount authority will prevent all internal dissensions and establish a firm rule. But the curse of it is this: the cost of the administration will be indefinitely enhanced, eventually shifting very heavy burdens, indeed, on the poor taxpayers.

Eulogy of Sir Dennis Fitz-Patrick and Mr. Plowden.

The Varhád (Berár) Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 21st September, is glad to see Sir Dennis Fitz-Patrick promoted to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb, as he is, says the paper, most popular in Berár and Hyderabad (Deccan) and deserves much credit for the present prosperous condition of the State and its friendly relation with the British Government. It is also rejoiced at the appointment of Mr. Plowden as officiating Resident at Hyderabad. Mr. Plowden, adds the paper, is a shrewd, clever, straightforward and zealous officer, possessing the qualities of a statesman. His impartial and just administration of Berár has made him very popular in the province. The various departments in Berár have been remodelled and a good system introduced into them during his administration. While Resident at Kashmere, Mr. Plowden was found to be intolerant of the defects of others and impatient in removing them, and if he but remove this defect in him and bear in mind that according to its traditions it is but natural that there should be some misgovernment at Hyderabad, he will, after a few years, be universally acknowledged to be one of such good officers as are rarely met with.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Ativa, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

A request to Government to appoint a Royal Commission to enquire into the administration of India.

1. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 3rd October, strongly urges the necessity of appointing a Royal Commission to institute enquiries into the working of the various departments of the State before the settlement of the new Provincial Contract for the Provincial Governments by the Government of India, emphatically observes that this course is calculated to promote the future welfare and prosperity of India, and hopes that this timely step will spare the Government of India the necessity of curtailing the expenses rightly incurred by Provincial Governments with a view to enable it to meet the increased expenditure on military works.

Alleged necessity for a provision compelling the Supreme and Provincial Governments to strictly abide by the resolutions passed by the House of Commons.

2. A correspondent of the Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—There ought to be some provision which should compel the Supreme and the Provincial Governments to strictly abide by any resolutions about Indian matters which the House of Commons might pass. The supremacy of Parliament ought to be loyally acknowledged by the rulers of India—the Viceroy, the Governors, and the Lieutenant-Governors. It is hardly creditable to the constitution of the Indian Government that at present any of our rulers may disobey the declared wishes of Parliament with impunity. Bengal has suffered greatly from the prevalence of the out-still system, and only two years ago the House of Commons passed a resolution which required the Government here, among other things, to discourage the system, and this decision was carried out by the local Government for some time; but now on the representation of some excise officials Government seem to have restored the old system in the large district of Midnapur. This may seem to be in defiance of the opinion and wishes of the British House of Legislature. If such disobedience to the superior authorities be a characteristic of our local Governments, the failing will soon infect the whole officialdom down to the lowest Amlah.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration of India and its critics.

3. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 1st October, writes:—Papers have already begun to criticise the administration of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne in right earnest. The Statesman pronounces the Viceroy's administration a "monumental failure." Although we would not go to this extent enough has occurred in this country since His Excellency assumed the reins of Government to show that his administration has not at all been a success, that he has failed where he should have succeeded and succeeded where he should have failed; some matters he should have left where he found them. We see some papers falling foul of him for his having, they say, brought pressure on the Nizám of Hyderabad to prevent him (the Nizám) from purchasing of Mr. Jacob the diamond worth forty-six lákhs of rupees. Assuming that His Excellency did bring such pressure to bear on the Nizám, where is the error? It is the bounden duty of the Paramount Power to restrain Native potentates when they go astray, for Native States are not the private property of the Chiefs. These States are held in trust for the people by the Chiefs, and the Chiefs should always in all that they do consult the interests of their subjects. It is in this that they fail; and therefore the Paramount Power is bound to advise them to refrain from doing what will prove prejudicial to the interests of their subjects. If the Government of Lord Lansdowne has really dissuaded the Nizám from purchasing the diamond they have acted wisely, and instead of finding fault with them for such a wise step we should really give them credit.

Sir James Fergusson's appointment as Postmaster-General.

4. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—It flatters our pride to see an ex-Governor of Bombay exalted to a seat in the Cabinet. The politicians who are sent out as Governors to India or the Colonies are generally either obscure limbs of the aristocracy or persons whose parliamentary career is not so brilliant as to open out a better prospect at home. To them a glorious exile to India or the Colonies for a period of five years is both welcome and profitable. A hundred and twenty thousand rupees a year for an Indian satrapy is not a sum to be despised. The salary is higher than that of many a Cabinet Minister with a seat in the Privy Council. The careers of such men most often attain a climax with a governorship, and therefore it must be particularly gratifying to Sir James Fergusson that he has attained the rare distinction of a seat in the Cabinet. He has succeeded the late Mr. Raikes as Postmaster-General. This office was held during Mr. Gladstone's Liberal administration by the late Professor Fawcett who had introduced many reforms in the department which had earned for him the praise of his political allies as well as his opponents. Among other reforms which are still needed is the reduction of the heavy postal charges between Great Britain and India on the one hand and the Colonies on the other. Sir James is not a man of very brilliant abilities. In this respect he may be inferior to Sir M. E. Grant-Duff. But we have seen him, during his five years' successful rule over us, as a hard-working and conscientious man, and as Postmaster-General he can turn his modest but solid talents to better account than as Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He has not the ready talent and ingenuity of a diplomatist to meet the inquisitiveness of honourable members with respect to questions of Imperial concern with delightfully evasive answers. His mind is too plain and blunt to use, as Mr. Gladstone does whenever he chooses, casuistical language which may mean anything or nothing. He has now been exalted to a sphere which will prove more congenial to his intellect and where he may be expected to do much useful work.

5. The Mahratta (15), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—We congratulate our quondam Governor Sir James Fergusson on his recent promotion to the Postmaster-Generalship. The news comes upon us by surprise and we make little doubt that it will produce the same effect everywhere. As the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs Sir James acquitted himself very creditably. We have little doubt that he will gain similar success in his new post. With his intimate knowledge of India and with Hennikar Heaton's determination to effect reforms we are sure to be benefited. Amongst other things let us hope to secure the privilege of a free newspaper service. In this appointment Sir James appears to have defeated the ambition of Sir John Gorst. The London correspondent of the Times of India says that the Manipur speech of his has scarcely qualified him for promotion.

6. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—After carefully going through the official and other reports cited by the Madras correspondent of Mr. Caine we fail to see any justification for his exaggerated statement. Even the Hindu of Madras, one of the very best of native newspapers, although it warmly defends Mr. Caine, admits "the regrettable language of exaggeration" by his correspondent. Yet one cannot but deplore the Governor's singular exhibition of ill-temper. His language was that of the Eatonswall Gazette. It may, perhaps, be proper on the hustings, but coming from his Lordship it was most ill-advised, as calculated to detract seriously from the dignity of his exalted office which it should be his care and his duty scrupulously to uphold. We feel that if the Madras correspondent's view of the situation was a little too pessimistic, that of the Governor erred on the side of optimism. It must be acknowledged that the Government have done much for the relief of distress, but it is certain they have not done all that might be done. Officials generally are very slow to awake to the gravity of the situation, and if Mr. Caine's denunciation, founded as it was on an exaggerated statement, were to accelerate that awakening, we might almost be prepared to forgive Mr. Caine for all the good that the quickening of the official mind might do. It is good that Lord Wenlock has been stung to the quick by Mr. Caine's criticisms, for some of the "tallest poplars" that were dissipating themselves on the cool and delicious heights of Ooty while there was great distress in the land, did need a rude awakening. Lord Wenlock has, indeed, made a tour through the affected districts. But it cannot be forgotten that he undertook it when he could not with any decency start on a cricketting expedition to Poona.

His Excellency Lord Wenlock, Governor of Madras, and Mr. Caine.

7. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—We congratulate His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government upon their good sense and foresight in receding from the position in which they had placed themselves without consulting Sir Alexander Miller and without mature deliberation. We are also glad that the proprietor, editor, manager and printer of the Bangabási have confessed their stupid mistake. We still more rejoice to find that the newly formed Native Press Association at Calcutta has signalized its birth by its successful mediation with Government. From the commencement of the proceedings against Bangabási when its articles came within the reach of every one who could read, we have consistently maintained that they were too childish to be noticed by a Government which has established its power upon a foundation too solid to be shaken by the ravings of an inflamed imagination. We have also shown during the past few weeks how Lord Canning and other Viceroys and Governors dealt with similar publicists even in times of imminent peril, and we still think that the course pursued by them was more statesmanlike and appropriate. We have also demonstrated that if there are offenders among the Native editors, Anglo-Indian journalism is not entirely immaculate, and a Foreign Government which wishes to win the sympathy of the ruled and to establish its power upon the foundation of mercy and justice cannot ignore the failings of the one while endeavouring to teach the other a severe lesson. If the articles of the Bangabási were seditious and deserved to be the subject of a criminal prosecution, what did the Indian Government do when an orator of the Ilbert Bill fame was said to have advised a march upon the Government House and when some Anglo-Indian writers wrote no less intemperately than the Bangabási? Again, what has the Government done with regard to the letter of Dr. Sheppard which recently appeared in the Indian Daily News and which is no less violent than the articles of the Bangabási complained of? We have not the slightest sympathy with writers of the class which figured in the dock at the Calcutta High Court; but we have a right to complain of the differential treatment accorded by Government according as the writers are Natives or Europeans. This is neither justice nor a genuine desire to suppress sedition. At the same time we frankly admit that the boon of a free press is a priceless one and that this privilege ought to be used with judgment and discrimination. There are good many serious grievances which our rulers, enlightened though they are, are too obstinate to ack nowledge and to remove. It is also true that India is not always fortunate in her Governors and Viceroys. But it is no use raving wildly against them. Patience is emphatically the one virtue which a certain class of critics in India has to cultivate, and our rulers also have to bear in mind that impartiality, justice and mercy alone should be their guiding principles in the administration of an Empire with so many conflicting interests. These principles have been recognized as well by the Bangabási and its friends as by Government in the course now adopted and we congratulate both upon the happy termination of an unpleasant and regrettable incident.

Withdrawal of the prosecution of the Bangabási newspaper.

8. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—The Bangabási case has after all come to a happy termination. The proprietor, printer and publisher submitted an apology which was very strongly supported by influential individuals and associations, and the Government of Bengal very wisely resolved to accept it. The Government of India were referred to and they were pleased to accept the recommendation of the Provincial Government. Government have done very well, indeed, and they deserve to be sincerely thanked for having followed the maxim "forgiveness is the best revenge." The action of the Government of India is generous. It would, however, have been noble if instead of going to court the matter had been settled out of it at the outset. On the admission of the parties concerned certain very ugly facts have, however, come to light, and we should, we think, all resolve not to make use of them. We think there can be no two opinions on the point that the Government of India is strong and powerful and can make and unmake anything an offence. There will not also be two opinions that if the people lost their heads on the passing of the Consent Act, Government was not free from that weakness. They began to watch more carefully the anti-Consent Act organs and thought it extremely necessary to check the outspokenness of the press. In the absence of any official and authoritative statement of the circumstances that induced Government to measure their strength with an ordinary newspaper editor we cannot see if there was any object beyond that of removing doubts about the interpretation of Section 124 A. If the prosecution has cleared those doubts Government have been immensely benefited. For ourselves we fear the matter remains where it was if at all it has not become more doubtful. The telegraphic report of the letter of the Government of India accepting the recommendation of the Bengal Government, says: "Neither now nor in future has honest and independent criticism, however mistaken or even hostile to Government measures or the action of public officers, anything to fear from the law so long as it is put forward in good faith, and not attempt to stir up hatred of Government or attack its inherent characteristics." It is these concluding words that throw greater doubt upon the interpretation of the section. What are the inherent characteristics of the Government of India? They are anything. There is however one consolation that there was not a single prosecution of the Bangabdsi kind up to date and the greater the obscurity the longer will it be before any second prosecution is taken up.

9. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 29th September, observes:—The further trial of the Bangabdsi would have placed both the paper and Government in an awkward position and both the parties have done well in coming to an amicable settlement; it would however have been graceful if Government in the very first instance had warned the paper and asked for an apology without embarking upon this trial; but the trial has done one service to the native press, viz. that it has now clearly demonstrated the amount of freedom the press enjoys in the matter of criticising Government.

10. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—So the Government of India has beat a hasty retreat over the golden bridge of abject apology contrived for it by the thoughtless proprietor and editor of the Bangabdsi. The prosecutors may be congratulated on this happy termination of a most unpleasant affair. We are not quite sure whether we should condole or congratulate our contemporary; because in such a case as this it would be charitable not to be too inquisitive and pry into things enacted behind the scenes and ascertain who were the parties most anxious to get out of the embarrassment. The Government in this instance has acted astutely. It has readily taken to heart the frank and honest criticism of independent critics of the press, both here and at home, and saved itself from further adverse comments. It may be entitled to say that the highest justiciary in the land has taken precisely the view which it took, though there are facts which could prove that the Government at first did not know its own mind. If it was so cocksure as it now affects to be, why did it not accept the apology which the paper offered at the very outset? On the whole, we should have preferred the final ending in the Calcutta High Court if only to get a decisive confirmation or contradiction of the Government view. However it is highly gratifying to note that the Government has wisely withdrawn itself from a dispute which, had it been carried on, might have possibly landed it into more serious complications with not a little wholesome chastisement from Parliament ultimately. It is also satisfactory to record the latest declaration of Government that fair and honest criticism, however hostile to officials and official acts, will never be resented by it; that, on the contrary, it courts such criticism as being conducive to a better understanding of popular opinion. This is a most statesmanlike view, and we heartily congratulate the Government of India on it. But will it stick to that view? We shall see. In India, unrepresented as it is in the Councils of the Government, newspaper critics, when honestly performing their duties, act as the outside conscience of the Government. They are an honest opposition who desire to correct the error of Government and direct it to the right path which may be most conducive to the welfare of the ruled.

Disapproval of the suggested revival of the defunct Press Commissionership.

11. The same newspaper writes:—We fail to see what good purpose will be served by the revival of the defunct Press Commissionership suggested by a correspondent of the Times. The recollections of the Indian Press of the service rendered by that office under the guidance of its first incumbent are not of the pleasantest. If it is again to become the vehicle for the purveying of official news of that fatuous flap-doodle character which scandalised the public, then it is to be devoutly hoped in the interests of that public that no second effort in the same direction will be made by the authorities. The press ought to be spared that infliction. In that case the office would simply be a sinecure for the Dowb whom jobbing Simla may select. It would be a further waste of the monies of the tax-payers who off and on are called upon to pay the piper for all kinds and degrees of comfortable appointments with very little work, or next to none, to do. The number of such offices is a legion, and in all conscience the Government of India should not multiply them. Only the other day they created one under the high-sounding title of "Director-Generalship of Records." The slavish organs of the press extolled it to the skies, as if the work of sifting, arranging and final summarising old State records could not be done by the young lions attached to the Secretariat of each province. Moreover, the ultimate value of the work done is wholly dependent (1) on the scrupulosity of the Director, and (2) on the conscientious character of the Government of India. The principle on which the work is directed to be done is most objectionable. For that matter, the moths and the book-worms may as well be allowed to make short work of it as soon as possible; or, better still, the match could be most beneficially applied and the people afforded the pleasant pastime of witnessing a merry bonfire. But we have digressed a bit. We do not think it is at all necessary to revive the Press Commissionership; and it would be worse than useless if that office were invested with the arbitrary powers of a Russian Censor. In that case the Government of India might do worse than create a Press Censorship. It might as well raise a Frankeinstien and try to crush it. No free and enlightened Government, having at heart the true interests of the liberty and welfare of a loyal people, would commit the grave error of establishing press laws and censorship. A fortiori no strong Government, which is free and enlightened as that of British India, should be so unwise as to enact such laws at the behest of a few mischievous advisers who for the time being may happen to be in power. It ought not to court fate. On the contrary, as we have said over and over again, it should be its constant efforts to probe to their source the causes of the real grumblings of the people which are perpetually finding vehement expression in the vernacular press generally. A Government which neglects to discover these causes lays itself open to a grave omission of the discharge of its solemn responsibility. To ascertain the symptoms of the disease in the body politic is half the cure; and when the proper remedy is applied the disease is certain to die of itself. The very fact that restrictive and repressive regulations exist in a country is the certain index of bad Government, be it from whatever causes it may—political, moral, economical, or all combined. And the singular fatality everywhere of a bad Government is its blindness to perceive and remedy its own faults and suspect its subjects of being seditious and discontented; for we stoutly maintain that sedition and discontent can never co-exist with good Government. In the company of the blind the one-eyed is the king; and the Government of India is the latest illustration of the old adage. If it would only open both its eyes and go about seeking the true causes which lead to expressions of sedition in the vernacular press, it would be astonished to discover the depth of the Cimmerian darkness in which it has allowed itself to grope.

Remarks on Sir George Birdwood's letter to the Times on the Anglo-Indian officers.

12. In approving of Sir George Birdwood's letter to the London Times on the Anglo-Indian of to-day, the same newspaper observes:—The Anglo-Indian officers do not at all mingle with the Natives but treat them with scant courtesy and thereby widen the gulf existing between the two nationalities. As soon as Englishmen come to this country a majority of them, as it were, take leave of all sentiments of freedom, fair-play, &c., begin to treat Natives with contempt, and mix only with Anglo-Indian officers residing here. These latter are strongly opposed to the Natives and from them the youthful new comers imbibe their principles, which are also advocated by the Anglo-Indian newspapers. No doubt there are some honourable exceptions, but they are few and far between. There is really a very great difference between the Anglo-Indian officer of to-day and that of the time of the East India Company. The latter was well disposed towards the Natives, amongst whom he made many friends and contributed to a very large extent to strengthen the foundation of the British rule in India, while the Anglo-Indian officer of to-day cares only to fill Government coffers at the cost of the Natives and takes a prominent part in the passing of oppressive laws and does not like that Government should take educated Natives into its confidence and give them a greater share in the administration of the State. Sir George's advice to Government that there is still as much necessity as ever there was in the days of the Honourable East India Company, that young English officers before proceeding to India should be most carefully instructed in the manners and customs of the people they are appointed to govern, deserves the favourable attention of Government; but this is not enough. Government ought to try to bring the Natives and Anglo-Indian officers into closer contact and for this purpose ought to change their present policy by taking the Natives into greater confidence by granting them reasonable franchises and by relaxing the oppressive A'bkári and Salt laws. If Government were to do this the Anglo-Indian officers would surely follow in their wake, the wide gulf between the Natives and the Anglo-Indians would be bridged over, a greater sense of loyalty and devotion to the British rdj would ensue and the foundations of the British administration would become more steady. About five years ago the well-known Dr. Hunter published a valuable article comparing the administrations of Akbar and Aurungzeb, gave the causes of the fall of the Megul Empire and drew an instructive moral for the British Government to follow. We request Government to bear it well in mind. [The Kdjyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 29th September, approves of Sir George's views, praises him for the interest he has always taken in Indian matters and regrets that the young Civilians of the present day should not be well disposed towards Natives and should not seek to be acquainted with the vernaculars and social customs of the country.]

13. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 3rd October, admits the importance and justice of the Government Resolution which makes it obligatory on all Subordinate Judges to pass a Departmental examination in any of the three languages, Gujaráti, Maráthi and Kánarese, which is not their mother-tongue, and suggests that a similar rule should be advantageously made with respect to the European officers and especially Civilians on whose sound knowledge of the vernaculars depends their usefulness to the Government and the native public.

European officers in India and the necessity for their acquiring a sound knowledge of Indian vernacular languages.

14. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 27th September, says that the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act has done much good to the rayats in those districts to which it has already been applied and that Government should extend its operation to all the other districts without considering the opinion of newspapers conducted by Bráhmans and the so-called Sárvajanik Sabha of Poona.

Extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act to all the districts recommended.

15. Several newspapers of the week, while writing on the verdict of the jury in the case known as the Ahmednagar murder case and tried at the last Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court presided over by the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley in which Thomas Foster and Richard John Blackburn of the Royal Lancashire Regiment were charged with the murder of a Musalmán in the Soldiers' Garden at Ahmednagar, have expressed dissatisfaction with the result of the trial and made adverse comments on the jury's verdict and the presiding Judge's summing up. The Jagaddidarsh (37), in its issue of the 27th September, says:—The evidence in the case is uncommonly strong and requires no comments. Yet the circumstances on which the learned presiding Judge has laid particular stress call for a few words. The Judge in summing up the evidence suggests to the jury that the statements of the sycos should be received with the greatest caution, but he gives no reason for making the suggestion. If, however, the fact of their being Natives be the reason why they should not be trusted, this mode of doing justice is really very excellent! The suggestion that the death of the deceased may have been caused by some Native rioters during the Mohorum festivities, is very unique, because the Soldiers' Garden is far from the city and there is no likelihood of a large number of people gathering therein. As regards the absence of a motive for the crime, spoken of by the Judge, it must be remembered that no motives are required by Europeans for killing Natives as will be seen from the history of past crimes. Europeans kill Natives as a mere pastime or sport and require no particular motive. The accused in the case in question were drunk on the day of the alleged murder and it is quite probable that they may have caused the death through mere wantonness and under the influence of liquor. On the whole, one is constrained to say that there has been a failure of justice in the case, and we regret to say that though the Judge is an old, experienced and respected gentleman his sense of justice failed him in disposing of the case. We call the attention of Government to the case and request them to order the case to be re-tried before another jury, if on reading the papers they think that there has been injustice in the case.

Adverse comments on the decision in the Ahmednagar murder case.

16. The Mutsadi (51), another paper of Ahmednagar, remarks that the reputation of the High Court for doing even-handed justice has been belied by the result of the case in question and that the principle stated by Dr. Pentecost that the superiority of Christianity is founded on justice and mercy requires actual verification. The Arunodaya (20) of the 27th idem echoes the same sentiments as above.

17. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 1st October, regrets that while the crime of perjury is said to be on the increase in England, a judicial officer like Mr. Justice Bayley should betray rampant race-feeling, as he did, when he asked the jury to be very cautious in receiving the testimony of the Native syces.

18. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—The case recently tried at the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court before Mr. Justice Bayley and a special jury, commonly known as the Ahmednagar murder case, affords a striking illustration of the blessings of British rule in India combined with what a misguided jury, principally consisting of Englishmen under the guidance of an English Judge, may do to set these blessings at naught. In this case, two European serjeants named Foster and Blackburn, belonging to the Royal Lancashire Regiment stationed at Ahmednagar, were charged with having, on the night of the 7th August last, murdered, in the Soldiers' Garden at that place, a Mahomedan mendicant whose name is not even so much as known, and who was reported in the evidence to be "a little mad" or "cloudy in the head." No less than about 40 witnesses—several of them high officers of Government—were brought all the way from Ahmednagar to give their evidence in the case, and, judging that the trial lasted for three days, Government, who were prosecuting the case, must have been put to an enormous amount of trouble and expense to find out the real cause of the murder and to bring the offenders to justice, however insignificant the position or character of the murdered man might be. The most unsatisfactory result of the case, achieved after so much sacrifice of the public funds, deserves more than a passing notice. The Rást, after giving details of the evidence in the case, concludes:—The summing-up of the learned Judge was even more favourable to the prisoners than the speech of the counsel for the defence. He picked holes in the evidence placed before the jury by the prosecution which, he thought, had failed to make out a case, went the length of saying that the Native witnesses in the case—especially the syces—were unreliable and that their evidence should be received with caution, and concluded by asking the jury that "in considering their verdict they should not be influenced by mere suspicion but should give their decision on the facts as proved, bearing in mind the entire absence of any motive for the crime." Such cases, the learned Judge added, "were very mysterious, and very often it was impossible to get at the cause of the commission of the deed." The hint thus thrown out to the jury was too strong to be resisted by the majority of it. There were on the jury six Europeans and three Natives and the verdict for and against Foster was given in the same proportion by the members of the jury. After the statement almost amounting to a confession of his crime made through his counsel by Foster and exculpating Blackburn, it was natural that a very large majority of the jury, including Natives, was in favour of acquitting Blackburn. But the case against Foster was a very strong one and we cannot help remarking that there has been a clear miscarriage of justice in his case. Such cases of atrocious crimes, when allowed to go unpunished, would make the Native mind uneasy as to security under British rule and incite members, however low, of the ruling race to acts of violence with impunity. A proof of this is forthcoming in the large number of cases (no less than three during the present Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court alone) coming before the British Law Courts all over India in which Europeans are charged with the murders of Natives. It is not difficult to conjecture what the result would be if the case were orherwise. The cry of scandalous injustice in these European murder cases is heard over this whole continent. It is a cry in which our Indian political associations ought to raise their united voice openly and boldly, and which deserves to be taken up warmly by philanthropists in England.

19. The Subodh Patrika (16), in its issue of the 27th September, writes :— The Ahmednagar murder case, which was tried at the current Sessions of the Bombay High Court and in which two European soldiers were charged with having murdered a Mahomedan, has to the surprise of most people resulted in the acquittal of both the accused. The special jury by whom the accused were tried consisted of six Europeans and three Natives. Six of these nine jurors brought in a verdict of not guilty against both of the accused; the other three brought in a verdict of guilty against one of them. The presiding Judge, the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley, accepted the verdict of the majority and so the prisoners were discharged. Thus once more there has been a grievous miscarriage of justice. Both the Anglo-Indian dailies of this city, the Times of India and Bombay Gazette, have spoken of the result of the trial as unsatisfactory and certainly we cannot congratulate either the judge or the jury on the outcome. It is impossible to understand how in the face of the evidence and the probabilities the majority of the jury came to so strange a conclusion. We cannot help saying that the charge of the Judge to the jury was very unsatisfactory. He imported into the case the facts of the Mhow murder case,—a proceeding which was contrary to the rules of evidence. He made much of the fact that there were no eye-witnesses to the murder, whereas the law says that where the circumstantial evidence is strong it is not necessary that there should be direct evidence to connect the accused with the offence. In this case the circumstantial evidence was strong enough against one of the accused at least. But all this was nothing in the opinion of the Judge and of a majority of the jury and hence the acquittal. The case is one which surely calls for public attention in England.

20. The Indu Prakash (14), in its issue of the 28th September, writes :—

Remarks in connection with the murder cases recently tried before the Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court.

In the last Sessions of the Bombay High Court there has been an uncommon number of murders committed by Europeans, in two cases, of natives of India and in one of a Creole of Zanzibar. Each case has ended in a way which leaves behind a strong feeling in the mind that justice has not been satisfied. The Mhow murder case, which was the first of the series, we commented on last week. In that case, as we have already observed, the verdict was right on the evidence, and the fault lay with the prosecution in not putting legal evidence before the court sufficient for a conviction. The second case in which a European named Buchanan was charged with the murder of a Creole cook named Noel was better proved. The jury find indeed that the deceased met with a violent death at the hand of the accused, but consider the death to be a rash and negligent act and not murder, and the Judge thinks it sufficiently atoned for by a year's rigorous imprisonment. The evidence of Mr. Bernard, the master of the deceased, and other witnesses leaves little doubt that the act was a deliberate murder. His previous threats to shoot Mr. Bernard himself with a revolver, his frantic demands for food, his search for the cook with revolver in hand, his being found in his bed with the revolver soon after a shot was fired, and the revolver having one of its chambers discharged whereas all were loaded before,—all these circumstances form links in a chain of evidence which to ordinary minds would look strong as proving a deliberate murder. Why it should be called a rash and negligent act passes our comprehension. If the accused caused the death as the jury find he did, there is no escaping the conclusion on the evidence that the death was a murder. There is no mere rashness or negligence about it. The third case is a still more glaring instance of a miscarriage of justice. Here the chain of evidence, circumstantial indeed, was, if possible, stronger. There is no doubt about the death being the result of a violent act. The question is who caused the death. A Mahomedan is found dead in the Soldiers' Garden at Ahmednagar with fifteen wounds on his face. Near the corpse a watch and a pipe which have been identified as belonging to one prisoner and a stick belonging to another are found. There is evidence that the two soldiers were seen at the place the night before. The sword and sword-belt of one of the accused are found to have been stained with blood. A handkerchief belonging to him, found torn into shreds and stained with blood, is produced out of a drain by a comrade to whom it was handed over for being thrown away. The trousers, cane and sheet of the other prisoner are also found to have been stained with blood. There is no evidence of a row having taken place as suggested by the counsel for the defence. Nevertheless the presiding Judge directed the jury, as clearly as could be, to acquit the prisoners and the jury have followed the direction. We do not raise here the race-question of European against Native. But as a matter of bare justice, with all deference to the Judge and the jury, we think there has been in this case a perverse decision,—the direction of the learned Judge to disbelieve Native witnesses which, it is to be noted, is one of the standing orders in our Courts. Nothing is so common for an English Judge, when commenting on native testimony, as to remark: "In this country it is very unsafe to rely on Native witnesses," or something of that sort. If Native witnesses are not to be believed why have the solemn farce of a trial at all? A general order should be issued that no statement of a Native witness is worthy of belief against a European. It will save a good deal of waste of money and energy. But again why should native testimony be believed as against Natives too. If it is not worthy of credit in one case it is not so in the other. It should be entirely discorded. Then it will be a fine thing for the administration—no courts, no prosecutions, no suits. We should be reduced to a state of primitive simplicity. The Judge further imported into the present case the facts of the Mhow case, an entirely different one as to merits, and told the jury how a certain witness in that case had perjured himself. Such a way of dealing with the case must have, we fancy, prejudiced the verdict. The contempt expressed of circumstantial evidence may have also added to the effect. But is circumstantial evidence to be discarded as of no value? In the present case, however, the evidence did not all depend on Native witnesses. There were several European soldiers, comrades of the accused, who depose to some of the most important facts. Are they to be disbelieved too? We do not know the reasons which weighed with the jury, but we know those which are mentioned by the Judge, and we do not think they can bear much critical examination. The discharge of the accused in the case we look upon as little less than a scandal, and if public opinion has any strength it ought to make itself heard.

21. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—There is a wide-spread impression among the people of this country that in dealing with European prisoners, even when charged with very serious offences, European Judges and juries are unconsciously inclined to take a more or less sympathetic and indulgent view of their criminal deeds. We do not propose to inquire into the correctness or otherwise of this prevalent opinion. But those who have opportunities of knowing the real feelings of the natives of the country cannot deny the existence of such impression, and we are sorry the result of the Nagar murder case, which was tried at the present Sessions, will considerably strengthen that impression. At this moment one or two other cases of murders are being tried in other parts of India and the public are anxiously watching the results of the trials. In whatever way these cases might end, we have not the least doubt that the unsatisfactory termination of the Nagar murder case will have a disastrous influence upon Native opinion in India. Many a time cases come up before the High Court from the mofussil more or less similar to the Nagar case in which mofussil Judges and the juries have recorded verdicts of guilty of murder against prisoners who have had to suffer in consequence the extreme penalty provided by law. But here the chain of circumstantial evidence was as strong as it possibly could be, and yet for reasons which it was not bound to state, the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty against the prisoners,—a verdict which the learned Judge, who presided at the Sessions, accepted. No doubt there was no direct testimony connecting the prisoners with the murder. But circumstantial evidence wherein almost every link is present is often as useful as direct ocular proof. One of the murder cases tried at the present Sessions in which a Native was found guilty of murder and sentenced to be hanged affords an interesting illustration of this proposition. In the Charni Wadi murder case, Mr. Justice Bayley observed: "Circumstantial evidence was, in some cases, even more convincing than direct evidence when the different links in the chain were complete." Now, let us turn to the Nagar murder case and the observations the learned Judge addressed to the jury on the evidence produced by the prosecution. The paper, after examining the evidence, observes:—We must say here that with all due deference to the learned Judge who tried the case his Lordship's summing up was not quite satisfactory. Of course our comments are based on the summary of his Lordship's observations addressed to the jury appearing in the dailies. The learned Judge seems to have accepted the theory of the defence that the soldiers were set upon by the Natives with a view to plunder them. With all due submission we must say that the suggestion is untenable on the face of it. If a gang of Natives assailed the soldiers, how is it that these escaped without the slightest injury? Besides is it possible to believe that the assailants themselves all escaped uninjured except the Mahomedan? Even this line of defence, though plainly inconsistent with the evidence regarding the nature of the scuffle, implicates the prisoners in the commission of an offence. Even in self-defence an assailant cannot be brutally treated as the Mahomedan was in this case, unless under special circumstances. Then, again, how is this suggestion to be reconciled with the other suggestion that owing to hostilities between Mahomedans and Hindus the Mahomedan might have met with his death? The accused had no definite story to give to explain the occurrence, seeing that the facts were within their knowledge. They simply threw out suggestions. Again, admitting that there were hostilities, how is the statement elicited from the witnesses by the jury to be got over that the deceased was a quiet man who hardly exchanged a word with any person? Again, we ask is it open to a Judge to influence the mind of the jury by the result of a former case in which the testimony of a Native witness was disbelieved and the evidence of the comrades of the accused was accepted? The Mhow murder case had absolutely nothing to do with the merits of the present case and we are sorry that the learned Judge instead of confining his charge to the evidence before him should have travelled into a discussion of what the Court and another set of jurors did in an entirely different case. This course, we contend, is without any legal justification whatever. It is in evidence that Foster's handkerchief was blood-stained and the sword was found to be freshly wiped. The Chemical Analyser, though he could not say positively that the sword had blood-stains upon it, was able to depose that the sword-blade gave the chemical reaction of blood. Again, if the soldiers were set upon by a gang of Natives, did they ever say so to their comrades? Has a single witness been produced to strengthen the theory of the defence? The fact that the syces did not report the assault made upon them by the soldiers to the mukaddam till the following morning was made much of. They had, however, no conceivable motive to concoct a story against unknown soldiers. But in the case of the soldiers, seeing that their clothes had blood stains on them, had every motive to inform their comrades of the alleged assault upon them by a gang of Natives. On the contrary, Foster admits that he was in a scuffle, but when he is pressed to say with whom, he remains completely silent. In the interests of public justice and safety we are bound to say that the learned Judge's charge to the jury was not what it should have been. In cases involving a nice balance of probabilities the jury has to be guided by an experienced hand. To us and to good many other persons who have carefully read the evidence, there is no mystery about the case at all. Even Mr. Russell's address showed that in his mind too there was not much mystery about the occurrence. The Honourable Mr. Justice

Bayley is an experienced Judge and when he tells the jury that "such cases were very mysterious and very often it was impossible to get at the cause for the commission of the deed," laymen will bow to his Lordship's decision, though not without a respectful protest. His Lordship was at liberty to accept the verdict of the majority and discharge the prisoners. But it need not be pointed out that European soldiers are not such brutes as to butcher Natives in broad daylight in presence of people. In good many cases, since Natives are the sufferers, they will have to stand in the witness-box. It is for the Judges and juries to decide upon the credibility or otherwise of their testimony, and if the principles of evidence as accepted in the Nagar case are to govern future cases no offence can ever be proved against Europeans. Intoxication is no excuse for the commission of an offence and we think a grave miscarriage of justice has taken place in the present case, and the question is whether it is not open to the Advocate General or the Legal Remembrancer to move a higher Court. Anglo-Indians are at liberty to abuse Mr. Caine and others on their strictures regarding the O'Hara case, but the fact remains that innocent and helpless Hindus and Mahomedans are not seldom brutally shot or murdered and no one is found to be responsible for them. We hardly know who is to be held responsible for this unfortunate result, but it is, we think, time that steps should be taken at an early date to move Parliament upon the subject. We understand that a member of Parliament has moved for a return of the cases of murders of Natives by Europeans and we hope some measures will soon be taken to put an effectual curb upon the criminal propensities of such soldiers, drunken or otherwise, as set no store upon the lives of innocent "niggers."

22. The Kaside Mumbái (111), in its issue of the 30th September, observes :—The last Criminal Sessions at the Bombay High Court have been full of surprises, as Native prisoners charged with murder were duly convicted, while the European prisoners who stood charged with the same offence were acquitted except an Eurasian who was sentenced to a year's imprisonment for a minor offence. The Ahmednagar murder case has particularly afforded much food for criticism. Of course, in this matter the Police of the place will not make any further move to trace out the real offenders, and we would therefore suggest the Mahomedans to join the Bombay Presidency Association in memorialising Government to have the case retried, as the Pársis made a common cause in memorialising Government anent the Rájábái Tower tragedy.

23. The Pársi Tikákár (117), in its issue of the 1st October, strongly disapproves of the results of the murder cases arrived at at the last Sessions of the Bombay High Court, says that it is generally usual with Europeans on the one hand to take a lenient view of the misdeeds of their countrymen and on the other to inflict the extreme penalty of law on Native criminals, and concludes by saying that if a comparison were instituted between trials of Europeans and Natives for murder it would be seen that hardly any European was ever doomed to execution.

24. The Jám-e-Jámshed (87), in its issue of the 3rd October, writes :—The Fourth Criminal Session of the year 1891 has come to an end. It will long be memorable in Bombay as a session of "surprises." This is the opinion expressed by the whole of the local press. It is time that the lists, alike of special and common jurors, should undergo extensive and strict revision. Whether the "lock-up" system should be re-introduced is a good question for public discussion.

Rumoured transfer of Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, and remarks thereon.

25. The Prabhádhar (16), in its issue of the 2nd October, says :—If the rumour of the proposed transfer of Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Webb taking his place as Second Presidency Magistrate, turns out to be true, one more ground will be afforded for the displeasure of the public with the Bombay Government, their opinion already formed that His Excellency Lord Harris does not discharge his duties with requisite coolness and foresight will be confirmed, and the people will be led to believe that Government have hit upon this device to humour the Bombay Police whose conduct has often been exposed and severely criticised by Mr. Hamilton and the appointment of Mr. Webb to be Second Presidency Magistrate in spite of the protest made by the people against his being appointed, even as acting Third Presidency Magistrate, will be a severe blow inflicted on public opinion and will ignore the claims of the Natives to such posts recognised by the Crown and the Government of India.

26. The Jám-e-Jamshed (87), in its issue of the 30th September, expresses its sorrow and surprise at the rumour about the transfer of Mr. Hamilton and the appointment of Mr. Webb in his place, eulogizes the magisterial career of Mr. Hamilton for the independence of action and anxiety for the public security and justice said to be shown by him, advises the Government to carefully reconsider this question of momentous importance before finally deciding it one way or the other, and concludes by saying that the repeated disregard of public opinion as represented by the Presidency Association, pleaders, &c., strengthens the popular view that the power of the Police is now in the ascendant.

Mr. Hamilton, Second Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, and the local Police.

27. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—With the sort of Police we have in Bombay, it is daily growing a moot question whether they are the guardians of law and order or whether they are a pampered class maintained at the expense of the city to defy law and indirectly become the instruments of breach of the peace. The observations which of late have more than once fallen from Mr. Hamilton, the Second Magistrate, would seem to confirm the popular view regarding the lawless character of some members of the Police. We think that Magistrate is discharging his duties fearlessly and to the great satisfaction of the public who are never backward to appreciate stern impartiality in the administration of criminal justice. The policeman who unlawfully detained the Hindu jobber, at the instance of an unveracious female operative, was certainly open to the just rebuke of Mr. Hamilton. In no part of the civilised world is the Police known for its scrupulosity. Hence for the correction of their errors and vagaries, as much as of their misdirected or misguided zeal, the public have to look to their Judges and Magistrates. The chief of the forces himself could do a great deal in the direction, provided he is a man of the ability of a Howard Vincent who combined, when at the head of the London Police, the virtues of a stern disciplinarian and a zealous reformer. The present efficiency of that Police, physical and moral, is undoubtedly owing to that distinguished officer. But Police Commissioners generally have that fatal failing of always justifying the conduct of their own men till one day they have to rub their eyes and find themselves the dupes of their own delusion and scandalised in the bargain by an indignant populace as was the case in London when in 1884 Mr. Vincent hauled up three of the ablest and most trusted detectives of his Department, counting over 21 years of service, for a series of most daring and astounding crimes, and sentenced to undergo ten years' penal servitude. The case of Meikle, John, Druscovitch and Palmer must no doubt be fresh in the memory of many of our readers. Bombay need not be surprised if a similar dénoûement occurs here any day, when she has the good fortune to have a Howard Vincent at the head of her City Police or even a man of the ability and character of Sir Edward Bradford who had only the other day to administer at parade a severe lecture all round to his myrmidons on the value of giving truthful evidence and behaving honourably.

A hand-bill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society and the offence given by it to Hindu society.

28. The Indu Prakásh (14) is much teased by the publication of a leaflet by the Bombay Tract and Book Society entitled the Janmdshtami noticed in paragraphs 27 and 28 of the Weekly Report on Newspapers, No. 39 of 1891, for the week ending 26th September last, and, in its issue of the 28th September, asserts that the Christians and specially the converted Native Christians, who, being unable to bear to see Hinduism in full swing in spite of their efforts to disparage and discourage it, slander it, will some day or other have to pay dearly for their wanton and uncurbed conduct in speaking reproachfully of that religion. The Indu further observes:—'The attack on the Hindu god Krishna which is made in the leaflet above referred to is very foul and exciting and it is the duty of those Gujarathi and other rich Hindus in Bombay who are the devotees and worshippers of

Krishna, to take effectual steps to bring the Christians to book and to the right path. What can be more shameful to the Hindus than that Christians should take advantage of their forbearance and meekness and revile them and their faith? Has anybody courage to speak lightly of even a slight thing of the Mahomedan religious books, not to say their God? There is no knowing what the result would have been in Bombay if the Christians had taken similar liberty with the religion of those, who on hearing of the intention of the European dramatists of bringing on the stage a representation of their Prophet, set up a row and terrified them into giving up their intention. Our Hindu associations and Hindu orators and Hindu journalists should take up this subject and do something to set a lesson to the unrestrained and wanton Christians and put a stop to their idle and mischievous prattling. It is also disgraceful to the Christians themselves that notwithstanding the provisions of law against teasing and hurting the religious feelings of any people they should indulge in reproaching and ridiculing the Hindu religion. The Rev. Mr. Bába Padamji, who is the author of the Janmdshtami leaflet, ought to have remembered that it is culpable to publish and repeat false and defamatory assertions and that by showing the authority for his statements he cannot divest himself of the responsibility attaching to libellous and criminal publications. Statements made in religious books cannot stand the historical and scientific tests of examination and verification. Would it not be very vulgar and mean to examine by the light of modern science the truth of the statement about a virgin giving birth to a son? If Christ went to heaven with his body why could not the Hindu sage Tukárám have done the same? Religion is a matter of faith and no sin is more heinous than to be criticising and cavilling about it. We ask our Christian brothers if they cannot propagate Christianity without abusing other people's religion. We call upon them in conclusion to remember that those who have adopted Christianity in the latter part of their life should not speak lightly of and kick their mother religion, and assure them that they cannot do any harm to the Hindu religion by their abuse of it but would only exhibit their own meanness. [The Dnyán Prakásh (13) and the Hindu Panch (34), in their issues of the 1st October, express similar sentiments and exhort the Hindus to take legal steps against the publishers of the leaflet Janmdshtami and thereby give the Christians to understand that they will not brook any abuse of their gods and religion.]

A reply to the comments of the Indu Prakásh.

29. In reply to the comments of the Indu Prakásh (14) the Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 1st October, publishes a communication signed by B. P. in which the correspondent pities the Indu Prakásh for having published a severe editorial against the Christians, opposed in spirit and tone to the sensible writings which have appeared in it for the last thirty years and says that the tenets and principles therein preached are of a piece with those Hindu laws and doctrines, which in former times directed that those Shudras or non-Bráhmans, who ventured to sit side by side with Bráhmans, should be branded on the buttocks and banished from the country, or that a Shudra, who should be guilty of saying to any Bráhman that he was the meanest of all Bráhmans, should have a red-hot iron bar about six inches long put into his mouth. It is not at all the object of the Christian writers, adds the correspondent, to revile either the Hindu or any other religion, and if what they write against the Hindu religion is, according to the Indu Prakásh, to be called abuse and reproach, then what the Hindu preachers of one sect have written about other sects must also be so characterised. As, for instance, Tukárám, a Hindu sage revered by all the people in the Deccan and even by the theists known as the Prárthana Samájists, has used abusive language of the devotees and worshippers of Devi and Ganpati. Should the disciples and followers of Tukárám be, therefore, prosecuted and punished for reciting the couplets containing the abuse of Devi and Ganpati? The Indu Prakásh has not proved the writing of Wheeler to be false and yet if the Hindus are offended by the writing in question the correspondent is very sorry for it. The Christians are, however, ready to put up with reproach, disrespect, persecution, imprisonment and even death in the name and propagation of their religion in obedience to the commands of their Lord.

30. In criticising the incidents connected with the forcible conversion of a Native lad to Christianity in the Almoral District of the North-West Provinces, quoted from the Pioneer, the Bombay Samáchár (96), in its issue of the 28th September, observes that the proselyting tendencies of some of the missionaries are sure to excite no small indignation in the Natives and especially the orthodox portion of Hindu society, and invites the earnest attention of the authorities to the necessity for taking immediate steps to put a stop to this practice of wounding the religious feelings of the God-loving people of India by imposing proper restrictions on the zeal and energies of the missionaries.

Alleged forcible conversion of a Hindu lad to Christianity in the Almoral District, North-West Provinces, and remarks thereon.

31. The Muin-ul-Islam (159), in its issue of the 25th September, writes:—We humbly beg to bring to the notice of Government that owing to the want of a post office at Berani, Táluka Shahdádpur of the Hyderabad District, the inhabitants are subjected to considerable inconvenience. In this village we find a school, tapedár's dera, police thána and the houses of several respectable gentlemen. All the post, whether official or private, intended for the residents of this village is at present brought from the towns of Tando Adam and Shahdádpur, situated at a distance of four and seven kos, respectively, from this village. Consequently the existing arrangement is one which not only causes unnecessary delay in the delivery of the post but also involves the risk of the letters being lost while in transit. We therefore pray that Government may be pleased to order a regular post office to be established at this village. If this is done, not only will the inconvenience and delay now complained of be avoided, but some pecuniary profit will, also, accrue to Government.

Want of a post office at Berani, Táluka Shahdádpur, District Hyderabad (Sind).

PART II.—Education.

32. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—The Senate of the University has shown great prudence in postponing the consideration of the proposed changes in the Matriculation course. We have already expressed our disapproval of the proposal on the ground that it necessarily increases the length of the course and thereby imposes an additional burden upon the students. The revised college course, so far as we understand it, has been based upon the present Matriculation standard to start with. If the latter be now raised it follows as a matter of course that the college course will have soon to be again revised. But apart from these objections, it is, we believe, necessary to arrive at some clear and definite understanding as to what the qualifications of a matriculated student ought to be. Does our University expect that an Indian youth of 17 or 18 should outshine his brother student in England in the knowledge of the mother-tongue of the latter? If so, it will be in the interest of all the parties to lay it down in plain terms. For ourselves, we think that the fault lies more with those who complain of the imperfect knowledge of the Indian student. The study of a foreign language is always difficult; and when we see many a European speaking broken Maráthi, Kánarese, Urdu, or Bengali after studying the same for a number of years, we should, we think, be surprised to find an Indian youth showing so much familiarity with English, after five or six years' study of the same, as to answer in English questions set at the Matriculation examination. But such is the tendency of the day that not only Europeans but Natives, who ought to know better, are found disposed to blame the candidate for not knowing a foreign tongue as well, or perhaps better, than these gentlemen did either at the time of their matriculation or graduation. We expect the Senate to put down this tendency and to lay down once for all what they expect a matriculate and a graduate to be considering that in this country we have to master, in addition to our vernaculars, a difficult foreign tongue and a highly intricate classical language. This done, the solution of the present question can never be a matter of difficulty or of difference of opinion.

Disapproval of the proposed changes in the Matriculation course of the Bombay University.

33. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 29th September, says :—A student suggests that the University School Final Examination should be held simultaneously at Bombay and Poona and this suggestion is well worthy of being considered by the Bombay University as, if acted upon, it would be very convenient for the candidates for the examination.

Simultaneous holding of the University School Final Examination at Bombay and Poona suggested.

34. The Dinmani (81), in its issue of the 29th September, observes :—While Khan Saheb Fazal Manji Khimjiani, Deputy Educational Inspector, Broach District, was examining on the 23rd instant the vernacular school in Lallubhái's Chakala at Broach, much merriment was caused by a boy misplacing certain words in a piece of poetry. At this time a Kshatri boy named Chunilál, not belonging to the school, happened to be present, and when he along with the whole class laughed, Khan Saheb Khimjiani administered to him severe beating. Mr. Ratanrám Duwárkadás, the father of the boy, then interviewed the Deputy Educational Inspector and remonstrated with him for his conduct, but the Inspector only insulted him. The aggrieved father thereupon obtained a medical certificate from the Surgeon, and had a summons for assault served on Mr. Khimjiani through the Educational Inspector. We are waiting to see the result of the case, but, in the meantime, we cannot help saying that if a Deputy Educational Inspector were to behave himself like this, what better manners could be expected from ordinary teachers and their pupils ?

Khan Saheb Fazal Manji Khimjiani, Deputy Educational Inspector, Broach District, and criminal prosecution instituted against him.

Part III.—Municipalities.

35. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 28th September, writes :—The firm protest of the Corporation against the arbitrary conduct of the Government in reference to the question of the Infectious Diseases Hospitals in Bombay has produced a sobering effect on the Government. A plausible and convenient way out of the difficulty has been found by the Government. They propose to appoint a committee of experts to determine the quantity of hospital accommodation necessary to provide for cases of dangerous diseases in Bombay, and asked the Corporation to permit its Health Officer, Dr. Weir, to serve on the committee. There was some disposition on the part of the Corporation to refuse this permission, but if that attempt had succeeded it would have placed the Corporation into a very awkward position. We are glad the Corporation has after all accorded its permission, at the same time guarding against being committed to any view as to the question of liability.

The question of making adequate provision for preventing the spread of dangerous deseases in Bombay and the proposed appointment of a committee in the matter.

36. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 27th September, writes :—The Government of Bombay has shown wisdom in not carrying out its threat to enforce what are called the "bludgeon clauses" of the Bombay Municipal Act against the Corporation of this city. The letter of the Government, calling upon the Corporation through the Municipal Commissioner to show cause why they should not be subjected to the indignity provided by the Act for their failure to make "adequate" provision against the spread of dangerous diseases, was apparently written in haste and without due deliberation. Government itself seems to think now that the step was an ill-advised one, as otherwise it would not have caved in so easily as it has since done and asked the Corporation to allow the Acting Municipal Commissioner to serve on a committee which it is going to appoint for the settlement of the somewhat ambiguous question of what is adequate provision against the spread of infectious and dangerous diseases. The Corporation has acted very sensibly in complying with the wishes of the Government and at the same time putting on record the fact that the Municipality does not mean to bind itself by any conclusions at which the committee of the Government may arrive. Perhaps the best solution of the question would have been to appoint a joint committee consisting of an equal number of Government and of Municipal representatives to advise on the point which has led to this difference of opinion between the Government on the one hand and the Corporation on the other.

37. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—We do not think the Corporation acted wisely on Thursday last in accepting the request of Government to permit Dr. Weir, the Acting Municipal Commissioner, to be one of the members of a committee of experts which is yet to be formed to consider what may be meant by "adequate" measures for the prevention of dangerous diseases in the city; firstly, because the letter of the Government is very craftily worded; secondly, because, it studiously avoids telling the Corporation who may be the dark horses of that committee; thirdly, because it is a terra incognita to the Corporation what may be the real purport and object of the committee. In our opinion the amendment of Mr. Mehta was the most logical, as it was the most sensible and prudent one to adopt under the circumstances. The majority of the members present thought that it was tantamount to an act of discourtesy to thankfully decline that request, for virtually Mr. Mehta's motion was to that effect. The "slavists" fancied that Government had met them "half way" in the matter of the impending question of the infectious hospital. They appeared to entertain a peculiarly sensitive regard for the thin skin of the men in brief authority who now rule the Presidency and control the destiny of Local Self-government all round. Other members had no such tenderness for these persons who have never failed, when the opportunity was afforded, of bullying and intimidating the Corporation. It was quite amusing to watch the faces of each of the actors, not forgetting the President, who for the nonce was gladsome to affect the courtier, as they rose to play to the official gallery. There was such a delightfully tremulous manner about them that some of the most intrepid members, who put no faith in the present Government, could hardly repress the smile which came to their lips. One of these candidly asked whether there was not a hidden discourtesy rather than any open politeness on the part of the authorities who had not even the candour to apprise the Corporation of the names of those precious experts—perhaps those who have already made up their minds to register the decree of the executive—the experts of a committee still in cloudland. That is not the way of a Government which is anxious to show courtesy to and take the Corporation in its confidence. The whole affair on the face of it is extremely suspicious. It smells of Iago politics. No wonder that the more far-sighted and prudent endeavoured under the circumstances to propose an amendment which, while preserving the main object in view of Mr. Mehta, really offered the best solution of the problem cunningly devised by the astute author of the Government letter. Mr. Dharamsi's amendment was an admirable one and would have completely met the case without in any way committing the Corporation to anything. The President curiously enough argued that it would defeat the object Mr. Dharamsi had in view. But the logic of this remark did not strike any one as being logical. So the end of it was this. Nineteen folk who were only too eagar to oblige a very courteous Government, which only the other day played the constable with the Municipal truncheon in its hand, voted that Dr. Weir may be permitted to sit as an expert. Thus, the "Hukambardárs,"—to use an apt word of the late Dr. Rajendralal Mitra,—swallowed with alacrity the intangible and delusive bait offered. Let us wait and see what comes of this precious committee which both Messrs. Roughton and Kabraji considered a "farce," but on which both were most anxious that Dr. Weir should sit and assist that farce!

Part IV.—Native States.

His Excellency the Viceroy's intention to pay a visit to Cashmere and its reported object.

38. The Mahratta (8), in its issue of the 27th September, writes:—His Excellency the Viceroy is shortly expected to pay a visit to Kashmere. It is believed that the purpose of this visit is to invest the Maharaja with powers. If this be true, then His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's administration will be entitled to the gratitude of every loyal subject of the Queen-Empress. We shall, therefore, anxiously await the outcome of this rather uncommon visit at this season of the year.

Remarks on the decision of the Government of India in regard to Manipur.

39. The Poona Vaibhav (56), in its issue of the 27th September, says:—The Manipur affair has almost come to an end and the final decision in the matter is not so good as it ought to have been. Several newspapers of Bengal have disapproved of the decision, only a few anti-native journals expressing their satisfaction at it. On reading the Queen's Proclamation of 1858 it would appear that Government have acted wrongly towards Manipur. The Proclamation asserts that Her Majesty the Queen has not the least desire to extend hereafter her dominions, but has not this most important and solemn promise of Her Majesty been broken in the Manipur affair? Does not the installation of a boy of five years on the gádi mean the annexation of the State? Human beings are all mortal. Suppose the boy prince dies 20 years hence, then the British Government will have to instal another boy of five years who has some remote connection with the royal family and to conduct the administration in his name! There are instances on this side of India of Princes like that of Kolhápur dying in the prime of youth. Government cannot be said to have been actuated by philanthropic motives in arriving at their decision in the Manipur affair; for, so far as we know, the Manipuris never complained to the British Government against their ruler. If Government had philanthropic motives they would not have installed on the gádi a boy of five but would have restored peace in the State and returned it to the Manipuris. They have not done anything of the kind. People are, therefore, likely to attribute some motive other than that of philanthropy to the British Government. From the opinion of the Secretary of State for India contained in his despatch in this connection it seems that he would not have been so strict as His Excellency Lord Lansdowne was, if he had had to decide the matter; for, it seems from the despatch that he intended not only to save the life of Tikentrajit but to restore him to his gádi. The man who was to be placed on the gádi was taken to the gallows and hanged like a murderer! Several mistakes have been committed in the Manipur affair and His Excellency Lord Lansdowne is being severely censured for them by the English Press. The boy who has been now placed on the gádi belongs to the junior branch and not to that of the late Mahárája. This we mention here simply to show that on account of the fault of the Senápati his whole family has been deprived of its claims to the gádi. There is good reason to believe that Government had some object in doing so. The boy who has been selected has moreover elder brothers who are intelligent. It is therefore necessary for Government to distinctly state the reasons for their selection of a young boy. When the present ruler of Baroda was installed on the gádi the administration of the State was entrusted to a Native, but that course has not been followed in the case of Manipur. This is likely to add to the dissatisfaction of the Manipuris. In order to make amends for their past deeds and to preserve their prestige, Government should appoint a Native as Administrator of the State.

40. The Rájyabhakta (119), in its issue of the 30th September, observes:— It would have been more honest if Government had altogether annexed the Manipur State, instead of the makeshift they have adopted with regard to it. When they issued a Resolution to say that it would be handed over to the rightful ruler, it was believed that the ex-Mahárája would probably get the gádi, and so people were satisfied, but the selection of an infant of five years old as Rája has produced dismay and made plain the duplicity of the British policy, which the people are shrewd enough to see through.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (ा or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (ं as u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Árunodaya or the well known Akbar, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Disapproval of the trans-frontier policy of the Government of India and the expenditure incurred on its account.

1. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—For the last five years the more far-sighted in the country and in the House of Commons have severely inveighed against the aggressive trans-frontier policy of the Government of India; and none inveighed against it so earnestly and so vehemently as the late Mr. Slagg. He called it a "mad policy." And a madder and more insane policy there never was pursued by a blind Government which yet fails to realise the open aims and intentions of its powerful neighbour. Can it be denied that so far Russia has mightily succeeded in its designs? For what is the meaning after all of the vast preparations that have been going on all along that immense frontier of 1,000 miles in the north-west? This only, that it entails on the Government of India unlimited and most appalling responsibilities, while it exhausts every available resource which, properly speaking, wise statesmanship would reserve for the evil day when Russia actually invaded India either by the old or the new routes. The disastrous consequences of the retention of Kandahar which Lord Derby portrayed in the House of Lords on 3rd March 1881 are nothing in comparison with the hundredfold more disastrous consequences which are certain to arise from this mad aggressive policy, condemned alike by sagacious statesmen and by the ablest of British military strategists themselves, men like Colonels Maurice and Home. In the prosecution of this insane object India has already been bled to the tune of nearly 39 krors during the last five years, which before a year or two will reach 44 krors. Since the days of the annexation of Upper Burmah and the Penj-deh scare, when they levied an income-tax, and later on the enhanced salt duty, military expenditure of all kinds has gone on unceasingly. We ask whether this trans-frontier question is a purely military one? Is it merely diplomatic? Is it merely financial? In the words of Lord Derby, "it involves considerations of war, diplomacy and of finance—and all these together, not any one of them separately, must be the bases of the judgment" to be formed on this question. It is wholly a burden instead of a benefit. It is not even a doubtful benefit. It is a source of the greatest danger to the Empire and every adviser who prompts the Government to plunge deeper and deeper into this ruinous gulf of military expenditure is guilty of the gravest and most inexcusable crime. The defences even after an expenditure of 100 krors will not add by a feather's weight to the real strength of India. We are so convinced of this that we hold with Lord Derby—one of the few and most far-sighted statesman who has really the true grasp of the Indian situation,—that "our best defences in India are a full treasury and a contented people, an army not too widely scattered for its work, and neighbours who are satisfied that we have no design on their territory or their freedom." Let the dangers of Russian intrigue and Russian advance be what they may, our true safety lies in the policy of wisdom above described. With such a policy established, the Government of India can defy "a hundred Russias." But woe be to India and her people if her rulers,—men in brief authority on whom sit lightly the cares of office and the responsibilities of Empire; men whose interests at the best are limited to a safe seat in the Council for five years on comfortable salaries; men whose final object is to retire with fat pensions, peerages and decorations; men who have no permanent interests of India at heart; men who are swayed by purely personal ambition and personal glory—if such men persistently pursue a policy which neither prudence nor the sentiments of safety nor sagacious statesmanship dictates. In that case India will be lost not on account of the invasion by the Russians but because of the criminal failure of its rulers to understand and avoid the real dangers prevailing in the country.

2. After describing in a rather sarcastic tone the tactics and activity of Sir Henry Durand and Sir Frederick Roberts on the North-Western Frontier acting in accordance with instructions from the Government of India, the Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the same date observes:—Original aggressors as the Government of India have been, they do not fear to throw the onus of the present imbroglio in the Hindukush and beyond it on the Russians! But may it be asked whether the presence of Colonel Grombchevtsky in those regions is not the logical sequence of their insane policy of a precipitate "spring forward"? What earthly business had they to incite the tribes in Kaffristan, to intrigue with the Mehtar of Chitral, to stir up the Hunzas and the Nagyars, and to create quite a Frankeinstein on the borders ever since the discreditable movement which led to the virtual annexation of Kashmir? Did even a single Cossack put in appearance two years ago in that direction? And would Grombchevtsky's little exploring party have cared to put in appearance, as they have now done, if the insensate and utterly inexcusable aggressive attitude of the Government of India for the last two years had not provoked them? Was it an honourable policy, creditable to their reputation as a righteous Christian Government, to have set tribe against tribe and secretly fomented internal dissensions with the object of ultimately interfering in their affairs, passing as the so-called mediators and friends—friends to be dreaded forsooth, first making temporary encampments, then becoming fixtures in strategical localities, and finally unmasking themselves as the masters and conquerors rather than friends and mediators? The Russians from afar watched the game; and when they found that evidently the British were themselves over-stepping their neutral zone, they were perfectly justified in imitating the tactics of their powerful neighbour. Why should not General Kuropattin steal a march on Colonel Durand and Captain Davidson? Why should the British officers alone have the exclusive privilege to travel in regions known to be no man's territory? And why should the Russians be considered guilty when they follow the same course? Can it be that what is sauce for the Jingo Bull is no sauce for the Chauvinist Bear? But it is of no use further pursuing this subject. We hold it to be a criminal folly for the Government of India to go on heedlessly extending the colossal line of trans-frontier and throwing away into the bottomless pit of military expenditure krors upon krors of the monies of the poor tax-payers in defiance of the most statesmanlike advice. Is there no public spirit in the country to raise a loud and powerful protest against this unrighteous policy, and the criminality of those who are responsible for the good government of the country and the contentment of its people? Is there none to expose this huge and transparent mask? Is there none to impeach the authors of this grave political crime—a crime which, in our opinion, is worse than war itself? Will the people awake and bestir themselves and make their voices heard, so as to put an end once for all to this appalling drain of treasure that is going on these last 7 or 8 years—a drain which has already cost 44 krors and is likely to cost as many more if this "mad" trans-frontier policy is not put down at once? How long, may it be asked, is this bleeding of the people unto death to last?

3. The Gujardt Darpan (83), in its issue of the 4th October, observes :—

Extensive export of corn from India and a request to Government to prevent it.

We have been always advocates of the principles of "free trade," but we cannot tolerate the very extensive trade that takes place in the export of corn from India at a time when there is a probability of scarcity and famine in the country. It is not proper that other countries should profit by the wheat of India when her own children are suffering from starvation. Free trade is not quite suitable to a country like India which is not far advanced and is the cause of much discontent and heartburning like those displayed during the late disturbance at Benares. Government, if they choose, should allow free trade in prosperous times, but in times of scarcity which is now staring us in the face they should endeavour to restrict free trade, see what the total produce is and how much is required for consumption here, and facilitate its transport from one place to another where it may be badly needed, the unrequired balance alone being allowed to be exported.

4. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its its issue of the 4th October, writes :—

Remarks in connection with the withdrawal of the Bangabdsi prosecution.

Last week we observed that it would be charitable not to be too inquisitive about the official political morality which succeeded in wringing that abject apology from Bangabdsi. It seems, however, that the Indian Mirror has boldly lifted the curtain and let its readers behind the scenes. In two recent issues our contemporary has unveiled the several attempts at wire-pulling which had been made and which eventually succeeded in getting the apology. He asks the authorities a number of pointed questions which it will be difficult to answer with candour and straightforwardness. According to the Mirror, it would seem that the new fangled Press Association did not play either a heroic or a patriotic part. It allowed itself, intentionally, to be a plastic instrument in the hands of the official wire-pullers. The British Indian Association was a partner, too, in the game. If all this be true, we have simply to be ashamed of these two organisations. For we entertain the greatest contempt for those who play the wolf in a friendly camp. The less we say on this subject the better. The Mirror has simply confirmed the views we independently expressed last week on the matter. None of the parties to this discreditable apology can show clean hands. That is all. There are two little but sufficiently expressive words in the concluding part of the Government of India's Resolution on this bungled Bangabisi business which ought not to be allowed by the press, whether English or vernacular, to go unnoticed. The Government warns its critics in the press against attacks on what it is pleased to call its "inherent characteristics." Now what may be those "inherent characteristics" of which we should speak with the greatest reverence and respect? We are prepared most loyally to steer clear of the undefined and undescribed rocks of "inherent characteristics"—these new Sylla and Charybdis of Lansdownian creation,—provided we are supplied with their chart. At any rate we are loth to unconsciously wreck ourselves, and we dare say that must be the feeling of our contemporaries generally, on the rocks of "inherent characteristics." So many ideas are associated with these that we are really lost in a maze what to consider as inherent and what as non-inherent characteristics. For instance, with all due deference to Government, we may venture to ask whether that critic would make himself amenable under Section 124A of the Indian Penal Code who could descant on the prevailing official mendacity in the administration of British India. The honest critic might try to point out the fact with the view of correcting this "inherent charateristics" now plainly discernible in many an official blue-book and resolution. Will he be indicted for pointing out this great vice of the administration and convicted as a felon? There are scores of puzzles and administrative abracadabras of the character we have pointed out, especially in connexion with trans-frontier and feudatory politics. Will the authorities at Simla care to clear the point and define the phrase "inherent characteristics?"

Governor's visits to Káthiáwár.

5. In alluding to the approaching visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to Káthiáwár the Ahmedabad Times (92), in its issue of the 7th October, observes:—It has been customary with every Governor of Bombay to pay visits to Káthiáwár, but such visits have been barren of any good results and the Native Chiefs, who incur heavy expenses on account of grand receptions, have therefore either to levy heavy taxes or to incur debts, with this result that some of them have been pronounced unfit to rule in consequence of their indebtedness. Gubernatorial visits would be very useful if the Governors gave a bit of counsel to the Chiefs to try to make their subjects contented and happy by reducing taxation and not to spend enormous sums on grand meaningless shows. If therefore the approaching visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to Káthiáwár is to be like what such visits have hitherto been, it will only cause waste of money and time; but if Lord Harris personally sees how the administration of each State is carried on, points out such defects as he may find therein, and indicates how improvement may be effected, and if he directs only a moderate expenditure on his reception, his visit will be of great use. [The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 3rd idem, makes similar observations.]

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne and the Local Self-government.

6. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—It is perhaps too early to say what His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's Government will do with regard to local self-government, but there are indications that the scheme will, in all probability, be pruned and sheared to the prejudice of growth. This pruning process will not, we understand, be confined to self-government. The jury system might also be brought under its operation. It is said that the party of officials that is biased against self-government in any form is gradually gaining weight and it is quite probable that it might succeed too. Self-government and trial by jury are easily intelligible to Englishmen and if we only endeavour to place actual facts before them they are sure to see through them and help us in retaining the position which Lord Ripon's Government gave us in these matters. In the Panjab the process has begun and we are not very hopeful as to the measures of other provinces. Let us therefore cry in time so that we might not be found fault with for shutting the gate after the colt.

Disapproval of the memorial of the Poona Sarvajanik Sabha regarding the extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

7. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 5th October, writes :—The Sarvajanik Sabha of Poona has submitted a memorial to Government in reference to Mr. Woodburn's report on the question of the extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act. The Sabha approves of the proposal for its extension. We are not aware what materials the Sabha has got for forming its judgment, but we are inclined to believe the judgment is one-sided. The advocates of the Act look too much, if not entirely, from the rayats point of view. They take no account of the sávkár, and yet the impoverishment of the sávkárs is as injurious as that of the rayats. The immediate object of the Act was indeed to relieve the rayats. That object is perhaps accomplished to a certain extent by wiping off a large quantity of the paper debt and enabling the rayats to start on a new career with the aid of legislative crutches. It is very questionable whether there is any real improvement in the moral and social habits of the rayats, and whether he will be able to sustain himself when the crutches are snatched away. But assuming that the Act has done real good to the rayats, what has it done but despoiled the sávkárs to enrich the rayats? The community as a whole cannot indeed be benefited by such a transfer of wealth. The Agriculturists' Relief Act is really an act of spoliation, a socialistic measure, an interference with or suspension of the ordinary relations of society. It is an extreme measure, and it ought not to be lightly thought of. The Government was satisfied that the condition of the Deccan agriculturists was so imminently dangerous as to require the resort to extreme measures. But the measure ought not to be resorted to unless the condition of the rayats in other districts is equally fearful. If there is reason for extending the Act to the districts of the Presidency other than those where it prevails already, it may be an argument for extending it to the whole country. Why limit it to Bombay? It is an Act of the Government of India, and may well be applied to the whole country. Let the Contract Act be suspended entirely so long as our paternal Government thinks it advisable! The Sabha puts in a word in favour of the conciliation system, and of the village munsifs. As a matter of theory it does seem that conciliation ought to prove a valuable instrument for checking litigation. The educational as well as the practical effects of it mentioned in the memorial are good enough, provided there is a class of men competent to do the work. But our information is that there is a great paucity of good men, especially in villages where the system is chiefly in force. Rumour is rife that corruption is not unknown. But putting aside corruption, there is not, it is said, much practical good resulting from the system. In any case a board of conciliators may possibly do some good in certain cases, but the village munsifs ought not to be revived.

8. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 4th October, writes :—The Sarvajanik Sabha has submitted a representation to Government on the subject of the extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act. The committee of the Sabha support the recommendation of the Special Officer appointed to inquire into the working of the Act that the Act might with advantage be extended to other classes than agriculturists and to other districts. We are sorry to have to differ from this view. We have in these columns exhaustively shown that the Act has done more mischief than good, and if the indebted rayats themselves could speak to Government in the fashionable manner in which the Sabha can, we have no doubt they would curse the Sabha and the Act. The Relief Act is killing out of existence the sávkár class and is creating a vacancy which the Honourable Ráo Bahádur Ránade and his followers would fill up with Manchester money-lenders let loose upon the rayats and Native money-lenders. Those who know the history of this piece of legislation will not be surprised to learn that the Sabha recommends an extension of it. It is the Sabha that has helped this child of Sir Theodore Hope into existence, and it is only natural that in the absence of the father the Sabha should take care of the orphan. We are sorry for the change that is taking place in the policy of the Sabha. It is fast becoming an apologist of the official policy. We do not mean, nor even so much as suggest, that the Sabha should oppose Government in and out of season, but we certainly wish that it should first guard the interests of the people. It is, we believe, high time that people should note that in the long run bodies like the Sabha do better service to the cause of Government than to that of the people because they generally consist of big folks who find it to their advantage to sympathise with Government rather than with the people.

Alleged hardship caused to agriculturists by the new rules on the subject of grazing.

9. The Pratod (52), in its issue of the 5th October, bitterly complains of the hardship suffered by the agriculturists of Sátára in common with those of other districts by the recent orders of Government in connection with cattle-grazing, and says that owing to want of proper supervision over the work of Government officers the latter have become most regardless of the well-being of the rayats, their tendency being towards increasing the State revenue somehow or other, and that crowds of people whose cattle are dying for want of grass are daily going to Sátára to represent their grievances to the Collector, who does neither personally enquire into their grievances nor has the courtesy to say to them a few sympathetic words, but asks them to leave their petitions with him and to go back to their villages. It is really disgraceful, adds the paper, to the British Government that their district officers should be so indifferent to the hard condition of cattle that the agriculturists should think of going to Pant Pratinidhi, Sachiv, Dafale and other Native Chiefs to implore mercy for their starving cattle and to do something for them. The Collector of Sátára, thinks the paper, is responsible to God, if not to Government, for his neglect of duty and should at least listen to the grievances of the agriculturists and report them to Government if he is satisfied about their truth.

Mr. Lely, Collector of Surat, and the arts exhibition to be held at Surat during the forthcoming Diváli holidays.

10. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—We are glad the city of Surat has resolved upon holding an arts exhibition of Indian manufactures during the next Diváli holidays. Indeed, an arts exhibition, that will teach our artizans something new and will contribute to the convenience and comfort of our people, is a much more pleasurable pastime than the ruffling of the local self-government, or the inflicting of uncalled-for abuse upon the manners and customs of our people as was done in the now notorious Bhatbut case, or in some similar disagreeable performance, and we are glad that both the Surat officials and the Surat people have joined under the agreeable leadership of Mr. Lely to forget all past local misunderstandings and undertake business that is likely to give an impulse to their energies in the right direction. We have no doubt Mr. Lely's advice will remove the municipal misunderstanding that had cast Surat society at one time into a state of anarchy. Be that as it may, we are glad Mr. Lely has fortunately hit upon a modus vivendi that must once more bring together the drifting members of the Surat society. We have no doubt that under the auspices of their present popular Collector the exhibition will prove a success. What we would ask those concerned with the exhibition is to confine it to a limited area, because a deflection of energies does not often ensure success. An exhibition is a combination of pleasure and instruction, but an over-dose of instruction is often as mischievous as an over-dose of pleasure, and it is better that the instructive part of the exhibition should suit the capacities of the artizans for whom the exhibition is intended. We think our Surat friends ought to have a museum and a shop attached to it. Cutlery, such as locks, hinges, a carpenter's and blacksmith's tools, and even agricultural implements ought to form the principal feature of the exhibition, because it is these articles that will attract to it people from the surrounding country. The wants of these people are few and the exhibition might be so arranged as to suit their tastes, as also to create in them new tastes for other articles so requisite in their daily avocations. It will be better, therefore, to instruct people in the mofussil to send such exhibits as will answer the requirements of the community for whom the exhibition is to be held.

11. The Gujarát Mitrá (85), in its issue of the 4th October, observes:—

Ráo Bahádur Bhimbhái Kirpárám, Huzur Deputy Collector, Surat, praised.

The income-tax is no doubt a very obnoxious tax, but it is somewhat gratifying that since the appointment of Ráo Bahádur Bhimbhái Kirpárám as Huzur Deputy Collector at Surat, the dissatisfaction among the people on this account has been greatly diminished in consequence of his exempting the really poor people from its operation. Ráo Bahádur Bhimbhái is a tried and trusted officer of Government, and his appointment at Surat has resulted in good to all, the Municipality not excepted.

12. The Rást Goftár (89), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—

Alleged failure of justice in certain cases tried before the last Criminal Sessions of the Bombay High Court and remarks thereon.

Perhaps no Criminal Sessions in the past can boast of such downright denial and failure of justice as the fourth Sessions of the Bombay High Court in 1891 has shown in almost all heavy and important cases on its calendar. It is called by our English contemporaries a "Sessions of surprises" because of the wholesale but unexpected miscarriage of justice which has taken place, and in the native mind it has now been established almost as a settled conviction that it is futile to attempt to bring home the guilt to a European prisoner who is accused of murdering a Native. All such murder cases—and there were three—were thrown out by English juries at the last Sessions, except in one case where the prisoner was convicted on a minor count resulting in a short term of imprisonment. The unwillingness of English juries to convict their countrymen charged with murdering Natives is now taken for granted all over India with this result that in all such cases brought up before the High Court, be they in Bengal or Bombay, Madras or Allahabad, the acquittal of the accused becomes a foregone conclusion, and a conviction in rare instances proves not the rule but the exception to it. A widespread sense of insecurity has seized the native mind—a feeling of alarm aggravated by the conduct of the police in the Rájábái Tower inquiry and of the learned Judge in the murder case which ensued therefrom. The jury was not at fault in that case as the Judge, who summed up in favour of an unaccountable accident contrary to the evidence recorded in the case; and the theory of accident which the court set up was afterwards converted by Government into a more mysterious theory of suicide. No European was charged with murder in that tower case, but some European reputations were at stake in the issues raised by the police and in other side-issues involved in that trial; and public indignation and alarm were aroused not because the accused was acquitted—which was all fair since there was not a tittle of evidence to convict him of the crime—but because the very existence of crime was denied by the Judge, and in two of the foulest and most cold-blooded murders on record theories were set up alternately from suicide to an accident and from an accident to suicide again. We say the present feeling of alarm took a sudden but strong impetus by the hearing at the last Sessions of the Rájábái Tower Case, and we are sorry to see that public uneasiness receiving a further support at the present Sessions by the most astounding acquittals of European prisoners caught almost red-handed in the act of murder. We do not share the consternation and alarm which fills the public mind, but as the chronicler of current events we cannot help noticing it as a fact in existence, with only this remark that the greatest blessings which India enjoys and which the great masses appreciably feel they enjoy under the benign sway of the British is the proverbial boon of even-handed justice between the tiger and the lamb, but that this public confidence in the lofty aims and serene impartiality of justice and its administration should be shaken in the least degree, simply means disaster to the name and prestige of the British Crown. But the strongest surprise of all surprises in the last Criminal Sessions is the acquittal and total discharge of Dorábji Dhanjibhái Shroff, Assistant Manager of the Oriental Life Insurance Company, who was arraigned before a common jury on charges of criminal breach of trust, misappropriation and embezzlement of a sum of money, which was a mine of wealth, even to the Company itself. The surprise is general in all classes of the community and is this time most keenly felt and most indignantly expressed by our English contemporaries, since happily no European is involved in the case giving rise to unpleasant race-feeling amongst them. Indeed, the morning dailies, and especially the Gazette, have been so refreshingly severe and trenchant in the remarks against the gross and palpable unsoundness of the jury's verdict, that it makes one deplore the absence of the same sympathy with the aggrieved and the distressed in the previous cases, in which the more serious issues involved were those of life and death and in which the failure of justice was as flagrant as in the case against Shroff. However we welcome the unanimity with which the press and the public, European as well as Native, have condemned the deplorable result of the case, whereby after the safe of one of the largest monetary establishments in the city had been emptied one fine morning of its valuable contents amounting nearly to three lákhs, the man who confessed having emptied it and who had by turns thought of "committing suicide," of "pleading guilty before the jury," and finally of "quietly making good the loss" to a large extent is allowed by the jury to go scot-free as a man of honour and integrity. Besides, finding itself robbed of its half a lákh of cash and more than two lákhs worth of Government paper, the Oriental Insurance Company has lost what pecuniary compensation was offered by the accused, in the vain hope of meting out sufficient punishment to the man in charge of the key and who as the officer solely responsible for the safe custody of the money had confessed his "dishonesty" and made "a clean breast of his guilt." The Company's faith, and we may add the faith of the public generally, in the soundness of justice as administered by a jury has received a rude shock; for whatever may be the merits of the case the jury has,—it matters not whether rightly or wrongly,—let loose on society a man condemned by his own mouth as an offender against society. No wonder then that this case, together with two similar cases decided in Cacutta, has caused a panic in the heads of mercantile establishments, conducting large financial transactions through their assistants, and some are reported, to have sharply warned their subordinates of their intention to take the law into their own hands, since the law in effect has denied justice in the grossest and most flagrant cases of heavy defalcations. It devolves on the Chamber of Commerce also to see to the amendment of law and the proper administration of the law from its present state of frightful insecurity bordering on anarchy and chaos. It is not quite correct, we think, to attribute Shroff's acquittal wholely to the state of the law. Nothing could be clearer than the law his Lordship laid down. His summing up, on the whole, was fair and impartial; and although it was not so severe in tone as was expected from a Judge of his stern ethics, it certainly was not in favour of the accused notwithstanding the somewhat unusual incident of praising at the end of the summing up the pleas urged by the counsel for the defence, which might be construed by a lenient jury into a hint favourable to the accused. We feel justified in saying therefore that Shroff's acquittal is not due to any quibbling in legal technicalities. The jury have neither followed the Judge's exposition of the law as made in his summing-up, nor considered the weight of the evidence recorded before them, materially supported as it was by the written confessions of the accused which he had himself volunteered. Indeed, Shroff's letters formed the most important exhibits in the case against him; and the Judge surely did not direct the jury to set them aside. They were, however, most surprisingly set aside by the jury as they set aside both the voluminous evidence and the careful summing-up; and a verdict was returned by a majority in defiance of all that was told them as their duty and contrary to the expectations of all but the accused and his friends. It is said that they were cocksure of an acquittal for reasons which we cannot divine, and that their expectations are simply fulfilled by the verdict. It is alarming enough to think what mischief a jury obstinately perverse, though honest and conscientious, might not do to public interests, and we agree with the Gazette that it is high time now to take away important functions of law from the hands of jurymen who know themselves unfit for the trust reposed in them. This remark has no particular application to Shroff's case. We go further than our contemporary and apply it generally to all jurors, common or special, who have misconducted themselves so recently in more important cases tried by them than the one against Shroff.

13. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 5th October, writes:—When we wrote last week about the strange verdicts in the recent murder cases we little expected that a yet greater surprise was in store for us. A contemporary has truly observed that the last Sessions was one of surprises, and it may be added that each successive surprise surpassed the one which preceded it. The Mhow soldiers' pastime in the cucumber fields, the Zanzibar man Buchanan's original method of obtaining food, the Ahmednagar soldiers' pay-day picnic, and lastly Mr. D. D. Shroff's financial diversions in the Oriental Life Assurance Company, all form a series of events exciting enough to supply the plot of a sensational novel. The public mind is greatly scandalized at the mis-carriage of justice that has occurred, and the feeling is not limited to any one community, but is widespread, European as well as Natives being struck by it. The last case however beats all the rest in point of flagrancy, and the magnitude of the issues involved. In the murder cases there was lamentable loss of life indeed, and a body of circumstantial evidence which would lead most reasonable minds to form a strong opinion about the guilt of the accused, was needlessly discredited, but there was no admission of guilt on the part of the prisoners. In the Shroff case every element for conviction was present, and yet nine wise men of the jury and a most sapient Judge have pronounced him not guilty, a result which does not reflect credit on either the Judge or the jury. From the report in the papers the charge to the jury seems to have been fair and judicial, but the impression of those who were present in Court was that the summing up was strongly in favour of the prisoner. In any case it is obvious, considering the usual practice of the Judge to state clearly his own opinion on the evidence, the Judge had a leaning in favour of acquittal, an inference which gets further support from the fact that he accepted the opinion of the majority, and discharged the accused without ordering a re-trial. If he believed that the prisoner was guilty there was nothing in the case to justify his not ordering a re-trial. The Judge indeed stated the law clearly enough, but the jury took their law from the prisoner's counsel rather than from the Judge. There is one thing however which we believe the Judge omitted to do, and which probably worked more than any thing else on the mind of the jury, that is, to give a direction that the allegations of lax management in the office ought not to weigh at all in favour of the prisoner. The moral effects of the result in Shroff's case are more regrettable than the result itself. It is most dangerous that a feeling should go abroad that a person may make any defalcations of public funds with impunity. If he has money enough to engage skilful counsel he is sure of escaping the clutches of the criminal law. There is no uncertainty in the law itself. The ruling of Mr. Justice Prinsep in the Chartered Bank frauds case is indeed very mischievous, but it was not adopted by Mr. Justice Bayley in the present case, although it seems likely the jury guided itself by it. It might have been better if there had been an opportunity for a Full Bench of our High Court to declare the law clearly and authoritatively. In our view however it is the bungling of the Judge rather than the uncertainty of the law that is responsible for the result.

14. The Kaiser-e-Hind (88), in its issue of the 4th October, writes :—The Criminal Sessions just over has been remarkable as much for the vagaries of the presiding Judge, the Honourable Mr. Bayley, as for the absurd verdicts of the special and common juries which were empanelled to try a batch of murder cases and a case of extensive defalcation. We may say at once that no class of the community has the slightest sympathy with Dorabji Dhanjibhoy Shroff, late Assistant Manager of the Oriental Life Assurance Company. The press, English and vernacular alike, has severely, but most justly, criticised the astonishing verdict of the jury in the face of the tolerably fair summing-up of the Judge. Be it noted that the jury was a common one when the prosecution might have very fairly and reasonably demanded a special jury. That was an unpardonable initial mistake. Even if the prosecution for some occult and not quite intelligible reason, refrained from asking for such a jury, we cannot free the Judge from the reproach of having failed to exercise his indubitable authority and discretion in directing in a case of this character the empanelment of a special jury. Secondly, it is most extraordinary that though the prosecution had full four months before them to collect all material evidence to sustain a robust conviction, they should have allowed the interval to be frittered away in inanities. The Judge, the jury and the prosecution between them have all contributed their fair share of the deplorable want of discretion and judgment in bringing about the escape of the accused with the skin of his teeth. Public morality is shocked. It is not to be wondered at if there is a consternation among bankers and merchants of all classes. Evidently, if the law is in such an uncertain state that it could easily tempt persons in the way of temptation to rob with impunity those who entrust them with their property, the sooner the law is altered the better. But worse than this defalcation case is the Ahmednagar murder case. The acquittal of the accused has been so surprising that even the English press is constrained to criticise the verdict. As a rule our English contemporaries hold the silence of the grave where acquittals after acquittals are made of European offenders charged with culpable homicide amounting or not amounting to murder. They on purpose shut their eyes to the miscarriage of justice where lawyers and even ordinary persons who could tolerably well weigh evidence, direct or circumstantial, see plainly as a pike-staff the guilt of the accused. In such cases special juries, mostly European, cast their spirit of fair play and justice between man and man to the wind, and bring verdicts which are a standing disgrace to the criminal administration of British justice in India. These European juries rarely forget their race prejudices. On the same class of evidence they have been known very readily to bring verdicts of guilty where the accused are Natives. It is only where the white-skinned person is the murderer that they forget themselves and turn traitors to their conscience and to their Queen. But the scandal is aggravated when the jury is aided and abetted by the presiding Judge, whoever he be, whether in Calcutta or Madras or Bombay, so long as he is one of those who has the deepest antipathy to Natives and who fancies every Native giving evidence in a court of law is necessarily a perjurer! Such a Judge, in our humble opinion, is incapable of impartially administering criminal justice in the country and ought not to be tolerated on any Bench. We do not want Judges who are swayed by the intense prejudices and predilections of their race—prejudices for the Natives and predilections for people of their own colour and community. They are apt to twist evidence and misdirect juries. They sum up dead against the prosecution and help the juries in their deliberation to acquit the guilty. All native evidence, however truthful, is set at nought. Because a witness happens to have a black colour he must necessarily be black. As if these Judges are not aware of the horrible crime of prejury in Europe and especially in England. Natives of India have still to show a scandalous case like Piggottism and the crime associated with it. Yet our English Judges are not ashamed to fulmine from the bench and make sweeping generalizations against all Natives! It is a sad feature, and a most disgraceful feature, we repeat, and we repeat with emphasis, in the administration of justice in India, and unless Parliament is called upon to face and stamp it out with the stamp of its righteous condemnation, we do not hope for a reform. Mere vapouring in the press will not do, especially when a rabid Anglo-Indian press, powerful as it is, scruples not to vociferate to the top of its voice and unblushingly misrepresent facts. If there be a spark of public spirit and independence left among our countrymen, they ought to be up and raise a strong agitation against this the darkest and foulest blot in the administration. For the sake of the purity of the administration itself—the administration which is fast losing its former character, its "inherent characteristics" for righteousness, —we devoutly wish the Government of India may take up the matter of its own accord and institute a reform. But if it will not, let us, we repeat, be up and doing. The scandal is growing beyond endurance and once for all it ought to be exposed and the healthy light and criticism of the just and free Parliament of England should be brought to bear upon it. We have a great deal to say on it but for the present we refrain from doing so. But if any case is strong enough to fight about it is this Ahmednagar case, coming as it does on the heels of that notorious O'Hara incident.

15. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 8th October, writes:—The sensation caused by the results of the extraordinary trials held by the last Criminal Sessions of Bombay has been immense, and the manner they have been condemned in by the press—both European and Native,—is one of the healthy signs of the times. It is indeed a misfortune that unlike the proceedings of the other Criminal Courts, those of the High Court in the exercise of its original criminal jurisdiction are not capable of being revised. In our opinion the best course is to see what steps could be taken against a repetition of such results in future. Holding this opinion, we proceed to indicate what safeguards might be adopted with advantage. We will divide our remarks into two parts, 1st, with reference to the jury system, and, 2nd, in connection with the procedure in the High Court. In connection with the jury system, we distinctly say that it is not our intention to advocate its abolition in this country in any way. We are firm in our conviction that it is one of the recognised agencies for the education of the people in the school of political life, and that it must be retained. What we wish to urge is, that the system requires some reform and in our opinion the principal reform will consist in making the selection of jurors from persons capable, on account of their intelligence and education, of discharging satisfactorily the high and onerous functions entrusted to them. In Bombay, the business of preparing the list of jurors has been assigned to the Clerk of the Crown exclusively. Although in Section 313 of Criminal Procedure Code it has been enacted that "regard should be had, in the preparation of the latter list, to the property, character, and education of the persons whose names are entered therein," failure to properly appreciate the evidence so markedly exemplified in the cases under comment go far to show that due care is not taken in preparing the list. Then, again, we do not understand why the Code does not contain a provision, as in the case of the mofussil juries, directing the publication of the list with a view to affording an opportunity to the people to urge objections, if there be any, to the names inserted. In the presidency towns the High Court is empowered to make rules for the preparation of the lists, and such a rule as we suggest may, for aught we know, be existing, but we fail to see why, if it exists, it has not been inserted in the Code itself, as in the case of the mofussil juries. Subject to such rules, it must be borne in mind, the Clerk of the Crown has "full discretion," and no appeal lies from his decision. Hence, the point requires consideration. Another safeguard we wish to suggest is the locking up of the jury as empowered by Section 296 of the Code in order to avoid the remotest suspicion of tampering in trials of importance extending over one day. The Section says:—"The High Court may from time to time make rules as to keeping the jury together during a trial before such Conrt lasting for more than one day, and, subject to such rules, the presiding Judge may order whether, and in what manner, the jurors shall be kept together under the charge of an officer of the Court, or whether they shall be allowed to return to their respective homes." Formerly the jury used to be locked up as provided hereby, but such is not the case now even in important cases. The question of recurrence to the former practice is worthy of consideration by the Judges. We hope the Judges will perceive the utility of following the practice in future, requisite arrangements being of course made for the food and lodging of the jurors. Coming to the procedure, it must be seen whether some amendment is not necessary therein. We do not, in the first place, see why the safeguards existing in the case of the mofussil courts should not be introduced in the High Court. There are appeals from decrees in civil cases on the Original Side, and we do not understand why there should be none in criminal cases as well. The necessity of such appeals has been felt even in England, and we now and then hear of movements to provide a central Criminal Appeal Court there. So far as the Original Criminal jurisdiction of the Bombay High Court is concerned, Sections 24 and 25 of the Letters-Patent lay down that there is to be no appeal from any sentence or order passed by the Judge, but he can reserve a point of law for consideration by his colleagues, or the Advocate-General may certify that "in his judgment, there is an error in the decision of a point or points of law decided by the Court of original criminal jurisdiction, or that a point or points of law which has or have been decided by the said Court should be further considered;" and "the said High Court shall have full power and authority to review the case, or such part of it as may be necessary, and finally determine such point or points of law." We have thus suggested some ways of reform, and we hope Government will soon take the matter in hand seriously. Indeed, it cannot neglect it any longer. It must bear in mind that a satisfactory administration of justice is one of the essentials of efficient Government, and anything that brings it into disrepute gives a violent shock to the general administrative system. The consequences of the results of the cases in question cannot fail to be serious and far-reaching. Provision against similar results in future is indispensable in the interests of the good government of the country, and we hope it will be made before it is too late.

16. The Rdst Goftdr (89), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—Mr. Hart having obtained nine months' furlough, Mr. C. W. Chitty, Barrister-at-Law, is appointed to act in his place as Chief Judge of the Court of Small Causes. It is said that Mr. Hart intends to retire on the termination of his long leave, when Mr. Chitty will be confirmed in his acting appointment, and such is supposed to be the understanding on which the learned young counsel has been brought on the Bench. We have nothing to urge against Mr. Chitty personally. That he is junior to many members of the Bar is perhaps deemed as an additional qualification, and it probably conforms with past practice and precedents also. Mr. Hart, and even Mr. O'Leary, if we mistake not, were comparatively young or unknown when they were first selected for the seat on the Bench, which in importance is only next to that of a High Court Judge; and if ends justify means, then Government may well attempt to justify their first choice of juniors by the ultimate success which they achieve and the satisfaction which they give in course of time. But the objection lies in the principle of such appointments, and on principle we cannot approve of the appointment of Mr. Chitty to act as Chief Judge of the Small Cause Court. We know nothing of this gentleman, but we presume, as he has been for seven years in Bombay and has not made any marked impression at the Bar, that he is one of the large and growing class of decent mediocrities who throng the passages of the High Court. We can see no reason why failure at the Bar should be the passport to employment to one of the chief prizes in the judicial Bench. Government are not in want of men in the ranks of their subordinate judicial service, who have distinguished themselves by their long and successful career and who look to the Chief Judgeship of the Presidency Small Causes Court as a fitting reward for their valuable and meritorious services. Is it right, then, to supersede so many deserving servants of the State by the nomination of young barristers newly arrived in India? Another question of equal importance is whether the office of Chief Judge of the Court of Small Causes is, and if so, should be, exclusively reserved for English barristers, however junior they may be, to abler and more experienced Native members of the profession? We are aware that the law prescribes that the Chief Judge should be a barrister, but are there no barristers already in the Government service and are none of them capable by reason of long service and tried capacity to undertake the duties of the Chief Judge? Again, there are many in the ranks of the judicial service who, though not dinner barristers, are as old and distinguished pleaders and graduates, conspicuous for their knowledge of law, and it would be a great hardship to stop their deserved promotion for the technical difficulty of their not being barristers passed in England. There are none so blind as those who will not see, and Government is obviously shutting its eyes and ignoring the claims of men who have for long years devoted themselves to its service. The service has a right to it, and if Government does not concede that right it acts unrighteously and in a way which, among private persons, would be called by a very ugly name. The Chief Judge must be a barrister; but what is a barrister? The word "pleader" includes a barrister, and why that special class of pleaders called barristers should have the exclusive right to this appointment it is difficult to see. Doubtless when the Act was passed pleaders had not attained to their present position; but the fact is that the pleader is now fully equal to the barrister, and an experienced pleader with a successful practice in the Bar is superior to a briefless barrister. It is true, therefore, that a restriction which had a meaning when it was adopted should be removed and that the pleader should be equally eligible for the appointment. Even in Sir James Stephens' time the work of the Subordinate Judge was pronounced to be better than the work of the District Judge, although the latter was the highly-cultured Civilian; the average barrister is certainly not better than the average Civilian, and it follows that the Subordinate Judge can do his work better than either. Why Government should select a barrister for a responsible office can easily be understood, although the necessity for it might be difficult to be perceived. But these considerations, forcible as they are, must give way to the paramount obligation on Government to reward its own officers with the prizes which their ability, integrity and patient duty demand. The public demand good men and experienced men, and those qualities cannot be taken upon trust. They must be proved in the lower ranks, and it is these considerations which induced the Commission to lay down the rule that if a barrister is to be appointed he should enter the service in the lower grades, but if it were necessary to appoint him to a high office he should be not only a barrister but a distinguished barrister, and not only that, but one fully versed in the vernacular and able to understand the witnesses without the help of an interpreter. If the law allows this injustice let the law be amended. At any rate, the question deserves a full and fair discussion; and Mr. Chitty's acting appointment creates a suitable occasion for it. The Bombay Presidency Association had only lately raised these objections with great ability; but they were considered to be too late, as the acting appointment which was then objected to had not only been made but had run out its course. Now that an appointment on these objectionable lines is again made acting for a period of nine months with the prospect of its being made permanent thereafter, the Presidency Association has ample opportunity to agitate again till the objections are removed to the satisfaction of the public.

A hand-bill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society, and the offence it has given to the Hindu society.

17. The Gujaráti (84), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—The Hindu is proverbially tolerant and submissive, but even his toleration and submissiveness have their limits. Some missionaries, especially Native Christian converts, exceed legitimate bounds in criticising the tenets and beliefs of the Hindu community in their publications as well as in their proselyting harangues delivered to ignorant multitudes on public roads. They are of course necessarily very careful in their strictures on Mahomedanism as its followers know very well how to silence the least aggressive critics of their cherished religious principles. Even our rulers have a wholesome fear of our Mahomedan countrymen, as was best evidenced some time ago by the abandonment of the idea of representing Mahomed on the English stage. The bare mention of the idea evoked protests from all quarters, English as well as Mahomedan. The Hindu is, however, gentle and any one who has a desire to have a fling at him or his institutions, social or religious, thinks that he is at liberty to indulge in his agreeable pastime without let or hindrance. But he too is liable to be roused and this is what has happened since the publication of a leaflet B. P., which, it it said, stands for the Rev. Mr. Baba Padmanji, under the auspices of the Bombay Tract and Book Society, casting aspersions against the reputation of Krishna and chastity of Subhadra, his sister. Twenty thousand copies have been printed for distribution and the strictures have produced no small indignation in the Hindu community and especially among the followers of Krishna. The comments have reference to the observance of the Janmáshtami and Gokulashtami. The festival is one of the most important and sacred days of the Hindus, and any comments on the moral character of the central figures in it would, it is natural to believe, be conceived in a spirit of toleration and based on adequate knowledge. We need hardly tell Christian critics of Hinduism what endless field for effective criticism is supplied by the doctrine of the "Imaculate conception of Jesus Christ." But they will, we believe, readily admit that no one has a right to be unnecessarily offensive in the discussion of this remarkable Christian dogma. We know that in this age of critics, no tenet, belief, superstition or institution, however cherished or revered, can claim to be outside the pale of criticism. In a country like India, where all the religious of the world come into collision with each other, each claiming for itself direct divine authority, even the most religiously devoted will be constrained to pause for a moment in their most thoughtful intervals before condemning everything foreign to their cherished beliefs and institutions. This circumstance ought to lead to sober thought and criticism and it is a pity some of our missionary friends should forget themselves so completely as to enrage the Hindu community by their unjustifiably offensive strictures. Those who can see the signs of the times will have perceived by this time that Christianity has no special attraction for the people of this country, whether they be Hindus, Pársis or Mahomedans, and whatever its triumphs with the lowest classes whose lot missionary bodies are endeavouring to improve by their laudable exertions, its prospects of general acceptance by the educated may be said to be as remote as ever, and we fail to see the wisdom of a course which is calculated to convert the toleration of the ignorant and illiterate into active hostility. We are not sure if the least harm would come out of the childish ravings of papers like the Bangabási, but we must warn Government in time that some of the leaflets and pamphlets issued by thoughtless enthusiasts might lead to consequences which all sensible people will be sure to deplore. [The Gujarát Mitra (85), in its issue of the same date, expresses similar sentiments.]

18. The Kesari (43), in its issue of the 6th October, says that no one has legal or moral right to revile another's religion and that it is to be regretted that Christians who are educated and consider themselves to have reached the height of civilisation should be guilty of this offence, and exhorts the leaders of Hindu society to discharge their duty of taking legal steps against the person who has needlessly reviled Hinduism.

19. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 8th October, writes:—A gratuitous leaflet published some time ago by the Bombay Tract Society, and rather widely scattered, has created no little excitement among our orthodox Hindu friends. The cause of the excitement is that in this tract mention is made of a custom in Orissa at a certain festival of the worshippers of Krishna dragging his image out of the temple with expressions of contempt for having committed a nameless crime. The story of this particular revolting crime is not found in the Puráns or other books in this part of India, and hence is not known here. Tracts that contain almost equally revolting stories known in this part of the country excite no comment; hence we gather that it is the novelty of the story that has so excited Krishna's votaries. The tract itself is written in no offensive spirit. We cannot say that we are in favour of tracts that stir up bad feeling. As a rule, tracts that contain the simple gospel truth are those that are wanted, but a tract showing the impossibility of Krishna being a proper object of worship, proved from the Hindu scriptures, has its use, and is not to be condemned wholesale. Just such exposures of the reputed lives of the gods and so-called incarnations have, we believe, led many away from idolatry. The giving up of idolatry is however but a step in the right direction, and much more is required, and it is the simple gospel story written or spoken in the spirit of love and yearning that can turn men to the Christian life. It stirs up no evil feeling or hatred, and attracts by the power of its own beauty and truth.

20. The Jagan Mitra (39), in its issue of the 5th October, says that lunatics being at liberty to wander about in the town of Ratnágiri do much mischief and that therefore they should all be segregated in the local lunatic asylum and there taken care of.

Segregation of wandering lunatics at Ratnágiri recommended.

Part II.—Education.

21. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 4th October, writes:—The valuable and varied correspondence that the new proposals to remodel the Matriculation examination has given rise to fully justifies the wisdom of those who so timely asked for and gained a breathing time before saying 'yes' or 'no'. It has been all along taken for granted that no college admits a student within its sacred precincts, who has not matriculated in a classical language. Is there full warrant for this sweeping assertion? Again, even supposing that the rule is strictly adhered to in all colleges, what warrant have at least some of them to adopt it? One may understand why the Arts colleges, the further course making a knowledge of a classical language necessary, might insist upon the rule. But what have the Medical, the Engineering, the Technical, or the Veterinary College to gain by narrowing their choice in this manner? We are willing to concede that a study of Latin may facilitate a student's progress in the science of Medicine. But what if a student takes Sanskrit, German, or Hebrew? As regards other colleges, the reason why they should close their doors against those who have passed in the vernaculars is absolutely nil, except it be their sweet, wayward will. The Syndics, again, who took part in the recent debate in the Senate, Remarks in connection with the proposals to remodel the Matriculation course of the Bombay University.

assured the Senate that some recognition will have to be given to the vernaculars in a University that is not ashamed to call itself Indian. One of them has since been good enough to announce he has been always in favour of their encouragement within "certain strictly defined limits"—limits, by the bye, whose strict definition he has not yet favoured the public with. Is it intended to begin that interesting operation by banishing the vernaculars even from the Entrance Examination? That will be a very auspicious beginning, indeed. You see, then, this tall talk of recognising the vernaculars and thus conceding a little to their enthusiastic and cool-headed advocates practically means nothing. It is a veritable shadow, and, one may say, a temptingly treacherous one.

Summer vacation in vernacular schools in Gujarát approved.

22. The Gujarátí (84), in its issue of the 4th October, is glad to learn that steps are being gradually taken in Gujarát to redress some of the long-standing grievances of primary schools by providing benches for the students, increasing the salaries of teachers, &c., and says that by closing the schools during the month of May, which course was recommended by Mr. Giles, Educational Inspector, N. D., and approved of by the Director of Public Instruction, much benefit will accrue both to the pupils and the teachers.

Part III.—Native States.

Increase of the amount of pension assigned to the deposed Mahárája Shur Chander of Manipur recommended.

23. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 8th October, says that if it is correctly informed that the deposed Mahárája Shur Chander of Manipur has been assigned a pension of Rs. 250 a month the pensioner is really to be pitied, and hopes that as he was obliged to leave his capital and go to Calcutta on account of the meddlesomeness of some Political officers, and since he has been all along on terms of perfect loyalty with the British Government, the latter will reconsider the amount of pension and show more liberality in fixing it.

Poll-tax levied by the Chief of Dánta in the Mahi Kántha Agency and a request to His Excellency Lord Harris in the matter.

24. Prajámat (118), in its issue of the 3rd October, observes:—The poll-tax levied by the Chief of Dánta, in the Mahi Kántha Agency, on the pilgrim visitors to the Ambáji fair is not only oppressive but also illegal, because the temple is not the Chief's private property but is maintained by the pilgrims. The poll-tax levied in the times of Mahomedans was much lighter in its incidence as it fell only upon such persons as had reached the age of 18 years, a portion of which, besides, went for their own benefit; but the tax now imposed by the Chief of Dánta falls even upon a child of one day and the pilgrims do not derive any benefit at all therefrom, and, moreover, a separate tax is imposed on account of the chokí, without any regard being paid to the convenience and comfort of those who pay it. The condition of the roads is miserable, the sanitation of the place is bad, and much inconvenience is caused to the public in the matter of obtaining passes for admission to the temple. It is therefore very strange that the British Government which did not hesitate to interfere in the administration of Porbandar and Nándod on the ground that they were not properly managed, does not yet step in, in this instance, for the protection of its own subjects who visit the place. We call His Excellency Lord Harris' attention to this, and request him to get the poll-tax reduced to about 3 annas and to entrust its collection and application to the Political Agent of Mahi Kántha.

1. The Vaidarbha (2), in its issue of the 3rd October, writes :—Is Chikaldah to be made the head-quarters of Berar? But whether it is made so or not, it sees more of the head of the provincial administration than the city which rejoices in the title of head-quarters. It has, it must be admitted, a climate the coolest and most refreshing in Berár; the scenery is the best in the province, and there is plenty of excellent game to be had there. But it is situated in a far off corner of the province, more than 60 miles away from the nearest railway station, amidst hills and dales inhabited more by tigers and bears than by men. It is no doubt agreeable as a summer resort, that is, for those fortunate few who can secure one of the few houses there. But as a place from where to administer a department, much less a number of departments, it is thoroughly unsuitable. We cannot understand the significance of the step which, we are informed, is being taken to construct quarters, temporary they are called, for the office of the Director of Land Records and Agriculture. Is it on the lucus a non lucendo principle, or with a grim sense of humour and to illustrate as it were the general want of harmony which pervades this Earth of ours, that the Director of Agriculture is to be kept far off from all the operations of agriculture? It will not be out of place to enquire what was the object with which the department of Land Record and Agriculture was created. One would think that that was a department which could not well be administered from the seclusion of our provincial Olympus. It has, we conceive, to see, know and study the land and the men who cultivate that land. It has to find out facts connected with the state of agriculture as much by mixing up with the people as by calling upon the village patwaris to submit statements. The revision survey operations with which we are threatened will be conducted by it. It stands therefore under every necessity of knowing the sentiments and opinions of the people. How will these things be secured in a wretched hamlet thirty miles removed from the nearest village of any decent dimensions, perched on the top of a mountain and surrounded by reserved forests in all directions. Officers exercising judicial functions may and in a way should live isolated from the people. The position and duties of the Revenue officers, however, require them to have a thorough knowledge of the condition of the people. These are trite observations. And yet it is the most evident truths which are often disregarded in practice. We cannot understand how this arrangement could have received the sanction of the Resident. What purpose is served by having these temporary offices at Chikaldah?

Holding of Departmental Examinations twice a year recommended.

2. A correspondent of the Vaidarbha (2), in its issue of the 3rd October, requests that the Departmental Examinations of the Lower and Higher Standards in Berár may be held every six months instead of every twelve months in order that candidates plucked in one or two subjects may not have to wait long.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

The present political situation of England and India.

1. The Gujardt Mitra (86), in its issue of the 11th October, after briefly describing the present political situation of England and several other countries of Europe, observes:—As it is pretty certain that Russia will sooner or later invade India, it is desirable that there should be no internal dissensions in Europe so that sufficient attention may be paid to strengthening the position of England in India, and in this direction she has already begun to work. The Native Princes are ready and willing to help the British in times of emergency, and the Natives themselves would do so but for the Arms Act. It was really wrong of the British to have in a moment of apprehension after the Indian mutiny deprived the Natives of the use of arms without a license, because it is not wise for rulers to look with suspicion on the ruled and to deny them the free use of arms as if they were enemies and thereby to displease them. But it is not yet too late to rectify this mistake; for if Government repeal the Arms Act they will gratify those Natives who are warlike and who will sacrifice their lives for the sake of their rulers. Government need not be afraid of the Indian people; for the latter are firmly of opinion that there is at present no Native Chief able enough to rule over the whole of India and that it is impossible for them to get kind and benign rulers like the English. If England strengthened her position in this way her enemies would see their weakness and might even give up the idea of invading India. [The Satyavakta (122), in its issue of the 10th October, observes:—The Russians seem to have enlisted the sympathy of several European States and of the States on the Indian frontiers on their side, and this has caused some alarm in India. It is, therefore, urgently necessary for the English to defend themselves and the Indian people from the impending Russian invasion and to preserve their honour and prestige even at a great sacrifice.]

The consequences of a Russian conquest of India anticipated by the Pioneer and remarks thereon.

2. The Dnyan Prakash (13), in its issue of the 12th October, says:—The Pioneer speculates on the fate of the Anglo-Indians in the event of the Russians conquering India as follows:—"The English people would have to put up with the same difficulties which the Jews are now experiencing at the hands of the Czar. Not only would the English officers be driven from the posts they now hold, but English trade would be annihilated by a prohibitive tariff; and the English would sink from their present proud position as members of a ruling race to that of oppressed subjects, and the capital invested by them in industrial enterprises like the indigo plantations would be lost." Even though it be supposed that all this is possible, yet it is a distant contingency. The Pioneer's advice to the English to keep the Indian subjects pleased is, however, sound. It recommends that particularly those Indian races from which the Indian soldiery are drawn should be well treated. In this we differ from the Pioneer, for the loyalty of the common people alone saved the British Indian rule in 1857. Some few officers disregard this fact, but they will see their mistake ultimately. We very frankly say that no one in India wishes for the advent of the Russians, for if it is necessary that we must have foreign rule we would rather be governed by those who are one of the best nations of the civilised world and with whose rule we have been acquainted for a long time. If, however, the minds of the common people are once poisoned against the English rule, they will naturally wish for a new rule and our rulers will do well to take a hint and keep this contingency at as long a distance as possible.

Rumours about Russian designs in Central Asia and their causes.

3. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 11th October, writes:—Whatever room there may be for the alarming rumours about Russian designs in Central Asia, there is no mistaking the fact that these rumours have much to do with the internal policy of governing the Indian Empire. These rumours rise when administrative measures are declaredly unpopular and they subside when the relations between the rulers and the ruled are most friendly. If Government can be convinced of this, we have little doubt they will improve their method of government, and not only make a Russian invasion impossible, but will effectually eradicate all talk about it in the bazars.

The miserable condition of the Indian people and the necessity for repealing the Arms Act.

4. The Nagar Samachár (53), in its issue of the 10th October, says:—One of the causes of our miserable condition is that we are without arms, and that without them we cannot guard our person and property. We have become simply timid and we cannot handle arms without fear, while those who are allowed to carry them always appear to be brave and spirited. The difference between men who are allowed to carry arms and those who are not, can be very well seen by comparing a British Indian subject with a Nizám's subject. Some say that murders will increase if people are allowed to carry arms, but there is not much meaning in this argument, for since the enactment of the Arms Act the number of murders in the country has not decreased. If all are not allowed to carry arms Government should at least allow those to whom they are absolutely necessary—we mean, the villagers or such other people as are obliged to defend themselves from wild animals. We are told that some people having applied to a Collector for permission to carry arms in self-defence from the ravages of wild pigs, the Collector, instead of giving them the permission asked for, advised them to dig a big hole in the ground and to drive the pigs into it and so to kill them. If the Government is afraid of attempts on our part to subvert it there is no foundation whatever for this apprehension. Suppose that the Government is defeated in a fight and its whole army is lost, who would then fill up the ranks? Government would in these circumstances see the necessity of allowing the people to carry arms and of giving them a military training. If, however, we were well trained and knew how to carry and use arms, we would assist our rulers to our utmost and fight for them against their enemies. When we had Native rule we had all these blessings, and how was it then that the English people conquered us? The cause is that at that time there was no peace and no even-handed administration of justice, the ruling class having all the advantages to itself. Under the present Government, however, all the inequalities are done away with, and as every one wishes for the continuance of the present rule it is in the interests of the Government to give us a military training and to permit us to carry arms. As we hear that Russia is coming nearer and nearer to India every day, Government would benefit itself by favourably listening to this prayer of ours.

The duty of the Indian people to Government.

5. The Sudhákar (69), in its issue of the 13th October, traces the cause of the English supremacy to their love for their countrymen, and says that the Hindus have lost their rule by reason of the absence of this most important characteristic; for, says the paper, when our rulers came here first they did so simply as merchants, but when they saw that the Hindus had no bond of union and would fight with each other even for trivial matters they took advantage of this state of things, kept a Native army, and with its aid became supreme here. If we read the history of the English people we shall find very few instances of treachery, but, on the contrary, we shall see that on all occasions they are ready by fair or foul means to keep and increase the prestige of their country. Our rulers say that if we are able to govern ourselves they will hand over the government to us and go to England. We must try to assist them in the fulfilment of this their good intention and not trouble them. Our present duty is simply to lay before Her Imperial Majesty our grievances with a view to have them remedied; or we need not go to Her Imperial Majesty even, the British Parliament being able to do away with all the grievances which are caused by defects in the laws or by maladministration.

The weakness of the people of India.

6. In an article headed "India has no hope," the Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 12th October, says:—A competition in trade is going on in Siam between the French, the English, the Danes, and others, and it is the general opinion that those who will be the foremost in trade will in the end become the rulers of the country. While thinking over this matter, the question, which occurs to us, is whether those Indians who are trading there will ever get an opportunity of rising into eminence. The whole English nation was ultimately benefited by the English Government's taking up the cause of English merchants in Burmah when they were ill-treated by the latter Government. Do we stand a chance of being ever similarly benefited? If the Indians in Siam are ill-treated, will the Government of India sympathise with them? And if they do, will it be beneficial to the people of India? Certainly not. It is England which will be benefited. The fact is that we, the people of India, have reached such a condition that in spite of all opportunities we shall never be benefited in the least. In one sense it may be said that the existence of our nation is of no consequence. There are as many well-constructed public roads on the face of the earth as are needed, but we have no legs to use them. Such a state of things is most deplorable. The Danes, the French and the English are aspiring to become some day or other the rulers of Siam, but have we any ground to entertain that aspiration? Not only have we no hope of becoming the rulers of our own country, but we have no position even in a country which is open to be ruled by any powerful people. The chief cause of this is that we have no protector, no one to support us, and our rulers are not solicitous about our welfare. How to change this state of things is a very difficult question. We have placed before our readers these thoughts, which incidentally arose in our mind, simply to awaken them.

Remarks on the practice of demanding honorary service in Legislative Councils and municipal institutions in India.

7. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 11th October, writes:—We do not know on what principle the practice of demanding, and, what is more surprising, of granting honorary service from month to month and year to year has grown in our Legislative Councils, and latterly in our municipal institutions, except it be on the principle of the poverty of the country. But apart from the reasonableness or otherwise of that principle, we do not see it logically carried out. We wish, partial as we are in the interests of our own country, it had been generally adopted in cases where it involved no hardship. But so far is that principle from being put into practice, at least as regards the heaven-born services, that we have been complaining, and justly complaining, of the too high scale of salaries that prevails in this country, without avail. If the additional members of Legislative Councils and even chairmen of municipalities, whose duties are light or casual, can be justly asked to offer their services gratis, we know of no earthly reason why our Governors, Viceroys, and Commanders-in-Chief may not be asked to forego the superfluity of extravagant salaries. But, so far as we know, history does not record a single instance of any of these high and well-to-do dignitaries having ever volunteered their valuable services gratis to this poor country. Of course, as we have hinted above, we have little faith in the justice of this principle, which is against the natural tendencies of human nature. Honorary service cannot, in the long run, be very effective service, and the laxity of administration and supervision that is sometimes visible in our municipal and other local institutions is, we believe, mainly due to the honorary character of the service.

Comments on the way in which public honours are alleged to be conferred.

8. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 11th October, writes:—Mr. Lyall, Chief Secretary to the Government of India, communicates to the Bombay Government that the Imperial Government views with disfavour the conferring of ex-officio titles of all kinds and degrees, as they detract from the value of similar titles, which are from time to time conferred for good services on meritorious servants. The reasoning is sound and the Supreme Government may be commended for its decision. But may we ask it to go a step further and boldly wipe off by one stroke of the pen all manners of orders and decorations from the Grand Commandership of the Star of India down to the petty Shamsul-ulmaship and Mahámahopádhyáyaship? India is growing heartily sick of these baubles. Nay more. The Government has actually demoralised the people and created a kind of spurious "public spirit"—a spirit which, if anything, is intensely selfish and degrading. It has also created jealousies and bickerings. And there is not the slightest doubt that it makes a certain class of citizens absolutely slavish to the bureaucracy. In brief, it is notorious that titles and decorations now-a-days are reserved for those who would truckle to Government. Even journalists, the last persons who should hanker after C.I.E.'s and other utterly worthless baubles, do not escape the contagion.

Moreover, there is now-a-days no justice in the distribution of public honours. Sometimes there is a regular newspaper controversy going on because a certain engineer or doctor is left out in the cold and because a certain other engineer or doctor gets himself titled by working the oracle. In the end, Government succumbs to the cry of the disappointed by silencing him with a title at the time of the next birthday or new year day Gazette. Somebody else makes a growl and nobbles the press to sing his praises. This thing is eternally going on. A decoration or a distinction, if it is to be given at all, must be such as may be eagerly coveted. When it is conferred judiciously and sparingly, it is certain to be valued.

Approval of the Government resolution regarding the titles of Ráo Sáheb and Ráo Bahádur hitherto conferred on the members of municipal and local boards.

9. The Shri Shivdji (67), in its issue of the 13th October, says:—People used to try hard to become members of a municipality or of a local board long before the title of Ráo Sáheb was conferred on such members. Now that this empty title is about to be taken away we do not know why people should murmur. If the present members of a municipality or of a local board try to become members of such public institutions only for the titles, which the office carries with it, we do not want such title-loving members. We want to have such men alone in our public institutions, as would, without any inducement, work hard for the public good. We thank the Government for this resolution about the titles, as it will take away from our municipalities and local boards title-loving members. Those who really wish to serve their fellowmen should serve them without these empty titles as before.

Disapproval of the proposal to do away with these titles.

10. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 11th October, says:—If we read carefully the long correspondence published in the Gazette of India on the subject of titles, we shall very easily see that the Supreme Government has had very little to do in doing away with the title of Ráo Sáheb hitherto borne by the municipal and local board members. The Bombay Government has taken the chief part in this matter and the reasons given by that Government are worthy of study. They betray nothing but the narrow-mindedness of the local Government in reducing the dignity of the members from a Ráo Sáhebship to a mere A'zamship. The local Government says that the titles of Ráo Sáheb and Ráo Bahádur are always bestowed upon old servants for their valuable services, and that these officers are degraded when these titles are bestowed upon mere municipal members. This way of reasoning does not imply much generosity on the part of our local Government. In this way a member of a municipality or a local board loses his status and is esteemed far below a paid Mámlatdár officially titled Ráo Sáheb. We think that both the Local and the Supreme Governments have erred in this matter. Both these officers are engaged in doing public offices, but the one is paid and the other is unpaid, doing his work only for public weal. In these days it would be thought very absurd if one lowered a person working for public good without taking remuneration and raised another who did his duty for pay. We do not insist that members of local and municipal boards should be called Ráo Sáhebs and Ráo Bahádurs: nor do the members themselves care much for these titles, for they know very well the value of empty titles; but they will feel much if they are considered inferior to the paid servants. The Bombay Government is from the beginning opposed to the local self-government scheme of Lord Ripon, and this is an additional proof of the fact. We request the members of the local boards not to lose courage because the Government treat them in this fashion, for, if they persevere in doing the work undertaken by them, the Government in Heaven will surely reward them for their good deeds.

Praises bestowed upon their Excellencies Lord Lansdowne and Lord Harris by Mr. M. M. Bhávnagari at a dinner in London disapproved.

11. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 11th October, observes:—It is certainly disappointing to see that Mr. Mancherji M. Bhávnagari, in proposing the toasts of their Excellencies Lord Lansdowne and Lord Harris at a dinner given on the Párai new year's day in London, showered undue praises on their Lordships, and we cannot pass over the incident in silence as Mr. Bhávnagari tried to pose as the general representative of the public, particularly of the Pársi community. The régime of Lord Lansdowne has been full of disappointments, as can be seen from the Kashmere and Manipur affairs, his frontier policy and the extravagant military expenses. Moreover, the oppressive salt-tax and other taxes imposed by Lord Dufferin have not been reduced; nor have the various complaints of the Indian National Congress been attended to by his Government. Mr. Bhávnagari seems to have been equally mistaken in praising Lord Harris; for, how can his administration be said to be successful when he has disregarded public opinion under the objectionable advice of his Councillors, as will be seen from his replies to the memorials on ábkári administration by the Anglo-Indian Temperance Association and on the Rájábái Tower tragedy, from the attitude of his Government towards the Bombay Municipal Corporation, and from his way of filling up responsible posts? [The Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 13th October, expresses similar sentiments.]

The approaching tour of His Excellency Lord Harris to Ahmednagar, Sholápur and Sind, and suggestions to His Excellency in connection with it.

12. In alluding to the approaching visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to Ahmednagar, Sholápur and Sind, the Jám-e Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 17th October, observes:—The object of gubernatorial tours is no doubt very laudable, but it is seldom accomplished, because in their tours our rulers hardly get an opportunity of mixing with the ordinary people in order to know their complaints and grievances. With a view to making their tours thoroughly beneficial they ought to visit large and small places without giving previous intimation of so doing, and see the rich and poor inhabitants thereof and personally acquaint themselves with the condition of the people. If Lord Harris makes his approaching tour on these lines, it will be warmly welcomed and will leave an everlasting impression on the people.

A recommendation to the Bombay Government to appoint a Mahomedan gentleman as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year.

13. A Mahomedan correspondent of the Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 11th October, observes that since the institution of the shrievalty in the year 1820 Mr. Rahimtula Mahomed Sayani has been the only Mahomedan Sheriff appointed by the Government of Sir James Fergusson in 1885, and that now that the Mahomedan community has much advanced it deserves the bestowal of this honour on some of its other members, and requests His Excellency Lord Harris to recognise its claims for the office next year.

Rumoured abolition of the cantonment at Surat disapproved.

14. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 11th October, says that a rumour is current at Surat that Government are thinking of transferring the local military force and substituting for it an armed police force, and requests the inhabitants to memorialise Government against this change, if the rumour be true, as it will not be a step in the right direction in the interests of the city, and as it had been abandoned on former occasions on the representation of the different Collectors.

Mr. W. E. Hart, Chief Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, praised.

15. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 11th October, writes:—By the next mail Mr. W. E. Hart, the Chief Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, goes on nine months' furlough, and as he has already earned his pension he may not very likely return to his post. We therefore think it necessary to say a few words with regard to the working of the Court during the last 12 years during which he has presided over it. During this period the monetary jurisdiction of the Court has doubled and several important changes have been made in the procedure and practice of the Court. While the Calcutta Small Causes Court has given reason for dissatisfaction to the suitors and the mercantile community of that place, the Bombay Court headed by its able and versatile Chief Judge has shown that it is quite capable of coping with the increasing number of suits and the varied and complicated questions of law and procedure which must necessarily arise with the extension of its jurisdiction. The Bombay Small Causes Court has been singularly fortunate in possessing as its Chief Judge a gentleman of great erudition and varied talents quick perception and ready intellect,—one who has always shown a robust grasp of facts and niceties of law. He has been known for sterling common sense —a thing that is very uncommon indeed,—judicial patience and high-mindedness, which together with courtesy and kindliness of disposition have combined to give a dignity and decorum to all the proceedings in his Court. We have always looked upon the appointment of the Chief Judge of the Small Causes Court as second in importance only to that of a High Court Judge. Mr. Hart's judgments have always commanded the confidence and respect of the mercantile community and of the Chamber of Commerce, and the expedition with which he has disposed of the heavy number of cases and the satisfactory working of his Court have been very favourably dealt with by the High Court and the Chamber of Commerce, as shown by their respective protests against the threatened reduction of its pecuniary jurisdiction. It will be a matter of regret to the public and to the mercantile community to know that Mr. Hart will not in all probability revert to the bench. But whether he reverts to the bench or rejoins the bar, the loss to the one will be a gain to the other. [The Bombay Samáchár (97), in its issue of the 16th October, expresses similar sentiments.]

Mr. Hosking, Judge of the Sadar Court in Sind, praised.

16. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 7th October, writes :—Mr. Hosking, Judge of the Sind Sadar Court, delivered over charge of his duties yesterday. He goes on 2½ months' privilege leave. During the short time that he has been on the bench both in the District Court and Sadar Court he has given great satisfaction to the public. His judgments are marked by great ability and strong common sense. His courtesy and patience on the bench have been exemplary. We shall be glad to welcome him back after he has enjoyed his well-earned rest. Sind cannot afford to lose so conscientious a Judge.

Alleged wrongful acquittal of Europeans accused of murdering Natives and its effect.

17. The Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 11th October, writes :—The acquittal of Europeans when tried on a charge of murdering a Native, in the face of evidence which would be adjudged quite sufficient to hang a Native, is deplorable for various reasons. That there has been a miscarriage of justice in an individual case, and that a particular murder has been allowed to go unavenged, is by no means the most serious result of such acquittal. It is most deplorable because of the wide-reaching effects of each instance in which there has been a gross and palpable failure of justice. It shakes the faith of the people in the professions of even justice between members of the ruling race and the subject races. It embitters the feeling, sharpens and accentuates the difference between Europeans and Natives, and impairs one of the most potent moral forces on which rests the British rule in India, with, of course, 70,000 bayonets to strengthen and support it. On the other hand, such cases of acquittal create among the lower classes of the white population in India a perfect irreverence and contempt for the life of the Indian, which must seriously weaken their moral fibre. It must create in them an imperfect, if not perverted, sense of their moral responsibility, in their general relations with Natives. Low and ignorant Europeans are mostly to be found among the soldiers. If their bayonets constitute the strength of the State, the unavenged murders of Natives by some of them must go to make it weak. We burn with grief and indignation at a wrongful acquittal of a European, because we wish for the strength and stability of the British rule for the sake of India, since we fully appreciate the blessings of the rule. It is for this reason that we deplore the palpably unjust acquittals pronounced by British juries when the offender is one of their own countrymen. It is seen from experience that in such cases there is not much to choose between a common and a special jury.

Comments on the remarks recently made by the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley about Native evidence.

18. A correspondent, writing to the Sudhárak (19) in its issue of the 12th October, writes :—There is something seriously wrong about the special jurymen's ideas about Native evidence and the weight to be attached to it in cases of murder in which an Englishman or an European is the accused. Such cases are becoming painfully frequent, and unless Government take early steps to prevent their alarmingly frequent occurrence, the Native's idea of security of his person will be thoroughly undermined and the results will be morally and politically disastrous. We never knew Mr. Justice Bayley to be very careful about his judicial utterances, and if what he is reported to have said about Native veracity and reliability is at all true, Mr. J.'s "monumental" mendacity of Natives is an idea which has spread itself very widely in the Anglo-Indian mind. We wonder what his brother Justices think about it. Or do they all, the Chief Justice included, join him in his disagreeable estimate of Native character for truthfulness? The Ahmednagar murder case is one which surely ought to have the pointed attention of the public, both Indian and English, drawn to it. An English jury acquits a murdering soldier and a common jury acquits Shroff. The accused in both cases are let loose upon the world as pure as driven snow, or, in other words, as chaste as Mr. Crawford was finally found to be. And yet, a good and sensible Sessions Judge in our presidency recommends the withdrawal of the jury system from districts like Belgaum. If it is to be withdrawn, let it be withdrawn from all alike, Natives and Europeans, and no one will then be surprised at such shocking verdicts. The paths of justice will be smooth and well-oiled and Judges may then skate or ride roughshod as they please.

Alleged necessity for revising the lists of jurors in Karáchi.

19. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 10th October, writes:—Public opinion in Bombay is very strong as regards the constitution of the jury lists, and the press deems a revision necessary so as to secure more intelligent and better educated men in future to sit in trial over their own fellowmen. But this question of the reform of jury lists in Bombay is equally appropriate in Karáchi. Dissatisfaction has been openly and frequently expressed by some of our distinguished men, quite capable of forming an accurate opinion regarding the jurors that are at times empannelled at the sessions. Young men who have perhaps just left school, without any knowledge of the world, possessing but the bare rudiments of education which just enables them to "drive the quill," are called upon to decide on matters of life and death, to pronounce an opinion on complicated cases at times involving the life of their fellow-beings. Without much mental culture they are asked to decide the pros and cons of questions submitted to them and weigh the conflicting evidence of witnesses and show sufficient acumen to separate the chaff from the wheat. This, it is hardly necessary to say, becomes a very difficult matter for many of our juvenile jurors, and it is to be regretted that to their tender mercies the lives of many men are left. Of course it is not to be denied that there are the necessary safeguards against any perverse or irrational verdict. But yet there are many advantages to be derived from a body of rational and intelligent jurymen. It would certainly be worth while to revise our jury lists. There are some who deserve to be eliminated by reason of their incompetence for such responsible duties.

A complaint about the difficulty of access to the District Judge's Court at Belgaum.

20. A correspondent of the Vijay (76), in its issue of the 9th October, complains about the difficulty of access to the District Judge's Court at Belgaum. He says that he wanted to go to hear an important case argued by a celebrated barrister, but was refused admission on the plea that permission from the Názir was required, and requests the editor to carry this matter to the ears of the Judge, so that in future no permission from the Názir may be necessary for admission into the Court.

A complaint against the working of the Honorary Magistrate's Court at Surat.

21. The Gujarát Darpan (87), in its issue of the 13th October, writes:—If there is a judicial humbug, it is the Honorary Magistrate's Court at Surat. There are several gentlemen appointed to serve as Honorary Magistrates here. Their business is in turn to fine and intimidate people for committing a nuisance or putting an obstruction, or building or repairing a house without notice, or for making encroachments on or projections over municipal land. These municipal cases are simple enough to decide, and the honorary servants of the public have made them still simpler. This is the procedure. A daroga or ward-inspector reports to the municipal secretary any breaches of municipal rules that may have occurred. The managing committee gives its sanction to prosecuting the persons guilty of the breaches. The daroga appears before the Honorary Magistrate who is holding his Court in the Municipal Hall, and on a solemn affirmation lodges a complaint. The accused are generally poor people and rarely any rich persons who have not propitiated the illiterate daroga sáheb. A summons is issued. The accused presents himself before the Magistrate. The case is a petty one. It is about letting out water from a gutter. The accused pleads not guilty. He has his neighbours to bear him out. The daroga swears he saw the gutter let out. His peon—for he has one—supports his upari. No other evidence is wanted. The Magistrate orders a fine of rupee one to be paid. Another case of obstruction on the road follows. The same is the result. There is a repetition of such cases in the day. But we have found two cases during the last few days which have really surprised us. There are two persons bearing the same name. One has a shop where he sells mollasses at Runálla's Tekara and the other has a small shop on the New Road where he sells silk tassels and knit-work. The latter was accused of projecting a board over municipal land. The mollasses seller who bore the same name was summoned to appear before the Magistrate to answer the charge. He denied that he was guilty. But the daroga swore his evidence, his peon supported him, and the Sheristedar mumbled out what he had written. The accused often and often said he was not guilty at all. And yet, strange to say, the Magistrate fined him. The second case discloses a still grosser irregularity. There is a great banker, Sheth Motirám Narsai. He owns several buildings. Bana Mian, a daroga, accused him of heaping the debris of a wall beside a building belonging to him in Gopipura. The poor old banker was subpœnaed to answer the charge. In the meantime he received another summons, alleging that he had obstructed the road by stacking firewood beside his dwelling house in Hanuman Street. The summons bore no signature of the presiding Magistrate. It had, however, the seal of the Court. The banker appeared in the Court with his mukhtiar and several respectable witnesses to disprove that he had stacked firewood beside his house. The Magistrate on that day sent word that he could not be present and called the accused on the next day. It was found on the next day that no complaint had been lodged to justify the second summons. The Magistrate, Mr. Adarji, a pensioned Deputy Magistrate and as such not unacquainted with magisterial work, said when the mukhtiar of the accused complained of this, that it was all the mistake of his and of the sheristedar! But what of the seal? The irregular summons was taken back by the Magistrate and was destroyed. This is a fact, and the Magistrate must admit that there was a summons not signed by him though bearing the seal of the Court, which brought Mr. Motirám to his Court. Perhaps to escape this difficulty the Magistrate took up the Gopipura debris case. The banker proved by his books and witnesses that the daroga was wrong and he was right. Still the Magistrate regretted being unable to do anything to Mr. Motirám!

Disapproval of the rules regarding the use of waste land by Zamindárs and Háris in Sind.

22. A correspondent, writing to the Muawin-i-Majma-i-Mahammadi (159), in its issue of the 28th September, says:—Government have issued such strict rules regarding the use of waste land that the Zamindárs in Sind seem to possess no right over it. They are prohibited from using it for any purpose whatever. For instance, they are not allowed to use it, even temporarily, for the purpose of storing their grain. Now if a Zamindár keeps the produce of his field within his own holding, not only does it get spoiled owing to the land being covered with dust and clods of earth, but he is also precluded from bringing that portion under rabi cultivation. On the other hand, if he desires to have the use of such land he is required to make a written application for it, affixing thereto a stamp of eight annas, and to go about for two or three days in order to obtain the necessary permission. He is not allowed to set up fences on the waste land, although they are necessarily required for the protection of the crops. There are several instances in which the Háris have been fined for having put up enclosures on waste land. Now we pray that Government may be pleased to consider the fact that if they use their arable land for this purpose, they suffer pecuniarily. Seeing that Government have also an interest in the preservation of the crops and seeing also that the use of the waste land for the purpose of securing the crops in the manner aforesaid entails no pecuniary loss on Government, we are unable to understand why Government do not take steps to remove such paltry hardships of the Zamindárs as are above described. At present if a landholder desires to take up waste land he cannot get it on payment of occupancy fees. But the land is put up to auction and sold to the highest bidder. It is thus that strangers have acquired lands and the original Zamindárs have been ruined.

A resolution of the Government regarding cattle-grazing fees found fault with.

23. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 15th October, says :—The Government has come to a very strange conclusion. There was some increase in the fees for allowing the cattle to graze on Government land. Against this increase some applications from the Poona and Násik districts alone were received. As all the other districts have kept a rigorous silence on this subject the Government has come to the conclusion that the increase was quite proper and that the rates were not very high, while the true state is quite the contrary. So the people should take care in future in treating matters of public interest and should not let Government draw wrong inferences.

Disapproval of an order recently issued in the Ratnágiri District by the Forest Department.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 11th October, writes :—Two very serious problems, affecting vitally the material interests of the rural population, claim the attention of all who care for the well-being of the people of this presidency. We mean the proposed extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act—opinion on the intrinsic utility of which is so much divided—to districts other than the four in which it has been in force since its enactment, and the circular recently issued in the Ratnágiri District by the Forest Department. Both these are very serious matters. We mean at present to notice only the Forest Department circular, alluded to above. We had thought that with the light that was thrown on the administration of the Forest Department during the last few years, any further extension of its mischievous activities would receive a check, but we have been disappointed. Well nigh exhausted in the Thána District, they are now being renewed in the Ratnágiri District,—a district admittedly the poorest in the whole presidency. That part of the presidency is now receiving the kind notices of the benevolent Forest Department. Not that the department had not hitherto turned its eyes towards it ; its activities had not extended beyond reserving forests here and there. Oppressive as those reservations have been, the orders that have been quite recently issued cap all the others. We learn that the lopping of the five trees, ság, sisu, chandan, ain, and nána, and cultivation within an area of 8 feet from their trunks, in the khoti land, have been prevented. These trees cannot be cut without the permission of Government. Hitherto the prohibition as to cutting extended only to ság, sisu and chandan, but now ain and nána have been included and the restriction extended from cutting to lopping and cultivation within the area specified above. If the Forest Department is blind to the mischievous results of these orders, so are not the people whose interests are vitally affected thereby, and they are taking constitutional measures to bring to the notice of the Government the hardships that will be unavoidably entailed upon them if these orders are not set aside. The whole district, of which khoti land forms the major part and dhára, to which the orders do not extend, the minor, is in consternation. We learn that a very large number of them met at Ratnágiri last month and approached the District Collector, Mr. A. Cumine, C. S., with a view to lay before him their grievances. The stereotyped answer that the matter will be carefully gone into has been given and the assembled people returned to their homes. We hope the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris will look into the matter very carefully and withdraw the orders issued. We join the people in thinking that they are very oppressive, and that they will inevitably operate to the detriment of cultivation. Has Government the right to issue such orders in respect to trees standing on the khoti land ? Moreover, putting aside the question of cutting the trees for building purposes, will not these prohibitions of lopping for agricultural operations, and of cultivation within the prescribed area around them, prove very ruinous to a population which has no other means of subsistence than agriculture, and is this unknown to Government? We are unable to understand the motive of these orders. If it be the reservation of forests, is it necessary that the lopping of the trees should be prohibited, or that the ground under them be withdrawn from cultivation? Cannot the object be attained without such obnoxious restrictions? Is lopping injurious to the trees? Is it not considerably beneficial? Is it not annually necessary in order to produce a straight and healthy growth? General experience corroborates our view, but that of the Forest Department seems to run counter to it. Then again, as regards the other portion of the order. Is there any idea as to the total area of ground that will be withdrawn from cultivation every year if the order is allowed to stand? Let those authorities who had a hand in issuing these fiats answer these questions. We think much mischief will be done if these orders are not immediately cancelled. Here is a field of activity for our sleeping Presidency Association.

Remarks in connection with the riots in China against the Christian missionaries.

25. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 7th October, writes:—A great amount of eloquent indignation has been wasted on the little riots in China against the Christian missionaries. No civilized human being can do otherwise than regret the outrages in which the uproar has terminated, quite as much because they give an opportunity of interference to the European powers as because so many innocent and even heroic Christians have fallen victims to bigotry. But when will the self-righteous European learn to understand the Asiatic? And to begin with, what right have the Europeans, who have allowed Italian immigrants to be lynched with impunity by Lonisiana, to intimidate China with gun-boats? What is the significance of the threatened armed demonstration in the Chinese waters when Jews are daily persecuted with diabolical perseverance by the Government and people of Russia? Why are brawls in Central Asia to be a more righteous casus belli than the fiendish persecution of the race from whom the Christians have received the Old Testament? No doubt, the powers take their stand on treaty rights; but Anglo-Indian and English editors have often taught us that it is mere pedantry to adhere to treaty stipulations when there are more eloquent facts underneath. Is it not worth while to penetrate below the surface and try to understand the irrepressible animosity felt towards the missionaries by the adherents of ancient systems? A civilization as old and venerable as any that now rules the world—a civilization which survived the devastations of wild Tartars and Mahomedan conquerors—that civilization is apparently crumbling away at the touch of the European. In the name of commerce, in the name of religion, these ingenious Europeans have before now subdued and denationalized vast regions of the earth, destroyed the independence of many peoples, and silently forced upon them customs and practices entirely abhorrent to their genius. It is not the least disquieting feature of this transformation that so many of the rising minds in the countries conquered have acquiesced in this metamorphosis, either from motives of worldly advancement or from intellectual shallowness, or want of national self-respect. When Cyrus wished to crush the Lydians for ever, the most effective expedient he could think of was to change the dress of the male citizens of Sardis, and the adoption of a foreign intellectual dress is, perhaps, no less effeminating to the national spirit. Such lessons are doubtless present before the patriotic mandarins who are so grotesquely denounced in the European press. China is by no means an extinct volcano yet. Lord Wolseley thinks that if she could only find a Napoleon, the pigtail might quickly become the fashion, not only in Pekin and at Simla, but in Paris, Vienna and at Washington. A people naturally so powerful will not be willing to surrender their independence very readily. They must be observing with lively anxiety the inrush of that civilization of which the missionary is the pioneer, and which, by education and the superficial glamour of the materialism of the West, has insidiously destroyed ancient institutions wherever history has been written. The lamentable outrages in China are inspired not so much by religious bigotry as an ardent desire for national independence, which every European who is not a hypocrite should respect.

28. The Kásid-e-Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 14th October, observes :—

A complaint against the Christian missionaries and a request to Government in the matter.

It is very unfair for the missionaries to think that their religion is the best and that it is nothing to insult grossly other religions, but if they do not come to their senses in time the attention of the authorities should be directed to it. The missionaries strongly wound the religious feelings of the Hindus by writing objectionable and defamatory pamphlets against their gods and freely distributing them on their sacred holidays, and it is really generous that the Hindus treat such writings with cold contempt. Last year, about the time of the Moharram, the missionaries at Surat wrote something against the religion of Islám, but when the Mahomedans of Ránder and Surat threatened to take proceedings, Mr. Lely, Collector of the district, interfered and the circulation of the objectionable writing was immediately stopped. This shows that the authorities, if they like, can prevent missionaries from indulging in such bad practices. The authorities may also follow with advantage the example recently afforded by the Berlin Government, which prosecuted the editor of a certain local paper for wounding the feelings of the Roman Catholics.

Part II.—Education.

27. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 11th October, writes :—

Prize distribution of the Female High School, Poona, and the speech made by His Excellency Lord Harris on the occasion.

Prizes were distributed to the students of the Poona Female High School on Thursday last, at which interesting ceremony their Excellencies Lord and Lady Harris were present. His Excellency made a speech on the occasion which suggests a good many points for reflection. The first important fact that is emphatically brought to light in His Excellency's speech is that the Girls' High School is a Government institution. Lord Harris tells the governing body of the school to continue to make progress till they "emerge from the character of a governing institution to one on the aided principle." Native States have very largely contributed towards the funds of the High School, and it will be very interesting to know if they contributed towards the erection of a Government or a private institution. It is also interesting to know if the noble donors are aware of the fact that the institution belongs to Government and not to them. We have then another question to ask, viz., whether the number of pupils (71) is inclusive or exclusive of the training college students and those of the primary school absorbed in the Female High School. Another point suggested by His Excellency's speech is about the popular sympathy this institution commands. His Excellency assumed that those who were present to witness the ceremony were present not because the Governor was present, but because they approved of female education and that they were trying to advance it. We are sorry the list of those present on the occasion is not published. Had it been so we should have been able to say how many were present there because the Governor was present and how many because they were real and honest sympathisers of the movement. If we can judge from the invitations issued, we can without any fear of contradiction say that the number of those present must have been made up of both kinds. In his concluding remarks His Excellency made it very clear that the institution was a very desirable one from the Western point of view, and he left it entirely to the people to see if it was equally so from the Eastern point of view. His Excellency did well, indeed, in not pronouncing an opinion on behalf of the Easterns. His Excellency has given one more proof of his reputation as a matter-of-fact Governor. Any other man in his place would not have hesitated to say that he was glad to see that the Easterns had commenced to take such deep interest in the English education of their wives and daughters, because in the list of members of the Maháráshtra Female Education Society there were such names as those of Dr. Bhándárkar and Ráo Bahádur Ránade. We are really glad that our rulers are beginning to perceive that between the public and the half-a-dozen or so of reformers there is a wide gulf intervening and that what they say or show is not really what the people would like to say or show. Taken as a whole, His Excellency's speech gives clear indication that he really knows how the institution stands. His Excellency, if he had condemned us, could well have done so without laying himself open to any blame. But he speaks about our traditions with respect and reserve. The learned Doctor Bhándárkar, however, would not be so patient. He thought he would fail in his duty if he did not vilify Native society. That he did and satisfied himself. As we had already said enough of this tendency, we are unwilling to go further on this occasion.

28. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 12th October, observes :— The Girls' High School started at Poona about five years ago seems to have failed in its object, and it will therefore be advisable if the proprietors changed their present programme so as to make it suitable to a large number of girls, and in this connection we hope they will see through the speech of His Excellency Lord Harris made on the occasion of the prize distribution at the school last week. Lord Harris in his speech also made a passing remark regarding the difference of opinion between the Bombay Municipal Corporation and the Government regarding the cost of primary education, and said that wherever the scheme of local self-government was in vogue the responsibility of educating the people rested on the municipality. But the proceedings at the last meeting of the Bombay Corporation are sufficient to show that we do not enjoy the franchise of local self-government in its entirety. Moreover, Government do not allow the municipality to enjoy the revenues to which they are justly entitled, but only burden them with additional expenses in the name of local self-government. If, therefore, local self-government means extra taxation consequent upon those additional expenses, it will be a curse rather than a much-coveted blessing.

A complaint against the teachers of the municipal girls' school No. 1 at Broach.

29. The Din Mani (82), in its issue of the 13th October, says that it has got information to the effect that in the municipal girls' school No. 1 at Broach the pupils are made to sing love songs, and requests the local school-board and the educational authorities to inquire into this matter and to warn the teachers against doing so in future, as otherwise many people will, says the paper, cease sending their girls to the school and the cause of female education will suffer.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Remarks on the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

30. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 11th October, expresses much disappointment at the present composition of the Bombay Municipal Corporation and the want of independence and zeal in its members, European and Native, and after showing how this deficiency is apparent in all the sections of the members observes :—The majority of Native councillors belong to the non-descript class. It is they who are seldom true to the interests of the city. It is because of their fluctuating character, their personal interests, their treason to their conscience, that off and on amendments and motions of a most important character for the welfare of the city are lost. The chief executive for the time being espies this great weakness, and, naturally, having a flickering interest in the welfare of the rate-payers, he never misses an opportunity to enlist the weak-kneed on his side by sending round canvassers to collect votes every time that he has to carry out some proposition of his own. This is the way he gets his working majority. And, as there are dupes to be gulled, the chief executive does smoothly his work. Is it a wonder if the Municipal Corporation of Bombay is daily losing its integrity and independence, and degrading itself to the level of one of those innumerable jokoolum district local boards of which we have constantly heard so much? Remove the handful of the independent men who keep the municipal spirit alive, and what are you likely to find? This only : a ring worse than that of Tammaney. Is it a surprise if under such circumstances Mr. Murzban is obliged at the eleventh hour to withdraw his consent to become Municipal Executive Engineer? Evidently, the official pressure put on him must be overwhelming to induce him to withdraw from his previous resolution. Mr. Murzban is still in official harness. In all probability, he will write to us to contradict the statement. We shall be bound to accept the contradiction, though, all the same, it will not help to remove the deep popular belief as to it. Be that as it may. But what are we to say to those who, even after Mr. Mehta's withdrawal of his notice, passed the appointment of Mr. Walton without a single protest? We confess to a feeling of bitter disappointment at this incident. In saying so we are simply echoing the popular feeling. There has been for years such a loud complaint against the vagaries of the Engineering Department that it was acknowledged on all hands that a reform was necessary and essential. Such a reform could be accomplished only when the head of the department had been removed. It might be a hardship to the incumbent. But when the city's best interests demand it, individual hardship must find no consideration. Yet those very councillors, European and Native alike, who in private society talked freely about that department, had not the moral courage to raise a dissentient voice. We say this was most discreditable to the public spirit of Bombay. It was cowardice. Here is a glaring instance of that demoralisation which has crept over municipal councillors, and which, if not put a stop to, is likely to lead to great catastrophes in the near future. The re-appointment of Mr. Walton, in brief, is nothing but a grave public scandal, and the reproach of it lies on the head of the existing Municipal Corporation.

Remarks on a motion recently brought before the Bombay Municipal Corporation by Mr. Wácha.

31. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 11th October, regrets that Mr. Wácha's motion regarding the connection of municipal officers with the elections was rejected, and says that things are carried on in the municipality by interest and flattery, and that this state of affairs will hardly improve unless some able member of the Corporation takes up the question, which alone will make the Corporation independent and respected.

Disapproval of the resolution of the Ahmednagar Municipality to spend Rs. 300 on the occasion of the approaching visit of His Excellency the Governor to Ahmednagar.

32. The Jagaddarsh (38) of Ahmednagar, in its issue of the 11th October, says:—It is our duty to respect and honour His Excellency the Governor of Bombay and to rejoice when he visits this town of ours to see it for himself and to arrange for the proper supply of water to the cantonment and to the town. A meeting of the general committee of the municipality was held to consider the subject of giving a suitable reception to the Governor, at which a resolution was passed sanctioning the expenditure out of the municipal funds of a sum of Rs. 300 for the purpose. Two of the members pointed out that it was illegal to spend the municipal funds in this way, and that they were ready to collect the necessary amount from private sources; but we are very sorry to say that the committee paid no attention to this wise advice. [The Nagar Samáchár (53), in its issue of the 10th October, also condemns the resolution of the Ahmednagar Municipality sanctioning Rs. 300 for the reception to be given to His Excellency the Governor.]

Part IV.—Native States.

Alleged mismanagement in Native States.

33. The Pársi Tikákár (118), in its issue of the 15th October, observes:—The management of Native States is being gradually exposed and brought to light. The Chiefs do not understand their responsibility and their duty of making their subjects happy and prosperous, but only think of squandering their ancestral treasures, in enjoying themselves and in indulging in vices without any thought of the future. It is feared that if such a state of things continues they will surely become nonentities within the next 50 years, and it is strange that the Indian National Congress, which asks for new political franchises from the British Government, does not see the necessity for asking for reforms in Native States. It is not, however, too late, and it will do well to take up this question seriously in hand.

34. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 15th October, is astonished at the resolution of the Kashmere Darbár to spend Rs. 75,000 for giving proper reception to His Excellency the Viceroy, and remarks that the state of the treasury is not at all satisfactory, that there are mistakes in the account books to remedy which a European officer has been lately appointed, and that therefore it is not proper to spend such a large sum in fireworks, dinner parties, &c. The paper expresses a hope that the Viceroy, after proper inquiries into the state of the Kashmere treasury, will not sanction the expenditure of such a large sum and will show his large-heartedness by taking a hint from what is said above.

Disapproval of the resolution of the Kashmere Darbár to spend Rs. 75,000 for giving a reception to His Excellency the Viceroy.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ ná) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Akbar, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 18th October, says:—Very serious are the signs of war on the horizon of European politics. We Indians have not much to fear from this dark political outlook so long as we are under the most glorious English rule. We know that if untoward circumstances come to pass, which God forbid, England will not tamely hand over India to Russia. We have once seen England coming out unscathed from a turmoil wherein almost all the European powers were united against England; and we are quite sure that the same will be the result once more. Taking the past history of India into consideration we find that India is at its height of prosperity, peace and happiness under the present rule. If by some inexplicable circumstances India were obliged to defend herself against the Russians, how would she do it? This is a very grave question which agitates the minds of India's well-wishers. About a generation ago India was deprived of her arms, and since then a new generation has sprung up which is quite ignorant of their use and is consequently totally unfit to protect itself or to assist its rulers in the event of an emergency. How, then, can even Government manage to defend such a mass of unarmed population? This is a very grave position, requiring the utmost attention from our wise and lenient rulers. We hope that the Government will permit us to use arms and enable us to protect ourselves and thereby strengthen itself too.

What would be the fate of India in the event of a war in Europe?

2. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 18th October, observes:—We do not know how far to rely on the rumour that the Viceroy intends resigning office next April, but everybody would wish that the rumour had been well founded, as the administration of Lord Lansdowne has proved a complete failure and has caused great dissatisfaction among the people, particularly the Natives, who sincerely wish him to make room for a better and more sympathising Viceroy. The Kashmere and Manipur affairs, the passing of the Age of Consent Act and the prosecution of the Banyabasi newspaper are among the important events of his régime, of all of which the Natives strongly disapprove. However, it is desirable that he should remain in office till the new Parliamentary elections are held; because, as the Liberals are expected to come into power and Lord Ripon to be the Secretary of State for India, it is hoped that Mr. Gladstone will send out a noble and good man as Viceroy of India and then the present discontent of the people will come to an end. If, on the other hand, His Excellency Lord Lansdowne resigns office before the elections, the Conservative ministry will fill up his place and it is hardly likely that they will send one who will sympathise with the people in their views.

Remarks on the rumoured resignation of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne.

3. The Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 18th October, says:—How beneficial would it be to India if all of us were to devote ourselves body and soul to subjects like the income-tax and the salt-tax and leave subjects like the Age of Consent Act to those who like to handle them? The Bombay Revenue Code is a subject of utmost importance and requires proper handling. Our benefactors in England have, we are very glad to hear, taken it in hand, as will be seen from a perusal of the vigorous speech made by Mr. Seymour Keay at the late discussion on the Indian Budget in Parliament in answer to Sir Richard Temple of the famine celebrity, who never loses an opportunity of telling the people of England how happy and contented the peasantry of India is and also how there are no arrears of land revenue. Mr. Seymour Keay contended that it was impossible for the peasantry to fall into arrears, the enactments which crushed down the poor cultivators of India being hard and inhuman.

Mr Seymour Keay and the Bombay Land Revenue Code.

4. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 14th October, writes:—The practice of conferring honorary titles on members of local boards and municipalities is, we learn, to be discontinued as Government have resolved that such titles should cease. We do not suppose the abolition will be much regretted. At best it is but an insignificant appendage, which every representative on the municipal or the local boards, whatever his merits or capabilities may be, is by virtue of his office entitled to claim. The fact of its being thus conferred indiscriminately must have lowered its value in the estimation of all intelligent men, who will now rejoice that the distinction is no longer to exist. The only people to regret its discontinuance will be some municipal commissioners, who owe their seat not to any individual merit or abilities, but are simply by reason of their wealth and position returned to a body to which they form anything but a desirable acquisition.

Remarks in connection with the discontinuance of the practice of conferring the titles of Ráo Sáheb and Ráo Bahádur on members of municipalities and local boards.

Disapproval of the memorial of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha for the extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act to other than the districts to which it has been applied.

5. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 18th October, writes:—Though by dint of perseverance the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha was able, after a lapse of over twelve months, to extort from the exceedingly reluctant Bombay Government, but not without appeal to the highest authority at Simla, a copy of the latest report of the special officer appointed to watch the operations of that strange and impractical piece of legislation known as the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, it may be a moot question whether the Sabha had strong reasons to urge Government to extend the measure to other districts than those where it has been enforced. The report on which that public-spirited body has based its representations is still a document in camera. The Government of Bombay has taken special care that it should not see the light of day. How long this resolution may hold good we cannot say, for we are not in the confidence of the bureau which has secreted that report. But whether it is published or allowed to rot in the remotest recesses of the Revenue Secretariat, one thing may be safely predicted of the Act itself. It is a legislative abortion, and like all abortions destined to meet its natural fate. It was the creation of Sir (then Mr.) Theodore Hope. Many were the angry battles fought over it during its passage through the Legislative Council; while the criticism to which economic experts and students alike subjected it outside the legislative chamber was sufficiently caustic and unfavourable. The whole tendency of the Act was predicted to be mischievous. It was foretold that the material improvement of the Deccan peasantry, steeped in hopeless indebtedness, would not be achieved by a measure which was opposed to all principles of political economy, ethics and common sense. For that matter, a short Act might have as well been passed with ease, making short work of indebtedness in the Deccan. "Whereas it is expedient for the future material prosperity of the rayat that the State should discharge him from all debts, be it enacted that all proceedings under the Civil Procedure Code for the recovery of his debts shall be inoperative so far as they relate to the Deccan." A drastic but laconic enactment of this revolutionary character might have been intelligible and wonderfully achieved the miracle of solvency of the Deccan peasantry rather than the elaborate legislative monstrosity which its infatuated author by much official manœuvring was able to create. The poet has observed: "Like following life through creatures you dissect; you lose it the moment you detect." So in endeavouring to redeem the peasant from his load of debts and obligations you have only done him greater injury. In trying to free him you have only made him a worse slave than before. Those who chose to take advantage of the reconciliatory and other emancipatory clauses are not known to have fared better than before. The legal discharge from bonds and obligations has had only this net effect, that those who gave him credit before have ceased to give him credit now. The middleman, the money-lending Márwádi, is undoubtedly a usurer of the worst type. But he is no worse than the Jew whom holy Russia madly tries to extirpate and thereby free the slave from his land indebtedness. So that it has come to pass in the case of the Deccan rayat, that his second stage of a free and solvent man is worse than his first! It appears paradoxical; but so it is, that with the chain of oppressive debts hanging round his neck he was able to eke out a bare sustenance for himself, his wife and children, whereas without that halter round his neck he starves and famishes. For, on one side the sáwkár will not lend him for his seeds or advance him for his crops; the State, like the dog in the manger, will not give him help nor induce others to do so. He has lost credit and with it he has lost the very thing which enabled him to earn his daily bread. It is thus that he is now being ground down between the upper and nether millstones. And while such is the actual condition of that peasantry—the peasantry so graphically described by the Deccan Riot Commission—it is astonishing to notice so shrewd and able

a body as the Sárvajanik Sabha gravely urging the Government to extend the Act to other localities! We fear, in this instance the practical wisdom which has been the distinguishing trait of that public body has been nowhere. Surely, the Sabha, which boasts among its active members gentlemen of undoubted experience and great liberality of thought, does not require to be taught what is known to every student of political economy, namely, that political economy and law underlie one another, that all the acts of economic life are exercised under the empire of civil institutions, as Mr. Laveleye justly observes, and that all civil institutions have economic interests for their final cause. Judged by this axiom of political economy, is it not the case that the indebtedness of the peasantry, not only in Deccan but in the whole empire, is the accumulated result of the operations of civil institutions having for their aim and object economic pursuits—economic pursuits among which husbandry stands pre-eminent from times the most ancient? If this axiom holds good, then it might be further asked whether a solution of this vexed and most difficult problem which could engage the serious attention of any civilised state in the world, does not lie more in a radical change in the civil laws of the empire, so far as they affect land, than in an accumulation of such laws which only tend to aggravate the disease which they are supposed to cure. It was this great defect which was clearly seen through by Sir James Caird in his official tour as one of the members of the Famine Commission. A shrewd and sagacious expert as he is, and no mean authority on matters agricultural, he did not disguise his opinion on the matter. For in that able memorandum which he separately submitted twelve years ago to the then Secretary of State, he openly alluded to the deplorable fact and pointedly drew attention to the real measures of relief. And though the hide-bound and self-sufficient bureaucracy which surrounded Lord Lytton at the time pretended to discount those remedies, it cannot be denied by those who have taken some pains to think over the matter, that Sir James' suggestions for relieving the Indian peasantry in general from their present condition, which is worse than that of bondage, making them really thriving and enriching the State revenue for all times to come, are, on the whole, deserving the attention of a wise and benevolent Government. We believe the Sárvajanik Sabha would deserve the gratitude of the country if, instead of recommending the extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, it applied its undoubted energies to the question of how best to restore, however partially, those old sheet anchors in our land revenue system, and how to extricate the Government from those "quicksands of legal chicanery" in which it has unconsciously, but blindly, plunged itself. The axe of reform should be laid at the root, and not at the top branches. And it is superfluous to say that Indian land legislation of over three-quarters of a century is the root which needs to be heroically outrooted. Then and then alone, may we witness a solvent and prosperous peasantry.

Want of unanimity and patriotism among the Indian community mourned over.

6. While writing on the disastrous consequence of a split in a community, the Pratod (60), in its issue of the 19th October, observes:—Take any newspaper of the present time in hand, and you will find that internecine quarrels are raging more or less in all institutions, large or small, from the most insignificant body to associations like the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha. It is a great pity that our people should yet be unacquainted with the evil effects of mutual discord. It is through this want of harmony that we have lost Native rule, material prosperity and physical power, have been reduced to a state of starvation, have fallen in the estimation of the world, and have become meeker and more harmless even than sheep. A shepherd can tend a flock of 150 sheep at the outside, while one Englishman can keep under control 1,250 natives of India without any difficulty whatever. What condition can be meaner than this? The late Shástribáwa, the younger, compared English education to a tigress, but we liken it to liquor. Our people of the modern time are like drunkards, who while intoxicated pluck each other's hair and have forgotten their proper duty and are day and night engaged in thinking as to how best they can wreak vengeance upon one another, regardless of the disastrous effects of their vindictiveness on the country at large. Our rulers possess good as well as bad qualities, and it is very unfortunate that the educated people from amongst us should contract the bad qualities without acquiring a single good quality from them. Self-respect and patriotism are the notable characteristics of the English. They may fight among themselves very bitterly and may be even ready to kill each other in the heat of anger, but the moment any one of them is attacked by a foreigner, they will forget their mutual feuds for the time at least, and act conjointly to effect the defeat of the foreign aggressor. This good quality of sympathy with their countrymen has latterly been absent from our people. We are at a loss to understand how people, who have received an English education and who move among English society, fail to appreciate their fellow-feeling which characterizes the English in all their discussions and differences of opinion. It is not necessary to go far to seek an instance of this sort. Many Europeans disliked the doings of Mr. A. T. Crawford; but did any one of them come forward to depose against him? Throughout the annals of India not a single instance will be found of an Englishman having joined the Natives against his own countrymen, while not a page will be found in which there is no instance of our people having joined foreigners to effect the ruin of our own country. We do not mean to say that internal dissensions or differences like those at present raging in Hindu society are totally absent from the English community. We only want to impress on the minds of our readers this fact that Englishmen fight for a principle and not for the interests of a particular individual and that consequently there is not much personal spite among them. For instance, in Parliament there are always two parties and their members fight very warmly for the sake of their party principles, but there is never an attempt to throw dirt on or insult any particular member. The late Lord Beaconsfield and Mr. Gladstone were leaders of opposite parties, but they never encouraged any one to insult or show disrespect to their opponents. On the other hand, Dr. Bhándárkar and Professor Ginsiwále have lost the respect and position which they formerly had in the estimation of the parties opposed to them in principle, simply because the one favoured the Age of Consent Act and the other was a bitter opponent of that Act. Their learning and other good qualities have been forgotten on account of their difference of opinion in one respect. This is a very deplorable state of things. What has led us to make these reflections is the absolute inactivity of the people on this side of the country with regard to the Indian National Congress, the next meeting of which has drawn very near. Our earnest prayer to our educated countrymen is that they should forget the split caused among them by the Age of Consent Act and gird up their loins to make the necessary preparations in view of the approaching meeting of the Congress.

A prayer for the reconstitution of the supreme Judicial Court in Sind.

7. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 17th October, writes :—In the memorial recently presented to the Commissioner in Sind by the Karáchi branch of the Central National Mahomedan Association, inter alia there was a prayer for the reconstitution of the supreme Judicial Court of the province. Without meaning to endorse unreservedly the proposals in the Mahomedan memorial regarding the reconstitution of the Sadar Court, this point will be generally admitted that the constitution of that Court, consisting of a single Judge as it does, fails to give public satisfaction. Times out of number has the local press expressed its views in favour of the reconstitution, and ever and anon has the public clamoured against the present state of affairs. If it were necessary to gauge the strength of the popular conviction about the unsatisfactory state of the Judicial Department of the province, the frequency with which attempts are made to revive the subject and bring it to the notice of the authorities will of itself suffice to show how closely it affects public interests. On the broad question, therefore, that some remedy is needed there is practically an unanimity of opinion, but as to what is to be the nature of the remedy opinions differ. It certainly is establishing a very invidious distinction and it must needs be galling to the feelings of Her Majesty's Native subjects, that whilst European British subjects enjoy the valuable privilege of being tried by the Bombay High Court in respect of offences committed in the province of Sind, matters of life and death are in the case of Native subjects entrusted to the decision of a sole Judge. The Judge may, indeed, be a most competent man;

he may be exceedingly well-versed in the law and his decisions may be very elaborate, but the bare fact of such an enormous amount of power being entrusted to a single fallible being could hardly prove acceptable to those whom it concerns. Moreover, it is a patent fact that our English jurisprudence abounds in minutiæ; there are many little things that are apt to be overlooked even by the best of legal authorities, and therefore the collected wisdom of two or more would prove a very desirable acquisition. The Commissioner's reply would seem to favour the retention of a single Judge of the Sadar Court, on the ground that "there is much more vigour, much greater feeling of personal responsibility, much more going into things than if there were two." If this principle is to be carried to its logical conclusion, it would be needless to have any bench of Judges. If it is intended to insinuate that a bench of Judges act upon the principle that what is the business of everybody is the business of nobody, and fail to exercise that care and discretion which they would, if acting individually, then the composition of our benches must be ridiculous in the extreme. Let our Bombay High Court be then resolved into its constituent elements, and let each Judge be a supreme autocrat without the possibility of having his judgment submitted to the arbitration of any other. In fact, it could hardly be imagined, and it would certainly be incorruptible with the hitherto well-sustained reputation of our British Judges, that such a juvenile characteristic as nonchalance in business when working in a body would prevail amongst them. The Commissioner said that judicial administration consisted not only of sitting on the bench and deciding knotty points, but seeing that the courts below do their work, that cases are properly tried, that decisions are not improperly given, &c. If we have a board of Judges, he continued, might not they be so much enamoured of knotty points as to spend all their time in discussing them and have no leisure for circuit work? It seems to us very doubtful as to whether any fears need be entertained on that score. It is not likely that our Judges, sober, grave and demure, could be much captivated by a love of the ornamental, and that there might be danger of their occupying their time in a process of hair-splitting and in legal quibbles. They may confidently be expected not to devote more time to their work than is absolutely necessary, and if perchance they should be engaged in the solution of knotty points, it would be purely for a more equitable administration of justice. It is difficult to see in what respect a bench of Judges would fail to do the work that is done at present. On the contrary, there is rather a strong presumption that not only the same amount of work will be done, but it will be done better with a plurality of heads. In fact, by the constitution of the Sadar Court with a single Judge, Sind is now worse off than what it was during the first days of British rule. Then in addition to the Commissioner there was a Judicial Assistant to the Commissioner, and all appeals lay not to the latter alone but were decided by him and the Commissioner. Now we have the Judicial Commissioner substituted for the Judicial Assistant and the supreme power of hearing appeals is lodged with one head alone. We find it difficult to agree with the Commissioner that a bench of Judges would lessen the responsibility on the individual members that constitute it. We think it would almost be sacrilegious on our part to entertain any such opinion about our experienced Judges as to believe them capable of doing their work in a slipshod and perfunctory fashion when in a body.

Remarks on the income-tax levied on the Raychand Dipchand Library at Broach.

8. The Broach Mitra (98), in its issue of the 21st October, observes:—The income-tax is, no doubt, a very obnoxious tax, but we do not know of a single instance in which it has been sought to be levied on such a public and charitable institution as a library, and we are therefore surprised to find that the Raychand Dipchand Library at Broach has been assessed at Rs. 20 a year, whereas its annual net profit as computed from the last four years' account is hardly Rs. 500. The library gets an annual grant of Rs. 300 from the local municipality. A few months ago, however, some of the official members wanted to stop it, and their ill success may have probably resulted in this notice from the income-tax officer. We fail to understand why this library at Broach has been brought under the operation of this tax, while kindred institutions elsewhere, which are in a more prosperous condition, are exempted from it. This is sufficient to show Government how hard the income-tax department must be towards ordinary poor men. We learn that the Honorary Secretary, Khán Sáheb Dinsháji Fardunji, has appealed against this imposition of the tax, and we recommend him to push on the matter still further if the appeal is dismissed, in order to get the question settled once for all.

Remarks in connection with the appointment of Factory Inspectors under the amended Factory Act.

9. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 18th October, writes :—We understand that there are half-a-dozen applicants for the post of Factory Inspectors whom the Bombay Government will have to appoint under the amended Factory Act. We, therefore, deem it necessary to warn the Government to be very prudent and careful in their selection. The inspection required under the Act is not of so technical a character as to oblige Government to select men who have had a practical knowledge of the internal administration of mills. If our information be correct, it is contemplated by the local authorities to give preference to such. Nothing could be more fatal than this principle of selection, for the simple reason that it would very soon defeat the object in view. Government cannot be unaware of the common rumours touching the system of boiler inspection. There was a cause celibre in 1877, when the integrity of a boiler inspector was warmly discussed in a defamation case in the High Court. The mill-owners as a body are all honourable men. But it would be affectation to contradict that among the mill-owning classes there are a few who have very loose notions of commercial ethics. The very fact that last year some of the signatories to the short-time movement cast to the wind their moral obligations and worked their mills on the sly on closed days, shows clearly that there are persons who will try to over-ride the law. Now what we have to point out is this. Persons conversant with the internal economy of mills are more likely to be corrupted by dishonest mill-owners than inspectors selected from the outside range. As no technicalities are necessary, any active, hard-working and educated young man who has a character for unimpeachable integrity would be preferable as an inspector to one who had been inside a mill. In these days of struggle for existence, when many a graduate of the University is in search of employment, it would be both politic and prudent to appoint inspectors from this class of our educated community. Moral fibre is the first essential. The inspectors selected must be able to resist temptation. For it must be recollected that during the first few months of the working of the Act all will go well. The demoralisation will set in as things settle down in a groove. The road to temptation will then be open. And we are strongly of opinion that to avoid scandals and secure the benevolent object of the Act, young University men of a firm moral character, or some of the set who are already employed in the local Secretariat and tried, would be infinitely preferable to persons who have worked in mills. We give this loud warning beforehand and trust that Government will be circumspect in the selection of its factory inspectors. Otherwise the very excellent object of the Act is certain to be thwarted.

The Honourable Mr. Moore and Mrs. Moore praised.

10. The Gujarát Mitrá (86), in its issue of the 18th October, writes :—The Bombay Civil Service sustains a great loss by the retirement of the Honourable Mr. Moore from its rank and file. Sir Raymond West, in proposing his toast the other day at an entertainment given to him by his colleagues at the Honourable Mr. Naylor's house, recalled his "sympathy, capacity and devotion to duty" as the most marked characteristic features of his public career. It cannot be forgotten how patiently, intelligently and energetically Mr. Moore has often acted on special service besides official routine. On the Commission appointed to try Mr. Wilson in connection with the Cambay scandal, his joint labours with his honourable host, Mr. Naylor, were much applauded by the public. The result of that inquiry gave the general public an additional proof of Messrs. Moore and Naylor's stern sense of justice and impartiality. Like her husband, Mrs. Moore, too, has played her part in the arena of social life. Within her sphere of usefulness to the delicate sex, she has been, like Mrs. Chatfield, an agreeable, useful and energetic associate. We wish them bon voyage and undisturbed retirement.

11. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 22nd October, disapproves of the suggestion made by some persons to the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha to give an address to the Honourable Mr. Moore on the eve of his resignation of Government service, saying that although ordinarily he was not a bad or vindictive officer, the paper is not aware of his having ever taken exceptional troubles to secure public good or having shown special sympathy with the Natives in any cause. If the Honourable Mr. Moore, adds the paper, is to be given an address simply because he gradually rose to a high position under Government and is retiring on pension after a long service, the Sabha will do well to stereotype the address; for, there will be many officers like the Honourable Mr. Moore to whom it will have to give such addresses.

Disapproval of the suggestion made by some persons to the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha to give an address to the Honourable Mr. Moore.

12. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 19th October, states :—The Swadesh-Hitechchhu Vidyárthi Mandali called together on the 18th instant a meeting of the Hindus in the Mulji Jetha market-hall, Bombay, to consider what steps should be taken in the matter of the tract published by the Bombay Tract and Book Society, reviling most grossly the Hindu god Krishna. There were about 400 people assembled, and Mr. B. B. Nagarkar was in the chair. A letter from Mr. Jávji Dádáji, proprietor of the Nirnaya Ságar Press, Bombay, was read, in which the printer expressed regret for allowing the tract to be printed in his press, and promised that in future no such tract would be printed by him. The assembly, after a warm debate, passed a resolution to the following effect :—That an appeal should be made to the Hindu Mahájans, asking them to take further steps in this matter, that the said letter of the printer should be sent to the same body for perusal, and that a committee be appointed to prevent the recurrence of such a thing in future. [The Akhbáre Sodágar (95), in its issue of the 20th October, approves of the proceedings of the assembly; and the Bombay Samáchár (97), in its issue of the 20th October, expresses similar sentiments and adds that the head of each Hindu caste should send a memorial to Government protesting against the frequent missionary attacks on Hindu religion, and that the Government should be reminded of its promise given in the Proclamation of 1858.]

A handbill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society and a meeting of the Hindus convened to protest against the same.

13. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 18th October, regrets that the Hindus of Bombay have not taken satisfactory steps against the missionaries alleged to be in the habit of insulting the Hindu gods and religion, and that the private meeting of some of the influential Hindus held at Kápad Bazár Hall on the 13th instant, under the presidency of Sardár Bahádur Vináyak Vásudev former Oriental Translator, ended in nothing, exhorts the disciples and devotees of Krishna to convene a public meeting and to memorialise Government without delay, showing how far their religious feelings have been gratuitously, wounded and the necessity for Government to take prompt measures for the preservation of the peace. The paper adds that it must be within the recollection of Government how the public and the police had to suffer from Mr. Jálbhái's book on the prophet Mahomet written some years ago on the authority of an English work, and says that it is a matter for regret that Government in spite of that incident should not take steps against the missionaries who deliberately wound the feelings of others, and concludes that if the missionaries had ventured to write against the prophet Mahomet it would have been hardly possible for them to walk about safely in the streets of Bombay for some time.

14. The Vártdhar (20), in its issue of the 18th October, is astonished at the alleged attitude of indifference of the Bombay police towards the publication of the tract above referred to, and is of opinion that the police have every right to prosecute persons who try to hurt the feelings of others, and asks if they would have kept the same attitude had the followers of Islám been the aggrieved.

An amendment in the Indian Penal Code suggested in connection with religious insult.

15. The Gujarâti (85), in its issue of the 18th October, writes:—Quite recently we drew the attention of Government to the unwarranted strictures made against the moral character of Krishna and Subhadra by "B. P." in leaflets that were distributed in thousands on the very day that is observed as a sacred day in the name of Krishna amongst the Hindus, and also pointed to the great irritation and indignation which the incident has engendered. Among certain sections of the community private meetings and conferences have already been held with a view to consider what steps should be taken to prevent a repetition of similar attacks against the character of mythological and Paurânic personages deeply venerated by the community at large. It is very remarkable that the authors of the Indian Penal Code, while making it an offence to "utter any word or make any gesture or to place any object in the sight of a person with the deliberate intention of wounding his religious feelings," should have altogether omitted to take notice of greater offenders who wound the religious susceptibilities of people, not by words or gestures but by writings, leaflets or pamphlets. This omission is, indeed, a surprising one, and unless the Penal Code is amended, the injured parties are left without any legal remedy. This state of things is fraught with serious mischief and we call the attention of the Legislature to this defect in the existing criminal law of the country. We know that the Penal Code does provide for cases in which a person is intentionally insulted and thereby provoked with the intention or knowledge that the provocation will lead to a breach of the peace or the commission of any other offence. But this section will be inoperative, so long as the injured people are known to be quiet and tolerant. The result is that if one wound the religious feelings of any person by word of mouth he is liable to be punished, but not if he does the same thing by the distribution of printed books, unless, of course, the persons concerned are intolerant enough to resent the insult in a manner which might end in a breach of the peace. This anomalous state of the law, therefore, needs to be amended. Since the dissemination of the leaflets, several well-known Sanskrit scholars and Shástris have been consulted, and all of them with one voice give it as their opinion that the allegation made in the leaflets is utterly baseless. It would be advisable, therefore, under these circumstances for the Hindus to convene a meeting of the entire community and forward a representation to Government with a prayer to amend the present law and to put a stop to the dissemination of the statements and allegations which have exasperated the Hindus. The British Government, whatever its defects and failures in other matters (and they are, indeed, not a few), has promised never to interfere with the religious beliefs of the people or do anything likely to wound their religious convictions, and we have no doubt if Government are properly approached they will readily listen to any reasonable prayer made to them. Only a few weeks ago a complication was avoided at Surat by the timely intervention of Mr. Lely, and we are inclined to think that the authorities cannot safely remain indifferent in regard to a matter which has distressed countless men and women.

16. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 22nd October, says:—Government should take into serious consideration the suggestion made by the Gujarâti for the amendment of Section 298 of the Indian Penal Code. According to this section it is doubtful whether legal steps can be taken against Christian missionaries for reviling in writing Hindu gods. Because the Hindus in Bombay have not yet created any disturbance, it cannot be supposed that the leaflet published there by Cristian missionaries on the last Gokuldshtami day has not offended their religious feelings. It is necessary for Government to amend the section in the Penal Code, or else peacefulness and tolerance will be looked upon as vices, while riotous conduct will be taken for a virtue. A man will put up with humiliation for some time, but there is a limit to forbearance as to everything else. Englishmen, being followers of a different religion from that of the Hindus, should take particular care in delicate matters such as that of religion. It is necessary for our Hindu brethren in Bombay to bestir themselves and to persevere in this matter until it is brought to a satisfactory conclusion.

17. The Praja Mat (119), in its issue of the 17th October, observes :—

A request to Government in connection with the Salvation Army.

There is religious fervour in every breast, and particularly amongst the Hindus, and instances of great revolutions having taken place on that account are on record. It is a notorious fact that the mutiny of 1857 originated in a supposed breach of the Hindu religion and in spite of the wholesome lessons it has taught, Christian missionaries of the Salvation Army are openly insulting other religions and wounding the feelings of the Hindus and the Mahomedans. They have established their head-quarters in large cities and visit villages and convert illiterate people, who have no idea of their own religion, including females and even children, and sometimes send away the children to other places. Villagers are easily duped by members of the Salvation Army by their putting on the garments of Hindu saints, but after seeing their own mistake they are apt to become desperate. Government ought, therefore, to take timely measures to prevent any such casualty.

18. The Gujarát Mitrá (86), in its issue of the 18th October, disapproves of the notification said to have been recently issued by Mr. F. S. P. Lely, Collector of Surat, to the effect that licenses should be obtained for firing the Holi fires in ditches and that some one must be stationed near the fires till they go out on pain of a fine of Rs. 50, and observes :—This notification has caused widespread discontent among the Hindus, who have begun to think that the more anxious they are to respect British laws, the more flagrantly is the Queen's promise of non-interference in religious matters violated, and we request Mr. Lely to change the notification or to deal in such a way as will please the people; for, it is advisable for Government officers not to give the people any cause for discontent at such a critical time as the present.

Disapproval of the notification issued by the Collector of Surat regarding Holi holidays.

19. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 18th October, says :—The Hindu married couple is ever inseparable. The husband, if the wife be true to him, can never marry a second time except in some exceptional cases; while the Christian pair vows to be true to each other only until they part. Until 1661 A.D. the words in the marriage service were "until death parts us" and not "until do we part." But this latter reading was the outcome of the spirit of the times, when the relation of man and wife was thought only to be for mutual happiness, having nothing higher in it. To a Hindu mind the relation between man and wife is ever indissoluble, for, to a Hindu, his better half is a necessity in all his religious duties. The Bible and the Shástras order with one accord the wife to obey the husband, but there is a grave difference between the two as to the spirit of the order. The Bible (both in old and new Testaments) orders the wife to obey her husband as his inferior, but the Shástras treat her with more than equality; she is thought to be in some places the presiding genius of a man's household—nay, a good wife is even compared to the goddess of wealth herself. The Christian widow is told to devote herself wholly to the cause of God; but it is very hard to tell how many follow this precept, while the Hindu widow even in these degenerate times follows a similar command almost to the very letter, as is exemplified all over the country. Even Rája Rámmohan Roy bears witness to the unselfish devotion of the Hindu widow in her practical life.

The Bible and the Hindu Shástras on the position of women.

20. A correspondent of the Din Bandhu (10), in its issue of the 18th October, complains bitterly of the supremacy of the Bráhmans over the other Hindu castes, and traces all the miseries and hardships which the lower castes have to suffer to the conservative policy of the Bráhmans, who, the correspondent adds, always keep their learning and knowledge to themselves and for whom foolish people from the other castes feel a sort of reverence, and whom, instead of assisting the industrial and educational institutions, they encourage in their idleness by subscribing to the funds started by them, such as the Indian National Congress funds, the horned cattle protection funds, &c. The correspondent concludes by praising the editor for the war which he has been waging against the Bráhmans and their influence over the other castes.

A complaint about the alleged selfishness of the Bráhmans.

21. A correspondent, writing from Shikárpur to the Phœnix (6) in its issue of the 14th October, says:—Theft is rife here. The burglars often find fitting opportunity to rob the poor residents. It is about a week since one Bhokhari named Shiwal was robbed of a sum of Rs. 5,000, mostly Tilas and Rasvas (Russian coin), and another Bhokhari's house was trespassed on and not less than 10 locks were broken open and property valued at Rs. 500 removed. None can bring these badmashes to book and up to this time they have preyed upon the community with impunity. The attention of the police authorities is invited to this fact. They should in the interests of the public, who for the most part pass the whole nights waking, keep strict watch over their subordinates and make them more careful in their respective duties, or else the public peace and safety will greatly be jeopardised.

Frequency of thefts at Shikárpur and a suggestion to the local police authorities.

Part II.—Education.

22. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 22nd October, writes:—Those who forced the University authorities to throw open the doors of their senatorial chamber to the representatives of the Fourth Estate, and thereby enabled the outside public to have a peep into the doings of that body, undoubtedly did a great service to the cause of education in this presidency. Those who will be able to effect the same in the case of the Syndicate will do a still greater service. None who has the least acquaintance with the nature of the business transacted by this cabinet of the University will, we are confident, hesitate to echo the sentiment we have expressed. Apart from the routine of general administration, this body of the fortunate eleven discharges functions of the highest importance—functions, a considerable portion of which does not, there being no legal provision to that effect, come before the Senate. Amongst these may be mentioned the appointment of text-books and examiners and the fixing of the scale of marks requisite for passing through an examination. How capriciously the books and the examiners are appointed needs no comment now. But both these functions, important as they are, fade in magnitude before the last, in respect of which, strange to say, the Syndicate exercises a power uncontrolled by the Senate. If there is any matter in which the sanction of the general body ought to be a condition precedent, that, in our opinion, is the scale of marks to pass. It is that which, laying down a hard and fast rule, warns the candidates as to the preparation that will be expected of them, and seals their fate at the annual ordeals. But the Senate evidently considers it a trifling matter and therefore delegates it to the Syndicate. We have not been led to make these remarks to-day without a cause. We hear that this body has recently fixed a scale of marks for some of the ensuing examinations. We do not know for which exactly, but the information that has somehow or other leaked out is that it is intended for the Previous, First B.A., and Second B.A. Examinations. The standard of passing till now was 25 per cent. in each subject and 33 per cent. on the whole. The one now fixed, we are told, is thus:—30 per cent. in each subject all round; or 45 per cent. in two subjects; or 60 per cent. in one. In the latter two cases, 25 per cent. will, we learn, suffice in the remaining subjects. Readers will see that this new scale, which, by the way, has not been, if really framed, officially announced to the forthcoming candidates opportunely enough to guide them in their preparations, as is necessary, makes a material difference. Till now it was not very difficult for the average candidate to secure 25 per cent. in each subject and 33 per cent. on the whole: getting 25 per cent. in the subjects in which he was weak and making up the total in those where he was strong. Now he will have to get 30 per cent. in each subject, if he is not able to score 45 or 60 per cent. as required. No doubt the total is reduced by 3 per cent., but the screw is tightened elsewhere, i.e., in raising the standard of passing in each subject by 5 per cent., barring the two exceptional provisions mentioned above. Ever since the information oozed out, there has been quite a sensation in the candidate world. But, that apart, the ground on which we base our complaint is the secrecy which is yet officially maintained. We unhesitatingly say that if it was thought necessary to alter the standard, the Senate ought to have been first consulted, and it should have been published at once for the information and guidance of the candidates. We fail to understand the necessity for the rumoured change. Next, we say that if the change has really been made, it is a matter of such a nature that, instead of the secrecy in which it has been shrouded, the widest publicity, as a matter of bare justice, ought to have been given to it immediately. The Syndicate, instead of working in the dark, must let in light on its deliberations, especially when they are so important and must move with the times.

Disapproval of the rumoured changes made by the Syndicate of the Bombay University in the scale of marks required for passing the higher examinations.

A scheme for improving the status of Training Colleges for training teachers for vernacular schools.

23. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 18th October, writes:—We hear that Ráo Sáheb M. B. Námjoshi of Poona has written a letter to the Chairman of the local School Board Committee, requesting that the Secretary of the board be authorised to open communications with the School Boards of other municipalities in the Central Division with a view to ascertain from them if they would co-operate with the Poona board in formulating a scheme for improving the status of colleges established for training teachers for vernacular schools. It is also suggested that the Educational Department of Government be moved to appoint a small committee consisting of the Principal of the Training College, Educational Inspector, C. D., and representatives of such municipalities as the Director of Public Instruction may select, to consider the subject and formulate a scheme for the organization and elevation of Training Colleges into Vernacular Arts Colleges, teaching through the medium of the language of the province. The scheme is an ambitious one and in advocating it the local School Board has laid itself open to the charge of meddling, to a certain extent, with matters with which it is not directly connected, at least not so directly connected as to come forward with the scheme above given. Whatever truth there may be in such a charge, we leave it to be fought over between the School Board on one hand and the department on the other. It will be readily admitted that the question is one of great public importance, and apart from the fact that it has been mooted by that School Board, it deserves a careful consideration at the hands of those who are interested in the development of the Indian vernaculars. Mr. Hart, in his lecture on the vernaculars recently delivered in Bombay, has clearly pointed out that the absorption of the conquerors into the conquered is impossible in this country, and the consequence of it is that vernaculars, whatever help they may derive from being brought into contact with the highly polished language of the conquerors, must depend for their development upon the energy and efforts of the educated classes in this country. If the truth of these observations be once admitted, we think it becomes the duty of every one of us to try our best and make an organised effort for the improvement and development of the vernaculars and their recognition by the highest educational institutions of the land and by the Government. Attempts are being made to introduce the vernaculars into the University curriculum, but the discussions on the subject show that there is little or no chance of the party of vernaculars succeeding, or, if they do at all, the success, if it could be so called, would be well nigh worth nothing. There is a strong opposition, reasonable or unreasonable, against the introduction of vernaculars into the University course, and it is quite evident that unless the subject is approached from some other side, there is no hope of any present success. Viewed in this light, the scheme suggested by the Poona School Board deserves to be carefully considered. The University has already recognised the School Final Examination, which avowedly has no connection with the higher education in the province. A degree in agriculture has been instituted; and it would not be too much to ask the University to affiliate colleges for training teachers for the vernacular schools. Instead of lowering the status of the University, the suggestion, if adopted, is sure to give dignity to the profession of the vernacular teacher and also to raise the status of the Indian vernaculars, with the result that in time to come it will pave the way for the introduction of the vernaculars into the University course. The department as well as the advocates of Indian vernaculars are, therefore, equally interested in the scheme, and if they make a combined effort to achieve their object the case is not hopeless. There are, however, some difficulties in the way, and before we take this scheme to the University we must be prepared with a solution of these. If the present Training Colleges are to be affiliated to the University and a vernacular degree is to be something like the present degree in Arts, it is sure to entail harder work upon the students of the Training Colleges in future and to require of them a higher standard of proficiency in the various branches of knowledge. But what will be the return, what the remuneration or the reward for this additional trouble and expense? The highest prospect now open to a student of the Training College is a place of Rs. 20 or 25 per mensem, and it stands to reason that if the department wishes to have better teachers it must increase the rate of remuneration. And then arises the important question, "How is this to be done?" The funds in the hands of the department are limited, and from what we know of the municipalities and local boards, they do not appear to be better situated in this behalf. The difficulty may be partially met by asking the University to recognise only the final examination for the post of a vernacular school-master and not to lay down too high a standard for it. But the solution will only be a temporary one, for the University will soon cease to look upon the examination from a purely business or departmental point of view, and no one will blame the University for doing so, as the very object of the scheme is to free vernaculars from the restriction and control to which they are subject in the present departmental arrangement. If the scheme, therefore, is to be adopted, sooner or later the department will have to find funds for increasing the salaries of vernacular teachers, at least in the principal schools of the province. Perhaps Government may be induced to recognise the University degree in vernaculars as a test for some of the higher places in its administrative departments. But this would evidently put a check on the present tendency of officials to prefer English-knowing men even for the most trifling posts under Government. We do not know if Government is prepared to check this tendency and be content with better educated but purely vernacular knowing people for most of the subordinate posts under Government. If it is, there is every chance that vernaculars will get the importance and the place to which they are entitled in the administration of the province, even under a foreign rule. The spread of English education during the last 30 or 40 years is a good illustration of what the Government can do in cases like this; and we are certain that a similar support and encouragement from Government will be attended with better results in the present instance.

24. The Dnyanodaya (12), in its issue of the 22nd October, writes:—We are glad to find the Mahratta seriously discussing the importance of establishing a Vernacular College in which all the instruction would be given in the vernacular. We have for many years earnestly advocated such a college. The young men of India are at a great disadvantage in having to learn the arts and sciences through the medium of a foreign tongue. Besides there are thousands, who might profit by a high education and who are without it simply because they have failed in their English at the time of the Matriculation Examination. If such colleges are ever established, they should have an altogether different aim than that of training men for Government service. Such colleges should rather turn the minds of their young men away from such service into those of professional, commercial, manufacturing and agricultural pursuits. It is one of the curses of this country that all the young men are seeking Government employ instead of striking out into other walks of life, where energy and force of character are needed.

25. The Anglo-Lusitano (165), in its issue of the 15th October, writes:—

Comments on the conduct of the Educational Department in recognizing the Patriarch as proprietor of the Ornellas School, Poona.

The Ornellas School established by the Native Christian community at Poona is, for all practical purposes, at an end. The news will be received with regret by all who know what sacrifices have been made by that community for the establishment and maintenance of the institution. To those who were aware of what was going at Poona for some time past the news will not come as a surprise. As for us, we refrained from giving prominence to the subject in the hope that the authorities concerned would conduct themselves with prudence and moderation and that matters would return to their former state. Now that the worst has happened and a valued institution has been sacrificed to the passions of certain ecclesiastics, we will not delay in commenting on the action of those who are responsible for the ruin of an institution which cost them nothing, but which cost our countrymen at Poona very great sacrifices, pecuniary as well as others. Then after strongly criticising the conduct of ecclesiastical authorities in the matter the paper observes:—We cannot close this article without animadverting on the conduct of the Educational Department in recognising the Patriarch as proprietor of the school. It will not do to say that the Educational Department was satisfied with the reasons adduced by His Grace to show that the school belonged to him. The school was already registered as the property of a third party, and that party might at least claim to be heard before the matter was decided. As it is, the Educational Department acted in a very offhand way, to say the least, in basing their action on one-sided representation. Besides, the Educational Department is not a court of justice to decide disputed proprietorship. It really looks curious that the educational authorities should, on the mere representation of a stranger, despoil a third party of his property, and a third party whom they had all along recognised as the rightful owner.

Defects in the inspection of Gujaráti schools and a recommendation to the Educational Inspector, N. D., in the matter.

26. The Praja Mat (119), in its issue of the 10th October, observes:—The local cess levied by Government mainly for the purpose of imparting education was not objected to by the people, because Government promised that its proceeds would be spent for the purpose intended, and we are glad that this was done for a long time. For the last 10 years, however, no proper attention has been paid to the matter. It is true that the number of schools has greatly increased, but at the same time the number of officers appointed to supervise them has so much increased that some of them seem to be idling away their time. The Educational Inspector does not seem to devote much attention to the improvement of Gujaráti schools and leaves the inspection of these schools to Deputies, to whose mercy the teachers are entirely left. The Deputies conduct the examinations in so superficial and queer a manner that it is not at all possible for them to correctly appreciate the teachers' work. Students who have devoted full twelve months to their study are examined in two or three minutes. If the teachers are bold to make some remarks about the qualifications of any individual student, the Deputy loses his temper and the result is that either the individual student or the whole class suffers. If by chance the teachers fail to make satisfactory arrangements for the accommodation of the Deputies during their inspection tour in the villages or to please them in any other way, they are transferred to unhealthy villages and kept there for a number of years, as the rule for transferring Government servants after a certain period does not obtain in this department, and they forfeit all chances of promotion. Even the clerks of the Deputies exercise undue influence on teachers, and these poor creatures are so much afraid of the Deputies that they dare not complain against them. If, therefore, Mr. Giles, Educational Inspector, N. D., were to visit Gujaráti schools and appoint days for the hearing of the complaints of teachers, he would do them much good.

Part III.—Municipalities.

A request to the Collector of Karáchi and the Commissioner in Sind to take notice of the disclosures about the carelessness of municipal officers at Karáchi made in the defamation case brought against the Sind Gazette.

27. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 17th October, writes:—What do the points brought out in the evidence and touched upon in the judgment of Mr. Hosking in the defamation case brought by Mr. Edalji Dinsha against the Sind Gazette show? There can be no manner of doubt that they do show, as remarked by the Judge, "great carelessness on the part of municipal officers" from the president, who is charged with the duty of watching "the financial and executive administration of the municipality" down to the storekeeper. But do they not also show that there may have been something worse than gross carelessness? Does not the whole matter require thorough overhauling? Is it not necessary in the interests of ratepayers that men who have displayed such culpable carelessness in the discharge of their duties should be immediately replaced by others in whom the public could put greater confidence? But although all this is necessary and would be admitted by every candid man, the municipality seem to have done nothing in the matter. A full fortnight has elapsed since the judgment was given, but no municipal commissioner seems to have moved in the matter and we doubt whether the municipality, considering how it is composed and that, perhaps the president himself will come in for a share of blame, will ever take action in the matter. It therefore behoves the Collector and the Commissioner to take early steps in the matter.

PART IV.—Native States.

Approval of the representative system of government introduced into the Mysore State and a suggestion to other Native States to copy it.

28. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 18th October, writes:—It is extremely to be regretted that out of the five important States Mysore should stand alone in practically demonstrating the superiority of the Native administration to the British one. Whenever the existence of a Native State is threatened the whole country is excited, and every endeavour is made to save the State from annihilation. It needs no statement that the subjects of British India have no direct interest in the preservation of Native States, but in spite of this fact the Native States command our best sympathies, and the only reason for this is that it is through well-governed Native States that we can prove our capacity for self-government. The consciousness of this fact makes us regret that Baroda, Gwalior, Indore and Hyderabad do not follow Mysore in this respect. Should the rulers of these States borrow a leaf from the history of Mysore, they will help us a good deal in our national aspirations. We have been asking Government to allow us the privilege of having our budget discussed at a meeting of representatives chosen by ourselves. Mysore alone gives an opportunity of showing that the discussion of the annual financial statement by the representatives of the people benefits the State as well as the people. We really do not see why an intelligent and educated Prince like the Mahárája of Baroda should not introduce the system of placing the budget of the State before his people. We also think that elective municipalities should convene a meeting of ratepayers once in twelve months and place their budgets and annual reports before those whose funds they administer. The move would be in the right direction. Government would hail such a measure and would watch the growth of such annual gatherings with interest. Leading citizens would very much like to see their representatives giving to them every twelve months an account of their stewardship and spreading political education for which elective municipalities were established. Native States and elective municipalities are situated alike, and the Native administrators who have in their hands the destinies of millions ought to endeavour to show that they are doing within the little scope allowed to them what they can to train useful citizens. The State of Mysore has been doing its best for the last ten years to increase its popularity, and the Mahárája and the Diwán would certainly receive encouragement in their noble work if their example were followed in other places. Practical statesmen naturally find little consolation in empty words of praise. They naturally expect that their labours should find adequate compensation in worthy following. The Representative Assembly at Mysore can now no longer be said to be in its experimental stage, and it is time that we should follow the good example set to us by the late lamented Ranga Charlu. Here is a practical reform which can be carried out without the help of Government, without any fresh treaty, and, what is most important, without any extra expenditure. As suggested above, some of the municipalities might also well copy the example without requiring any change in legislation. If we thus succeed in carrying out this one reform we shall prove to Government our earnestness and our sincerity. As matters stand at present we naturally lead Government to hesitate in giving us the privileges we pray for, because we ourselves do not show our readiness to make the concessions to those whose rulers we are in local matters. We therefore earnestly request the rulers of the principal Native States in India to introduce into their territories the representative system of government, which has worked so admirably for the last ten years at Mysore, and for which the best thanks of the public are due to the enlightened Mahárája of Mysore and his worthy Diwán.

29. The Arunodayá (21), in its issue of the 18th October, says:—The treatment which a crowned Prince has received at the hands of a barrister while in the witness box has given us great pain; we allude to His Highness the Nizám and Mr. Inverarity. His Highness the Nizám was treated like a common witness; questions were put to His Highness which had better been not asked; grave State matters were dragged into light. In short, as there are no records of a crowned head being put into a witness-box, the action of His Highness has, we think, lowered him greatly in public opinion in spite of the proclamation issued by His Highness on the subject. We disapprove of the very idea of a crowned head coming into a Court of law and giving evidence like a common person.

Disapproval of His Highness the Nizám's coming into a Court of law as a witness.

30. The Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 22nd October, observes:—There is very little hope of improvement at Jámnagar, as there are two factions in that State, and the policy of the Diwán is time-serving. The Jám appointed Mr. Wádia on special duty and Rághav Khavás was dismissed, but the State has not been purged of the oppression of Karsan Khavás and of Jánbái. Even Rághav himself has not met condign punishment and it is not impossible that he may one day regain the favour of the Jám, who is a mere puppet in the hands of Khaváses and Náykans. Mr. Wádia having been tired of the fickle-mindedness of the Jám has resigned his office, and if he had submitted a report it would have been very much against the Chief and his management. It is strange that the Political Agent does not interfere in the affairs of the State, and if it is true that the reins of administration are in the Jám's hands we fear he will meet with the fate of the Manipur Mahárája. We request the Political Agent to place the State under the management of an able helmsman, who will steer it clear of all rocks and shoals.

Alleged mismanagement in the Jámnagar State and a request to the Political Agent, Káthiáwár.

31. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 18th October, writes:—The Congress of Orientalists has brought many important questions to notice. A very interesting paper was read before it by Major-General Showers embodying hints as to how the Political Agents should behave towards the Chiefs in their Agency. Amongst other things the paper suggests that Political Agents ought always to avoid conduct which is calculated to place the servant over the head of his master. Were we so inclined we could cite many instances in which the unfortunate result had been most glaring. In our own province we have two large groups of Native States and we fear the traditional policy pursued by the Residents has been productive of such results in both the groups. But latterly there has been a marked difference for the better. We know that we now have good Agents, better Diwáns and educated Chiefs, and their relations are generally more amicable than in days of old. There is, however, much room for improvement yet. In Káthiáwár the States are independent of each other and one factor of complication is absent. In the Southern Marátha group, however, we have some independent and some semi-independent States. These latter have to please two masters, the Council of Administration at Kolhápur and the Political Agent. In this double duty many oftentimes fail and incur the displeasure of the one or the other. This anomalous state is neither useful nor desirable. We therefore suggest that the Council of Administration at Kolhápur should endeavour to form federal union with its feudatories. Such a union will strengthen the administration, improve its efficiency and reduce expenditure. Out of the five feudatory States of Kolhápur only one will remain a good long time under a minority. The four are or are about to be placed under their rulers and we think the present time is best suited for such an arrangement. We hope Colonel Wodehouse will take up this suggestion and secure to himself the credit of reorganising the States to suit the times.

A suggestion in connection with the reorganization of Native States in the Southern Marátha Country.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ á) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Russian and British policies contrasted.

1. In alluding to Reuter's telegram of the 24th October about the famine in Russia and His Imperial Majesty the Czar's alleged indifference to it, the Kdsid-e-Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 28th October, says that the distress prevailing in Russia being such as will move even a hard-hearted man, the reported callousness of His Imperial Majesty the Czar is sure to cause surprise in India, since the British Government is always ready to sympathise with its subjects at such sore times, as was evidenced in the recent famines at Madras. In deference to public opinion, adds the paper, His Excellency the Governor of Madras undertook the by-no-means easy task of visiting several of the distressed districts, famine works were started in them, and the destitute provided with food at the public expense and thus relieved from the throes of starvation. The Kdsid, after thus showing the difference between the Russian and the British administration, observes that the latter is the best of the two and may continue in India for ever.

The Russian policy and the Amir of Kabul.

2. The Gujardt Mitrd (86), in its issue of the 25th October, observes :—Russia is advancing nearer and nearer India every day. She is fast making friends and trying to get territories. She has befriended the Shah of Iran and the once formidable Ayub Khan. She is also planning to win over the Amir of Afghanistan. Evidently the Amir is dissatisfied with the way in which His Excellency the Viceroy of India treats him, and is therefore desirous of going to England to place his grievances before Her Most Gracious Majesty the Empress Victoria. The Viceroy, instead of treating the Amir on a footing of equality, tries to bring pressure to bear upon him, which the Amir resents. It is believed that the Amir's object in going to England is to request the Queen-Empress to make him independent of the Viceroy of India. If Her Majesty does not listen to this request, we fear the Amir will publicly go over to Russia and become her avowed friend. Russia's advance into the Pamir district is fraught with danger, and though China and England have entered a protest against it her progress does not seem to be checked in any way. She is proceeding ostensibly in defiance of China's wishes, but we are afraid that she has secretly come to an understanding with that country. Thus a war in the near future seems to be imminent.

Disapproval of the sentiments expressed by the Pioneer about the fate of the Anglo-Indians in the event of a Russian conquest of India.

3. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 26th October, says :—We disapprove of the sentiments expressed by the Pioneer about the fate of the Anglo-Indians in the event of a Russian conquest of India. It is true that Russia will ill-treat Anglo-Indians after the conquest, but is there no remedy to prevent her coming to this country at all ? It seems that the British have no confidence in any one in India, and that their rule over this country for the last many years has been of no use. England being a wealthy nation and having control over 25 millions of Indian subjects, we do not understand why a favourite organ of Government like the Pioneer should give expression to such unmanly utterances as it has done. The Pioneer should remember well that if the Indian subjects are kept contented, they will not allow any one to touch even a single hair of the Englishmen in India.

British rule in India as compared with that in Ceylon.

4. A correspondent of the Jdm-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 27th October, says :—On comparing the British rule in India with that in Ceylon, one can at once see a marked difference between the administrations of the two dependencies. Ceylon has a Parliament of its own to enact laws, while in India that most important political assembly is wanting. On looking at the expenditure in India and at that of Ceylon one again sees a wonderful difference. The officers in Ceylon receive only half the pay received by their more fortunate brethren in India. Taking the climate, the length of the passage, the amount of work and such other kindred subjects into consideration, one cannot explain the cause of this difference in pay. There is only one apparent explanation, and that is the laxity of the Indian Budget. The expenses in India are increasing every year, and how are they to be met otherwise than by reducing the salaries of the State officers, discontinuing the practice of importing Europeans and giving their places to Natives, who would feel even grateful to receive smaller salaries?

Increase of population in the Bombay Presidency as shown by the revised census.

5. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—The revised census of the Bombay Presidency is published, and we find it sufficiently interesting. There is a substantial growth of 24 lakhs of people, which is equal to an annual percentage of nearly 1½. Whether the Government considers this phenomenon a subject for congratulation or lamentation we cannot say. But judging from the wail which has emanated from certain quarters where population has been rapidly increasing, it would not be inaccurate to say that this increase is considered more a curse than a blessing. From the purely economic point of view, it must be admitted to be an evil in a country situated like ours, with almost an exhausted soil and poor produce, and an impoverished peasantry which is never out of indebtedness. It is yet a moot question whether the food produce of the country is sufficient, in case of a universal famine, for even 10 days' consumption. No doubt, our railways have doubled during the decade, our irrigation canals have been more numerous, while cultivation of waste lands has progressed at a rapid pace. Still the whole question, when sifted in all its bearings, hinges on this only: Is the food grown now sufficient to feed the increased millions? And if not, how is the Government to cope with this problem? For it should be remembered that each day that it remains unsolved adds to the difficulty of the situation; and it would be want of statesmanship either to ignore or postpone it.

The grievances of the people in Sind which the Sind Sabha is requested to include in the address to be presented by that body to His Excellency Lord Harris on the latter's visit to Sind.

6. A correspondent of the Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 21st October, says:—I suggest a few matters which, in my humble opinion, should find suitable places in the address to be presented to His Excellency Lord Harris by the Sind Sabha. You are probably aware that by a strange irony of fate our popular Commissioner in Sind is pressing the municipalities of Shikárpur and Hyderabad to impose the unpopular house-tax, though they are not in want of funds at all. There is not a soul in either town who does not abhor the very name and conception of the tax, and yet it is an open secret that at least the municipality of Shikárpur must be prepared for suspension and degradation if it does not carry out the wishes of the Commissioner. Had the condition of the municipal funds urgently demanded the imposition of the tax there would have been some excuse for it, but it passes ordinary understanding how and why, under the present circumstances, it should be found necessary to throw a calamity upon the people, especially when the municipality is prepared to meet any lawful expenses which the Commissioner may direct it to defray without having recourse to the odious tax. It is worthy of note that when the octroi duties were reduced at the desire of the Government it was expressly stipulated that the municipality would not be bound to spend anything for any purpose beyond the municipal limits, and yet in deference to the wishes of the authorities and the people it pays its quota to the College and the Madressa, and the other funds. If any further breach of faith in this respect is to be permitted, then it would be far better to enhance the octroi duties than to impose the house tax. Unfortunately, octroi duties on grain and other commodities mean partly duties on export, and here is the rub. Indeed, no more ingenious way of discrediting local self-government without fault could be devised. Poor municipal commissioners! to be or not to be is now the only question for them to decide. They are probably aware that under the recent resolution of the Government of India they, or at least their successors, are no longer to be Ráo Sáhebs and Khán Sáhebs. As a counterpart of this affair, the local boards have been asked to levy the shop-tax. It need not be demonstrated that the above taxes will be additional burdens on income, like the income tax, equally oppressive and reprehensible, and that they will administer a severe and effectual blow to trade, building operations and the improvement of the towns. It is also believed that the income tax returns show pretty well whether and how far Sind is flowing with milk and honey. But pray, why should the Commissioner force the imposition of the taxes which are neither imperial nor provincial, but local and municipal? Should not the voice of the people be respected to some extent, at least in their own affairs? The above for the time being is one of the principal items for the serious consideration of His Excellency. The other curious thing is that, while the whole province is crying for the reconstitution of the Sadar Court, the Commissioner in Sind thinks, for the reasons given by him in reply to the memorial of the Sind Mahomedan Association, that the presidency itself should envy Sind, in that it has got only one Judge presiding over its highest Court. What have the Judges of the Bombay High Court, except one, to say to this? Is the presidency going to part with them? The wonder is that the Commissioner in Sind not only differs from the public as regards the modus operandi, but denies the very factum of the necessity for the desired change. The reasons given by him speak for themselves and show in comparison the strength, or, it may be, the weakness, of those urged in support of it. At any rate, these must be pointed out clearly, however unpleasant the task may be. The other demands of the province in regard to its Courts should also be urged, as well in the name of charity and fairness as for the sake of justice and the prestige of the British name. Would His Excellency tolerate that there should be no permanent additional Judge at Shikárpur, and consequently an actual and total denial of civil justice? Should the Mirpur Batoro division have a Subordinate Court of its own, but a Judge of borrowing? Should civil justice be administered in the Thár and Párkar Districts at present as it was in the rest of Sind in the days of the Kalberee and the Amirs? These are some of the standing anomalies which call for speedy removal. Official opinion on the above questions unfortunately does not coincide with that of the public, but then who is to represent the people of Sind and be the mouthpiece of the dumb millions, if not the Sind Sabha?

7. The Sind Sudhár (163), in its issue of the 17th October, writes :—

Disapproval of the intended imposition of house and shop taxes in Hyderabad, Sind.

There are only a very few people in the town of Hyderabad who can be classed "rich." Most of the people have built houses by contracting debts. Under such circumstances, the imposition of a house tax seems improper. In ordering the levy of the house tax in the towns of Hyderabad, Sukkur and Shikárpur, the Commissioner in Sind seems to have been actuated by the consideration that this kind of tax is levied in Karáchi. But we pray that the Commissioner in Sind as well as the members of the corporation may be pleased to consider the fact that in the town of Karáchi the house rent is exorbitant and that the landowners build houses to realize the rent. But such is not the case in other towns. We therefore hope that all the municipal commissioners will unite on this subject as one man, and make a suitable arrangement for the people in the matter. We hear that the Tapedárs and other subordinate officials of Government are engaged in collecting statistics regarding the income and stock of each shop in the town of Hyderabad. They say that the Commissioner in Sind intends imposing the shop tax. We are unable to say how far this is true. But the imposition of taxes after taxes upon the people is a measure ruinous to the country. Under Section 4 of Act VIII of 1865 the Commissioner in Sind is empowered to levy the shop tax. This Act is also applicable to the province of Sind. But its jurisdiction extends only to such areas as are not comprised within the municipal limits. As a matter of fact, the imposition of any such tax on any grounds whatsoever is unnecessary. During the period of 26 years which has elapsed since the passing of Act VIII of 1865 no Commissioner has ever levied this tax. Moreover, there is no necessity for imposing any additional burden upon the people, seeing that there is a surplus in the local boards balance. The people are already groaning under the pressure of the income tax, and if the shop tax is imposed upon them they will be reduced to a miserable plight.

8. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 29th October, says :—

A committee appointed to consider the utility of the Agriculturists' Relief Act and the absence of a Native member therein.

We hear that His Excellency the Viceroy is going to appoint a committee of five European members to consider and report on the expediency of the Agriculturists' Relief Act and its application. This is a subject of great importance to all the natives of India, and yet it is to be discussed, commented upon and finally passed or rejected by five Europeans without their being assisted by any Native gentleman. This is how India is treated. We do not know why Europeans alone are thought fit to consider and decide upon Indian matters. Unrepresented India must put up with all this.

Remarks on the draft regulations issued by the Chief Secretary to the Bombay Government regarding the use of opium by medical practitioners.

9. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 26th October, writes:—The Chief Secretary to the Bombay Government has issued a circular proposing certain draft regulations for the use of opium by medical practitioners, which are to supersede the existing regulations and which lay more severe restrictions than those at present. The Chief Secretary has invited from the public an expression of opinion as to the regulations, and several of the practitioners have, we dare say, urged their objections. It is proposed to lay down that a medical practitioner shall keep any opium or its preparations at his place of business only and nowhere else, that he shall not prescribe any mixture over 4 ounces containing even a trace of opium to any patient in any one day, and that he shall keep a regular account of the sale of opium and submit it to any officer authorised by the Collector of Customs whenever demanded, and so on. Any one who reads the circular carefully will be convinced of the unreasonableness of the restrictions the Opium Department wishes to enforce, and the hardships they will entail on patients if passed into law. Any person who is not a medical man is allowed by the Opium Act to keep 10 tolas of opium without a license for the same, while a medical practitioner who may need it any time of the day or night and holds a license cannot, it would seem, keep even a grain of opium at his place of residence if it does not happen to be the place of his business also. Medical practitioners are granted special licenses, which show that Government have always intended to give them the special facilities necessary for the practice of their profession as regards the use of opium, and we cannot understand why they should now propose to throw special difficulties in their way. The conditions of the license as they now stand are enough to prevent smuggling, which seems to be the only object of the Opium Department; and no cases have been brought forward to show that smuggling is carried on by medical practitioners. If it were so, the zealous inspectors of the department, who, as will be seen from the papers, are daily prosecuting smugglers, would not have failed to track out the offenders. If the new clauses are inserted into the Act, any opium inspector may demand from a medical practitioner an account of the opium in his possession when the latter may be very busy. He will in that case have to leave his business aside and satisfy the demand of the inspector. Besides, the inspector may call on a medical practitioner as often as he likes, say even ten times a month, and thus be a source of annoyance and friction, the number of his visits during a specified time not being fixed by the rules. The greatest hardship arising out of the proposed changes will be that a medical practitioner will be prevented from prescribing crude opium to any patient, even if it were necessary to save his life. Similarly, if a patient has been given a four-ounce mixture containing, say, one grain of opium in the morning, and if he again must be given opium in the evening, the new clause says that a medical practitioner shall not prescribe any more opium even if the patient were going to lose his life without it. The new clauses, it is plain, will therefore be only mischievous in their result. We trust the Government, with whom the passing of the clauses into law finally rests, will give their serious consideration to them, and prevent the annoyance and mischief they are likely to cause, by not passing them into law. [The Akhbár-e Soddgar (95), in its issue of the 29th October, expresses similar sentiments.]

Orders of Mr. Candy, the Collector of Sátára, anent the income tax disapproved.

10. A correspondent of the Mod Vritt (51), in its issue of the 29th October, says:—Long before Mr. Candy came to Sátára as Collector it was rumoured that he was very kind and just, but he has turned out to be quite the contrary, for, no Collector has been so greedy and illegal in his actions as he. He has issued a general order to all the Mámlatdárs in the Collectorate to raise at once the income tax assessments, already made, on the ground of their being very low. The fact is that the first assessment itself was very heavy, the Mámlatdár of Wái not having consulted the people or examined their books; so this order for raising the tax is simply oppressive and illegal. The Sárvajanik Sabha of Wái should make a petition to Government, protesting against this order of the Collector, and stop paying the increase till it receives a reply from Government.

Appointment of Mr. Chitty as Acting Chief Judge of the Bombay Small Causes Court, and the alleged supersession of the claims of several able Natives.

11. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—Mr. Chitty has been again nominated to an important post for reasons best known to the authorities. Another young barrister, who had not perhaps even as much criminal practice as Mr. Chitty, has been appointed Acting Presidency Magistrate. None of them has studied any of the vernaculars of the presidency or has distinguished himself at the bar. They are not of ten years' standing and there is absolutely nothing special about their attainments or talents. Yet in India it is a principle that members of the ruling class are fit for any post at any time. Lord Reay discouraged the application of this principle in the Grant Medical College, where for years there was a tradition that any Professor was fitted for giving lectures on any subject. A principle which has been discredited in the Educational Department is not necessarily inapp icable in the Judicial Department. That seems to be the view of Government in making the recent nominations. A young inexperienced English barrister is entitled to become an examiner at the LL.B. or the District Pleaders' or High Court Pleaders' examination. He can become an excellent Law Professor. He is a fit recipient of one of the many sinecure appointments at the High Court. He is entitled to the Chief Judgeship of the Small Causes Court or to the post of the Chief Presidency Magistrate. At the sessions of the High Court English junior barristers have almost the whole field to themselves, because it is the pleasure of the Crown to engage their services. Poor Native barristers, they are unqualified for any of these posts! Apart from the injustice with which these latter are treated, we must say Mr. Chitty's nomination is the greatest piece of injustice to the claims of eminent Natives in the judicial service. In this presidency one can hardly point to an abler judicial officer than Ráo Bahádur Mahádev Govind Ránade. It is well-known that he was among the eligible candidates for the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Justice Nánábhái Haridás. So far as intellectual capacity is concerned, he stands foremost among the old and new generation of the educated Natives. Government, for some reason or other, have persistently ignored his claims. We hope the circumstance that he is a tall poppy has not stood in his way. There are other tried judicial officers who have rendered honest and zealous services to Government, and we fail to see why they should be superseded in favour of a young gentleman whose main qualification can be described in the sentence that he is an English barrister. The Native bar has grown in its ability, prestige and reputation during the last decade, and it is preposterous that any unreasonable distinctions should now be maintained between High Court pleaders and barristers. A High Court pleader of more than twenty years' standing has no chances of being appointed Chief Presidency Magistrate, but an inexperienced barrister, ignorant of the vernaculars and who has never distinguished himself, gets the post even without asking for it. Will the Native community submit to such anomalous rules, which afford no scope for the talents of the ablest of them? We hope the Presidency Association will again take up the matter and forward a memorial to the Secretary of State on the subject. At the same time steps should be taken to move Parliament. What we want is no favouritism but justice, and when justice is withheld, thinking Natives would stamp themselves as unworthy of their education, if they rest content with less than what is their due. We had thought, and the public also believed, that Sir Raymond West's judicial experience was a guarantee against unsatisfactory nominations, but we are sorry to confess that he has disappointed almost every one who has given a thought to this somewhat unpleasant subject of public importance.

Remarks on the inferences drawn by Anglo-Indians about Native morality from individual cases.

12. The same newspaper writes:—The recent defalcations brought to light at Calcutta and Bombay have set some people a-thinking about the comparative merits of Native and European employés in public companies and banks. Some critics who made themselves merry at the expense of the Brâhman Mámlatdárs during the Crawford trial and wrote jauntily about the foibles of the Brâhman delinquents and the infinite superiority of their worthy selves and of their own communities, must have been convinced by this time that among the non-Bráhmans also are to be found offenders, equally great, if not greater. If disclosures had been made in full at the time, those who gloated over the weaknesses of the erring officers would have heard startling revelations, which would have created a sensation not only in this country but even in England. When instances of gross fraud or corruption or of cruel offences are before the public, there is always a tendency to generalize from individual cases and condemn whole communities. It is forgotten in the midst of the excitement of the hour that human nature is everywhere more or less the same, and when there are tempting opportunities, Hindus, Mahomedans, Pársis and Europeans will more or less succumb to the temptation, however ignoble or degrading, and it is only those who are ignorant of the natural infirmities of human nature that pounce upon individual instances and write in a derisive tone about the enormity of other people. We commented last time upon the proposal of the Directors of the Oriental Insurance Company to import from England European assistants, and we still adhere to what we have said, that in the absence of effective checks and the ordinary precautions Europeans will be scarcely better than Natives. We have had cases recently in which European guards did not honestly discharge their trust. The history of the "Golden Gang" cannot have been so soon forgotten by our readers. Three months ago the Honourable Mr. Justice Farran tried and sentenced a European forest ranger for embezzling Government money. Without pronouncing our opinion one way or the other as to the probable result of the Imperial Diamond case, we may mention here that Mr. Jacob has been formally committed to the sessions. This very week the public have been informed by Reuter that Mr. Dubedat, the chairman of the Dublin Stock Exchange, has been convicted on a charge of defrauding his clients, and has been sentenced to eight years' penal servitude. It is common with some Judges in India to discredit Native witnesses by telling the jury that perjured evidence grows up in this country like mushroom, and the result of such prejudiced views has been disastrous in some important cases. Only a few weeks ago we quoted an extract from the most well-known and influential law journal in England that perjury is increasing in England at a rapid pace and that religion is no preventive against perjured and false evidence. Pigott forgeries are almost without a precedent in the criminal annals of any country in the world. All these facts are a warning against extravagant inferences and one-sided conclusions against any race or community. Some Anglo-Indians indulge in extravagant language about the superiority of their morality and the degraded moral state of the natives of this country. That Englishmen at home have not a very high opinion of their countrymen here is a matter of frequent comment in the columns of the Anglo-Indian journals. That opinion may be right or wrong, but the fact should serve as a useful admonition against tall talk. The Age of Consent Bill brought into light many a weak point in the marriage institutions of the Hindus. Whatever the necessity for that measure in India, we showed that in England the number of outrages on young girls was larger than in this country. As regards domestic morality the recent scandals of the Divorce Court which have wrecked the reputation of well-known politicians and lords are a salutary check against any confident inferences. The Baccarat and other scandals ought to soften even Sir Lepel Griffin, who wrote about Native Princes toying with women and indulging in wine. Human nature is alike everywhere, and that is why there are so many instructive coincidences. That is why history repeats itself on a larger or smaller scale in this world. The same motives and the same temptations operate on the mind of man, and with a due allowance to his surroundings he plays a more or less similar part. If critics bore in mind this sober truth, which is the result of applying the comparative method to ordinary matters, they would considerably sober down in their comments and take a more dispassionate view of men and things in general.

13. The Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—We fully sympathise with the Hindus, who assembled lately to make a mild, but fervent, protest against handbills issued by Christian missionaries on Gokul Ashtami day. The publication contained some objectionable comments upon some of the Hindu divinities, principally Krishna, who occupies an honourable place in the Hindu pantheon, and it must be taken as an aggravating circumstance that the distribution broadcast of the objectionable handbills was made on the very day sacred to Krishna. Men have even been at variance in their ideas about the highest forms of truth. They have savagely hated one another for the love of God, and have tortured, mutilated and killed those who thought differently from what they considered to be the correct estimate of God and religion. Although the days of the Inquisition are over, and men in power no longer enforce their views by the stake and the sword, the wide gulf separating the spiritual and theological creeds of men has not grown a whit less with the progress of humanity and toleration. The basis of British rule in India is religious toleration, but the toleration would be turned to mischievous abuse if the votaries of one religion were allowed to wound the tenderest susceptibilities of the votaries of another by casting reflections upon their religion. The object for which the Christian missionaries are sent out is proselytizing, and in pursuance of that object it is their duty, no doubt, to preach the supreme excellence of their own faith in such a manner as may be calculated to make the strongest impression upon the "heathens" around them. It also stands to reason that, in order to convince people of the necessity of securing everlasting bliss by embracing Christianity, as the only means of obtaining it, they must make a comparison of it with the other religions. If they were to do this by reasoning, arguments and illustrations, there would be no ground for complaint, even though they may naturally be swayed by bias in their treatment of the subject. The handbills in question, however, do not indicate such rational handling of the subject. Their author has evidently considered that he would have best promoted the cause of Christianity by casting reflections on one of the Hindu gods. Such publications frustrate the very object in view. They only serve to rally the people more firmly round their gods and render it more difficult than ever for the militant Christian to break through their serried ranks. Without taking a very serious view of these handbills we may generally observe as a truth, not unknown to any one in India, that this country is most inflammable in religious matters and that attacks by members of one religion upon the faith of others may any day constitute a grave political danger. Public safety, combined with the principle of toleration, demands that Government should not allow the irreverent jesting and scoffing of anybody's religion.

Remarks on the handbill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society on the Gokul Ashtami holiday of the Hindus.

14. The Ahmedabad Times (93), in its issue of the 28th October, observes :— The handbill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society on the Gokul Ashtami holiday is in distinct violation of the terms of the Queen's Proclamation in the matter of non-interference in religious matters, and if the Government connives any further at this reproachable conduct of the Rev. Baba Padmanji, the impression will gain ground that the British Government too, like the Mahomedans, wish for the propagation of their own religion and do not care if the religions of the Natives are insulted. We recommend the Hindus to make a strong and united protest against this objectionable conduct of the missionaries, and we feel sure that the British Government will not disregard it.

A request to Government as regards the handbill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society on the last Gokul Ashtami day.

15. In commenting on the same handbill, the Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 28th October, says :— We do not understand why Government should have remained quite silent over this affair when it is their duty to protect their subjects in all matters including religion. If the British Government thinks that it is not good for it to protect the religion of its Hindu subjects, what difference is there between it and the ancient Mahomedan rulers of India, who went about with the Kuran in one hand and the sword in the other ? Leaving aside the point of religion, the contents of the handbill in question are such as are to be condemned as being obscene, and Government will maintain their dignity if they come forward and act up to their creed. Although deprived of arms, the Indian subjects have, on account of their inherent good disposition, wished well of the British Government, because the latter has not offended their religious feelings. Of all things the people of India love religion most. We are sure the Government will discharge their duty towards their subjects on this occasion and preserve the kind feelings which the subjects entertain for them.

16. The Várdhar (20), in its issue of the 25th October, says:—The Bombay Police ought, in the first place, to stop at once the preaching of the Christian religion on public roads by Native converts, for on such occasions the gods of the Hindus are most vilely abused by them, and, in the second place, the police aid given them at such times ought to be discontinued. There are two reasons for this latter suggestion: the first is that the preacher, relying on the support of the police, abuses the Hindu gods very freely and fearlessly, and the second reason is that the police sepoys take undue advantage of this position of theirs in abusing their official authority sometimes even with respect to gentlemen.

Some suggestions to the police of Bombay as regards the preaching of the Christian religion on public roads.

17. A lady correspondent, writing to the Chanddnshu (26) of the 25th October, says:—I am very glad that efforts are being made by the Hindu reformers to give liberty to women in social matters; but I think that the time for the emancipation of women has not as yet come. Liberty at an inopportune time will turn the heads of women, and they being uneducated, a complication of domestic miseries will arise, blasting the happiness of home. The efforts of social reformers to stop the shaving of Hindu widows and to make remarriages more popular are very good in themselves; but the reformers will do better to leave these matters alone. What is the use of increasing the population of the country which is already over-populated and taking away a check on the increase, when the population already existing has no sufficient bread and salt to eat or clothing to cover its very nakedness? Salt is over-taxed and has gone almost out of the reach of the poor. It will be better if the reformers turn their attention to grievances of this type and leave widow-marriage to itself. [The Shri Shivaji (67), in its issue of the 23rd October, expresses similar sentiments and advises Government not to interfere in Hindu social customs by enacting fresh laws, as that would hurt the feelings of the majority of the people, the people interested in this matter being only a small minority of social reformers.]

Advice to Hindu social reformers, asking them to let alone widow-marriages, &c., and devote themselves wholly to more important subjects.

18. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 26th October, says that owing to the negligence of the Superintendent and Jailor of the Yerowda Jail one Dnyánu Bhiwa Pátil, an inhabitant of Nátoli, peta Shirola, táluka Válva of the Sátára District, was, in spite of his remonstrance, illegally kept in that jail for about twelve days more than the period to which he had been sentenced to be imprisoned for committing a theft, and that on a complaint being lodged by the said Dnyánu in the First Class Magistrate's Court and the latter having enquired into the matter the Superintendent of the Jail is said to have apologised for his mistake. If the above be true, adds the Pratod, it is surprising to see that the Superintendent should be guilty of culpable negligence such as that of illegally keeping a man in prison, and it is proper that the jail authorities should give an explanation of this matter.

Alleged illegal detention for about 12 days of a convict in the Yerowda Jail and the negligence of the Jail Superintendent in the matter.

19. A correspondent of the Akhbár-e-Sodágar (95), in its issue of the 30th October, writing from Marmagoa, says:—The postal arrangements at this place are not at all satisfactory. Complaints are received every day about mismanagement in this department; letters and cards are every day reported to be lost in transit, and to remedy this gentlemen are required to employ servants privately to take their letters to and from Vengurla and Castle Rock. Letters containing cheques and directed to Bombay seldom reach their destination. The telegraph is very well worked, being under British management, and if the British Government take the Postal Department too under its control, the people will be very happy.

A request to Government to take the post at Marmagoa under its control.

20. The Aftab-i-Sind (158), in its issue of the 14th October, writes:—In former times the orders of Government were so firm that one would suppose they were written upon a stone. But in these days one is surprised that the orders passed by the officers of the Forest Department are changed so frequently. At one time the officers of that department declare that in such and such a year no cultivation will be permitted within the forest limits. Shortly after, when some wealthy Zamindárs go and arrange with the subordinate officials in the head office, the former orders are cancelled and the lands given to the new Zamindárs. The original Zamindárs and their tenants are at a loss to understand how the orders already issued are suddenly changed.

A complaint about frequent changes in the orders passed by the Forest Department in Sind.

Part II.—Education.

Remarks on the educational policy of His Excellency Lord Harris as disclosed in the speeches made by His Excellency in reply to the addresses presented to him at Ahmednagar and Sholápur.

21. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 26th October, writes:—His Excellency Lord Harris has gone on a short visit to Ahmednagar and Sholápur and we have had telegraphic reports of the important speeches His Lordship has made at the two places. It is clear from the note of caution that pervades the speeches that Lord Harris is not quite the cricketer Governor which some of us were expecting to see in him. Of course, his speeches have not pleased many of our friends; but that need not make us despond of the next three or four years of his rule. But what is really disheartening is the absence of all encouragement and sympathy with the cause of secondary and high education. We are aware that the calls upon the purse of Government are heavy and frequent, but when we cannot get money, is it too much to expect sympathy? In proof of our remarks, we refer to the Sholápur and the Nagar speeches. In the first, we feel so hopeless as we read it that we are tempted to ask whether it is worth while laying our grievances before our rulers. The Sholápur speech gives strength to our suspicions that the new revised quinquennial contract will see a considerable reduction in the educational budget of this presidency. But we will wait and see.

Comments on the speech made by the Honourable Sir Raymond West at the Native Institution, Poona.

22. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—The Honourable Sir Raymond West was not justified in making the remarks he did about municipal contribution to the Native Institution at Poona. As a member of Government in charge of the Educational Department, Sir Raymond ought to have fuller knowledge of the facts. He spoke of the claims of the institution as if it was the only institution in the city to which the municipality contributed or must contribute. There are institutions in Poona which have equal, if not better, claim to municipal aid, but which receive little. The municipality have to be just before they can be generous. But excepting these observations, the remarks of Sir Raymond, those particularly which refer to the influence of the character of the teacher on his pupils, deserve the careful consideration of the managers of our educational institutions, and we hope they will receive due attention at their hands. That is the only way in which students can be impressed with a due sense of their duties and responsibilities in after-life, and every one will admit that we are in great want of teachers of character and learning combined. Sir Raymond is sure to be taken to task by some of our contemporaries for once more emphasizing caste distinctions, and that, too, in a manner which will leave a deep impression. It is extremely to be regretted that the hereditary superiority which the Bráhmans possess over other classes in intellectual pursuits is being gradually lost, not by the effects of time but by the mischievous action of a few individuals whom circumstances have placed in a position where they are most powerful for mischief. Recent events have shown who these persons are and what their ways of mischief are. Their names, too, are no secrets. To these gentlemen we recommend Sir Raymond's observations, and pray that they may give up their work of destruction, especially as they themselves declare they are incapable of constructing.

23. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 26th October, writes:—Since our last issue was out, the reporters have put us in possession of the full text of the Honourable Sir R. West's speech delivered on the occasion of the prize distribution of the Poona Native Institution. As coming from the educationist, par excellence of the present régime, the speech deserves more than a passing notice. As coming from a member of the Government of Bombay, presided over by His Excellency Lord Harris, and led in educational matters by two such strong bureaucrats as Sir Charles Pritchard and Mr. Lee-Warner, the speech is one which will furnish ample material for reflection; and the minds, not only of the Poona people, but of other leading towns as well, will be greatly exercised by the not-very-concealed indications the speech gives of what our indigenous institutions for higher education have to expect from Government if the present policy is not changed. It is not because it is the fashion of the day to oppose Governmental measures that we to-day oppose Government in their new and ill-considered policy—new, because we firmly believe that neither the great Educational Despatch nor the report of the Education Commission contemplated such an early withdrawal of Governmental tutelage; and ill-considered, because we as firmly believe that unless higher education has had a longer time to spread and strike root, primary education on a large scale is a vain dream. The Governor, speaking with Mr. Lee-Warner's experience and wisdom regarding the financial relations of Government with the Poona Female High School, and advising the public to take up the financing of that young institution, is now fitly followed by Sir R. West with a homily preached to our civic fathers, inculcating a better sense of their duty by the institutions for higher education in Poona. To sum up the two speeches, we should say that between them, the Governor and his Councillor manage to kill our High Schools outright! The Governor says to his subjects, rich and poor, "You should pay for your Female High Schools, &c., as the Indian Government cuts down the Provincial grant." His faithful Councillor says: "Government pays already twenty times the municipal grant to the Poona Native Institution. It is a shame that it should be allowed to starve on such a miserable stipend by the municipality." Mr. Secretary Lee-Warner comes in usefully with his special nostrum and says: "Civic fathers! have nothing to do with the institutions for higher education: your money is wanted for the primary schools." So we come to this—that Sir R. West is displeased with the ratepayers because they pay too little and do not lighten the Government burden, and the Governor is displeased with the rich gentry of Poona for the same reason. Poor Deccan, to be thrown overboard by both! We leave for the next issue the question as to what the respective duties of the municipality and the local Government are regarding the institutions that exist for the higher education of our females as also of our boys. We merely point out to-day that in both cases the money comes out of the rayats' pockets, but in one case it is expected by reasonable men that we shall spend it in such and such manner, in the other it is not expected that it shall be spent in a specified manner, but the Government is at liberty to sequestrate any amount and sink it into the nice hole they have dug in the "scientific" North-western frontier. No wonder that successive financiers find it difficult to make the two ends of the Indian balance-sheet meet.

Part III.—Railways.

Projected short feeder lines of railways in the Bombay Presidency and a suggestion to His Excellency Lord Harris in connection therewith.

24. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—Short feeder lines of railways opening the interior tracts of countries are a very desirable improvement in the railway policy of Government, and we are very glad to learn that in all probability Gujarát will lead the way in this matter. A recent official communication publishes necessary particulars about no less than five such projects. Here is a fine opportunity both for Government and the people to encourage Native enterprise. The Government of His Excellency Lord Harris would leave a stamp upon the administration if it encouraged Native enterprise in this direction. There are two ways of doing this and both, we suggest, ought to be tried. Local boards within whose territory a line is intended to pass, should be induced to form joint committees for the laying out, maintaining and managing a line. They ought to be permitted to borrow capital within their district. The other way in which the object can be secured is by inducing the people to form themselves into companies. For some years to come Government ought to help such companies with professional advice and guidance. Gujarát is essentially commercial. It is also rich and leading men in the several districts there are in closer sympathy with the officials than in other parts. They are also more tractable, and if an energetic Commissioner like Mr. James is desired by Government to carry out such a railway policy, he will do it with success.

25. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 26th October, writes:—

Insult alleged to have been given on the G. I. P. Railway to His Highness Mahárája Sayájiráo Gáikwád and a request to the Bombay Government to take severe notice of the incident.

A propos of insults to Native Princes, let us call upon Government to take severe notice of an incident which is said to have occurred recently nearer home. There is an apparently well-founded report that His Highness the Gáikwád, when lately travelling by the G. I. P. Railway on his way to Sholápur, was disturbed in his sleep by the noise of the engine which happened to be in close proximity to his own carriage. The guard in charge of the train as well as the station masters at one or two stations on the way were informed of the disturbance, and were requested to attach the carriage to the end of the train. There were at first some evasive replies. At last one station master had the courage of his convictions and gave the polite reply, "Give the Mahárája a sleeping draught and he will get sleep. I am not going to detain the train to shunt off his carriage and attach it to the end." The railway official was master of the situation and the Mahárája had to make the best of a sleepless night. Is Government to tolerate such insolence in a railway station master towards a First Class Native Prince? It may be said the train was a mail train and could not be detained. How much would the detention have been? And is not the mail frequently detained for railway purposes and for the convenience of railway officials? Is the rest and comfort of a Prince like Mahárája Gáikwád of no account? Surely it is revolting to see such gross want of manners and common courtesy exhibited towards a Prince. We trust Government will make an example of the station master, and teach him a wholesome lesson in good manners. The Government is the guardian of the honour and dignity of our Native Chiefs and Princes, and it must not allow this gross insult to remain unnoticed. Without instituting any invidious parallel, let us ask if like treatment would have been tolerated in the case of, say, Prince Victor or the Czarewitch. We cannot imagine an affirmative answer possible. Why should it be tolerated in the case of Mahárája Gáikwád?

Part IV.—Municipalities.

26. A correspondent, writing to the Kalpataru (41) in its issue of the 25th October, complains of the conduct of the Mámlatdár of Indápur in the Poona District in overawing municipal commissioners with threats of issuing orders for the levy of the forbidden octroi duties even on agricultural produce and compelling them to concur with him in his opinion regarding the pension fund being paid in respect of the newly appointed secretary in addition to his pay, and in using insulting language to one of the commissioners, Mr. Krishnaráo Nágesh Nádgonda, for recording his opinion against that of the Mámlatdár; says that the chairman and most of the members have tendered resignations of their offices to the president to save themselves from further insult at the hands of the Mámlatdár; and requests Government to take due notice of the matter.

A complaint against the conduct of the Mámlatdár of Indápur in the Poona District towards municipal commissioners.

Part V.—Native States.

27. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 25th October, writes:—It has often been observed that India is a country of puzzling anomalies—anomalies social, political and economical—which are more or less the despair of reformers, statesmen and political philosophers of the West. That the country should be governed under principles the most despotic, albeit tempered by a benevolence varying according to the varying temper of the chief autocrat for the time being and his advisers, and that the people, on the whole, should yet be fairly contented and consider the Government to be merciful enough compared with the administrations which preceded it, are in themselves the most conspicuous anomalies in the political annals of the world, for there is no parallel to those in times ancient or modern. But it is even a more singular anomaly that within such an administration itself there are congeries of independent States which are allowed to work out their own destiny on principles which prevail in countries the most enlightened. It is an era in the history of the country of which the politicians of the West cannot fail to take a note, that, while 22 krors of people should yet be innocent of even the germs of a rude representative government, a feudatory State which has received its art of government from an enlightened body of oligarchs should have the honour and the pride to be considered the real pioneer of government by the people, limited though it be. While British India, through the Indian National Congress, has been crying in the wilderness these many years past for some such form of government, Mysore, under the rule of a liberal-minded Mahárája, actively aided by the statesmanship of a loyal, sagacious and patriotic Diwán, has voluntarily accorded the boon of an elected assembly of notables and widened its privileges! Was ever such an accomplished fact dreamt of in the philosophy of the political philosophers of the West? Is it the case anywhere in the world that an omnipotent and paramount power could be outstripped in the art of good government by a feudatory admitted to thrive under its wide-spreading segis? Yet this is the historical anomaly which we have now to record! Is it not an anomaly which is a commentary on the administration of British India? Political timidity or pusillanimity yet makes them hesitate and vacillate, while Mysore boldly goes forward and in dignified silence points the way! We congratulate Mysore. We congratulate the Diwán on the good sense and the statesmanlike spirit which have prompted him and his master to recently extend the privileges which were so liberally granted for the first time eleven years ago. Verily, that State is keeping march with the widening process of the sun. It improves its people from precedent to precedent. What an auspicious event for all India to rejoice at! May it be in the power of the rulers of this country to give their people a still greater cause for rejoicing! May they have the wisdom and the sagacity to go and do likewise! And may the British Indian empire be thus set on a wider and more solid foundation, encircled by the greater love and loyalty of a law-abiding people!

Introduction of a sort of representative government in the Mysore State considered a commentary on the administration of British India.

A request to Government to introduce a joint administration into the State of Jámnagar.

28. The Gujarát Mitra (86), in its issue of the 25th October, observes:—The indebtedness of the State of Jámnagar has been greatly reduced and the State is otherwise much improved under the able management of Mr. Maganlál Bápubhái; but as he has not been able to quell completely all the intrigues rife in the State and to remodel it entirely, and as the Jám's nature is too good to prevent intriguing people from taking advantage of it, we recommend Government, both in the interests of the State and the subjects, to introduce into Jámnagar a joint administration like the one at Cambay and preserve the honour and prestige of the Jám, Shri Vibháji, K.C.S.I., who is a very deserving Chief.

A suggestion to Political Agents in Native States.

29. A correspondent of the Rájyabhakt (120), in its issue of the 20th October, says that it is strange that a decree obtained in one Native State should not be enforced in another Native State, whereas a decree of a British Court of justice should be enforceable in any Native State, and requests Political Agents to remove this anomaly.

The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 23rd October, writes:—

A meeting at Amráoti to elect delegates for the ensuing Indian National Congress.

A large and influential meeting of the people of Amráoti Táluk was held here on the 21st instant at the Native General Library to elect delegates to the forthcoming Indian National Congress at Nágpur. Mr. Ganesh Shrikrishna Kháparde, B.A., LL.B., was in the chair. Messrs. Kháparde and Keskar made short speeches on the aims and objects of the Congress. 115 delegates were unanimously elected. After the election Mr. P. N. Jog spoke in a few telling words about the Consent Bill agitation, and pointed out that whatever differences of opinion existed on the Consent Bill there was no difference with regard to the Congress. This most opportune expression was received by the audience with loud cheers. After this the National Anthem was sung by a band, the whole crowd standing, and flowers were thrown up at its close. The meeting was concluded by every one present responding heartily to the call of three cheers for the Queen-Empress of India.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Sind Sudhár (163), in its issue of the 31st October, writes:—For many years Russia has been pleasing England by fair promises to the effect that she has no intention whatever to acquire possession of India or any other country, that, for her own part, she desires to be in peace with England, and that it would be desirable if both powers united to restore order and tranquillity in the uncivilized countries of Asia. But it seems that an alliance with Russia is as unreliable as a friendship between a cat and a mouse. No other Government is so cunning and hypocritical as the Russian Government. She puts on the face of an ally, but her mind is burning with resentment and she wishes to swallow up everything. With all her stratagems and tricks she is looked upon as a powerful Government. It is this power of which several Governments and Rájas in Europe and Asia stand in awe. It is this power that has weakened the influence of the Turks in Europe. It is this power that has subdued the most formidable and lawless nations of Northern and Central Asia. Only a few days back a telegram was received to the effect that Russia had again set her heart on adding Constantinople to her dominion, and all the English newspaper-writers are unanimously of opinion that the danger of a war between England and Russia as to the possession of India is daily increasing. The Russian troops have now entered Pamir, the Chinese territory, and it is feared that, ere long, there will be a serious conflict in that country. The British Government should not, therefore, rely on the assurances of the Russian Government. But it is necessary that it should strengthen its position. Although there is no doubt that England is a proper match to Russia, yet the latter possesses the following advantages exclusively:—(1) That the troops of the English are considerably less in number than the Russian forces; (2) that the Russian dominion is far greater in extent than the English territory, and is, moreover, inhabited by one race only; and (3) that Russia is able to invade other countries, though her own dominion is impenetrable to foreign aggressions. Under these circumstances it is proper for the British Government to win the hearts of the people by means of justice and equity, and to exert itself strenuously in promoting their happiness. It should also try to make itself thoroughly acquainted with the wants and grievances of the people of India and to take steps to supply and remedy them, so that in critical junctures they may unanimously assist it by all means in their power. There is no doubt that the people of India are very much satisfied with the British rule.

The duties of the British Government in view of a Russian invasion of India.

2. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 6th November, while criticising the policy of the Amir of Kabul, says:—It is very surprising that the Amir, who does not at all encourage commercial intercourse with India but levies excessive duties on Indian goods in order to ruin Indian commerce, should have of his own free will opened wide the gates of his dominions to Russian commerce and enterprise. It is just possible that the embassy outwardly sent for commercial purposes may be, after all, a secret political one. Why should not the Amir try to save himself and his kingdom by going over to the side of the fast-advancing, strong and conquering Russians, when he knows full well that the British Government is quite indifferent to the mid-Asian politics? So long as the British ambassador at Kabul does not clear up this mystery of the Russian embassy there is every ground to suspect the fidelity of the Amir. The British Government would have saved all this trouble had it but spent some money on settling the question of the Russian frontier long ago. [The Akhbár-e-Saodagar (95), in its issue of the 6th November, expresses similar sentiments.]

The policy of the Amir of Kabul criticised.

3. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 1st November, writes:—His Excellency Lord Harris in his recent tour visited Sholápur, Ahmednagar and Thána, and at all these places, as is customary with the Indian people, he was very cordially received. The people had, of course, their usual tale of grievances and they were met in the usual way with frank and straightforward replies.

His Excellency Lord Harris' tour in the Deccan and remarks on His Lordship's replies to addresses and memorials.

His Excellency's speeches betray in an unmistakable manner that the Imperial Government has been driving a Shylock's bargain with this presidency, and even where Lord Harris feels the reasonableness of the demand, he instinctively shrinks from binding his Government hand and foot by any promise. We must not, however, conceal from a frank-hearted Governor like Lord Harris our serious apprehension that the prospects of primary and secondary education do not seem to us to be quite hopeful in the near future, and we hope the Indian Government will not go so far in their shortsighted policy of retrenchment as to impede the progress of education, upon which India's regeneration primarily depends. There is a good deal of conflict of opinion between municipalities and Government regarding the levy of octroi duties, but so long as they can be regulated so as not to act as transit duties, they will be resorted to in the mofussil, where direct taxation of any kind is heartily detested. The Government view is obviously the correct one from the point of view of political economy, and people will, no doubt, adapt themselves to it in course of time. His Excellency's observations regarding local option, so far as they are based on English experience, do not commend themselves to our approval, and Lord Harris, if he will personally try an experiment in any district of his selection, will find that almost the whole population is opposed to the establishment of grog-shops in their midst. At Thána the municipal address touched upon a real grievance regarding the insufficient accommodation and the absence of an overbridge at the station. The complaint is of long standing and we have little doubt that, if His Excellency had not put in a word of excuse for the company, its niggardly and dilatory habits would have undergone a rapid change for the better and its work would have been pushed on with expedition when successive Collectors have in vain endeavoured so long to persuade it to meet a most pressing requirement.

4. The Rdst Goftár (90), in its issue of the 1st November, writes:—Although it will be some time before the season has commenced for gubernatorial tours, His Excellency Lord Harris has just managed to pay a short visit to two important towns in the Deccan, Ahmednagar and Sholápur. There were the usual addresses and speeches, and in the speeches which he has delivered on this occasion the Governor has maintained his reputation for frankness, shrewdness and sound common sense. He seems to take his cue mostly from the officers of the districts he visits, but the clearness and force with which he expresses his views shows that he does not repeat them mechanically just as they are received, but that he weighs them and makes them his own before uttering them. It is the general impression that he has always a bias in favour of the official view. Without discussing whether this is the fact or not, or whether it is the right thing for him to do or not, this much is certain that the official cannot complain that his views have not on any occasion received from His Excellency the fullest measure of attention and respect. His Lordship is anxious that the popular voice, or what is represented as the popular voice, should be checked by official opinion, in order to be able to gauge its value, and he does not make a secret of this wish.

5. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 1st November, writes:—There was a remark made by His Excellency Lord Harris at Ahmednagar which, we think, should not be allowed to pass unnoticed. In the course of his reply to the municipal address, His Lordship observed that he could not receive the address from the educational committee of the town, because it was sent late and there was no time to verify the statements contained therein. The significance of that declaration is worthy of notice. It means that no head of an administration should care to reply to an address spontaneously given by a civic body, be it municipal or any other, without its being first scrutinised by the official authorities who may be the recognised channels of communication! Such a policy, though largely followed, is, in our opinion, not only undesirable but injurious. It strikes at the very root of the object of visits which persons in exalted situations like Viceroys, Governors and Lieutenant-Governors are supposed to make. We have always understood that the sole aim and object of a Governor's or Viceroy's visit is to understand the legitimate wants and requirements, and even grievances, of the people whose town he visits. No doubt, there are the accredited officials of his Government. They are at liberty to arrange the ceremonial part of the programme. But we consider it to be a serious infringement of the undoubted right of the people when they insist upon the addresses of the people being first scrutinised by themselves. The former may have really a grievance to submit to the exalted authority, which may necessitate an expression of statements unpleasant or unpalatable to the chief official concerned. That personage would under the circumstances refuse to give the people an audience with their ruler and thus repress that liberty of thought and speech which is the inborn right of the meanest as well as the mightiest subject of our gracious Sovereign. Are we to understand that even in the matter of the presentation of an address the Collector should play the despot? It will be perceived that the tours of Governors as now carried on actually frustrate the original good object they were intended for. They have simply become an annual peripatetic picnic, nine-tenths of which is filled with pleasure and one-tenth with humdrum bow-wowing, which means nothing. Nobody is the wiser or the better, while a large portion of the tax-payer's moneys is absolutely squandered on this sort of holiday-making. This is what we have come to as far as the Governors' tours go in these degenerate days. The only persons who are unstinted in their praise are the nobbled press. The Secretary first wires long telegrams of the great doings of the great Governor in high-flown language. Later on an official diary appears in the local Gazette, which may be not worth the value of the paper on which it is printed. The press gets another opportunity of reviewing the State events and any amount of oleomargine stuff is interlarded. And lo! the Governor is made a hero and a statesman. This is tour-making with a vengeance, and at the cost of the ground-down tax-payers, and all for their special benefit! There are two other matters in connection with the speeches of His Excellency Lord Harris at Ahmednagar and Sholápur which deserve to be seriously noticed. The necessity for every town, and, for that matter, every village, providing itself with an adequate supply of pure potable water is so universally recognised that there are now no two opinions on the subject. The preaching so far is superfluous. Pure water-supply means adequate funds, and if adequate funds are not forthcoming, either from the public itself or from Government, it is of no use further sermonising on the subject. Then, again, people are exhorted to embark on drainage schemes, as if such schemes were known to bring in a hygienic millenium. We boldly ask those who glibly advise having drainage here, there and everywhere to say whether they duly weigh their recommendation, and whether they at all realise the full responsibility of their utterances. May it be asked whether there is a single drainage scheme in any part of India which has hitherto been known to be a perfect success? Is it proved beyond doubt that the Calcutta drainage is such? If so, how is it that after spending 1½ kror of rupees on it some years ago that city is complaining of the awful nuisance of the sewers and smells, of typhoid fever and its heavy mortality? Is it proved that Bombay has got the best and most efficient scheme of drainage?

6. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 5th November, writes:—The first part of His Excellency Lord Harris' tour came to a close with a visit to Thána. It gave His Excellency many opportunities of speaking out his mind on some of the important questions of administration and on the wants and wishes of the people under his rule. We congratulate His Excellency on the favourable impression he has created upon his audience by a frank and sincere expression of his views, as well as by a sympathetic recognition of the claim of the People's Association at Sholápur to represent the people of that district. It was at one time a standing rule of the official code that the so-called popular associations had as great a right to represent the people as Lord Randolph Churchill once said he had to represent the people of Kamaschatka. Lord Harris' strong common sense and the straightforward attitude he usually takes towards questions he is called upon to consider have enabled him to take precisely the same view of the status of such associations as honest people would desire Government to take. Such associations never claimed to represent the unanimous voice of the people they are supposed to represent. All that they wished to impress on the Government was that, being in touch with and having ample opportunities of learning the feelings and wishes of the majority of the people, they were the fittest channels through which their wishes could be adequately communicated to and pressed upon the attention of Government. Lord Harris has thus placed us under a deep obligation by declaring once for all that Government was willing to recognise the representative status of such bodies, if they represented a fair proportion of the opinion of the people. We hope some of the district officers, while dealing with such bodies, will lay this candid declaration of His Excellency to heart. The People's Association at Sholápur, among other grievances, urged upon the attention of His Excellency the necessity of founding a technical institute and benches of Honorary Magistrates in that city. In speaking of Honorary Magistrates His Excellency said: "I may say at once that if you can show good cause for the establishment of such a bench, and also a real desire for expeditious work which the bench could effect, and the suggestion does not arise from any desire for a distribution of honorary distinctions, Government will be quite disposed to help you." The reply in question is all that can be desired, with the exception of the part we have italicised. It seems that His Excellency is under an impression that demands of the kind are sometimes made on Government for selfish purposes and not from a sincere desire to accomplish the good for which they are intended. We see no reasons to justify this suspicion, either in the conduct of the benches of magistrates already appointed in several places or in the average quality of their work. If selections are made with due regard to popular opinion, there will be no room for the suspicion which His Excellency seems to entertain. In reply to a demand for a technical institute at that place, His Excellency, in the course of his remarks, expressed his doubts about the disappearance of indigenous industries. This doubt was again accentuated by him at Nagar and Thána. He refused to accept the assertion without proof. A few days ago there was held in Poona an industrial conference, the proceedings of which, we presume, have been perused by His Excellency. One of the important propositions, passed with due formality, was a prayer to Government for an industrial survey of the whole of India, and when the question is discussed by the Government of India, Lord Harris will have it in his power to support the prayer of the conference. If the survey in question be made, it will furnish ample evidence of the gradual decay of indigenous industries and arts.

Prayer to His Excellency Lord Harris to redress the grievances of the people in Sind.

7. The Aftab-i-Sind (158), in its issue of the 28th October, writes:—We, the people of Sind, are very glad to hear of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay's visit to the province, and we pray that His Excellency may safely and successfully complete his tour. We also pray that His Excellency may be pleased to make himself acquainted with the grievances of the people, and more especially those of the Zamindárs, and to take steps to redress them. The people will then offer prayers for the prosperity of His Lordship.

The alleged indifference of the people to the cause of the Indian National Congress and its causes.

8. While writing about the next meeting of the Indian National Congress, the Shubh Suchak (68), in its issue of the 30th October, mourns over the alleged indifference of the natives of the Bombay Presidency to the Congress and observes:—The friction and misunderstanding created between the social reformers and their opponents by the Age of Consent Act and the excommunication agitation now raging wildly at Poona, have, it may be safely said, thrown cold water on the enthusiasm of the people with respect to the movement of the Indian National Congress, and it is really a matter for regret that the age of consent controversy should have, as feared by the Native press in general, told so injuriously on this important national movement. High European officers have been from the beginning opposed to this constitutional movement. First, they alienated the hearts of the Mahomedans from the Congress by misrepresentation and by holding out illusive hopes, and then turned the mind of the press from it by similar means, and lastly a split was created between the old and the new generations by the Age of Consent Act. On the whole, the result has been highly deplorable, as will be frankly admitted by both the sides, and it is just the object which Government so eagerly wished to attain. The prophecy of the Anglo-Indian officers that the Indian National Congress movement would by internecine quarrels be crippled, nay annihilated, is about to be realised, and even the enemies of the Natives will be sorry to see the movement fail so grievously.

9. The Broach Samdchár (99), in its issue of the 5th November, says that Dr. K. H. Mistri, Acting Civil Surgeon, Broach, has made himself very popular there by the care he takes of the patients, and that if his transfer from that city be under contemplation in deference to the wishes of a European officer, Government ought to step in and prevent the Surgeon-General from effecting it, in order to show to the public that they are always anxious to respect the wishes and watch the interests of the Natives.

Remarks on the rumoured transfer of Dr. K. H. Mistri, Acting Civil Surgeon, Broach.

10. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 1st November, observes:—We are glad to hear that the Supreme Government, by granting a monthly pension of Rs. 10 to the widow of Salim Shekh, who was mercilessly murdered about a year and a half ago by four European soldiers at Dum Dum, have done an act of justice. There was a clamour in Native circles against the decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court acquitting the accused in the case, and Mr. Caine, too, has played an important part in securing the sympathy of the English public towards the family of the unfortunate Mahomedan. We wish that the Supreme Government would act similarly in similar cases.

Approval of the pension granted by the Supreme Government to the widow of Salim Shekh murdered by four European soldiers at Dum Dum about a year and a half ago, and suggestions to Government.

11. The Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 5th November, observes that it will be some consolation to the public to hear that the Supreme Government have awarded a monthly pension to the widow of the Mahomedan of the Dum Dum murder case, attributes this result to the strong agitation made in England, but regrets that the offenders have escaped scot-free and that Government have not taken such steps as would have a deterrent effect on rash Europeans, recommends that Government in order to regain the confidence of the Natives should in future order such cases to be tried by a mixed jury consisting of Natives and Europeans, and that the post-mortem examinations should be allowed to be held by independent Native medical men instead of by European doctors as their verdicts have proved to be not free from partiality and as their verdicts and those of an entirely European jury, even though correctly formed, are liable to be looked upon with suspicion by the public, and adds that if it be impracticable for Government to carry out these recommendations at present, they should make the murderers pay a certain sum as pension to the family of the deceased without taxing the Indian exchequer, and hopes that the political associations of India will take up this question.

12. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 1st November, observes:—The decision of Mr. Richardson, Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, in the case of Dr. Rodrigues has caused much vexation and disappointment. When we take into consideration the respectable status in society of the offender, his youth, and particularly the extreme repentance which he showed for the offence committed while in a state of inebriation to which he had to resort to drown his feelings of uneasiness at the illness of his wife, we cannot but characterise the sentence as very hard and undeserved, for, we think that a mere fine would have sufficed. [The Gujarát Mitra (86), in its issue of the same date, expresses surprise at the sentence of both fine and imprisonment passed on the doctor in question when European offenders charged with the murder of Natives generally escape scot-free or are only lightly punished, and advises the doctor to make an appeal to the High Court, as it believes that the Honourable Judges will view his case with clemency.]

Remarks on the sentence passed on Dr. Rodrigues by the Third Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

13. The Pársi Vártádár (118), in its issue of the 1st November, considers the fine of Rs. 50 recently imposed on a victoria driver with an alternative of one month's imprisonment by the Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay, for crushing an old Mahomedan lady to death through negligent driving insufficient, and says that an example should have been made of this driver to the rest of his fraternity, who are generally rash and reckless in driving and insolent in their conduct to the public.

14. The Bodh Sudhdkar (9), in its issue of the 28th October, says :—

An exhortation to the Hindus in Bombay to take severe notice of the attack made on their god Krishna by the Book and Tract Society on the last Gokul Ashtami holiday.

The irritation which a vulgar attack by the Book and Tract Society on the Hindu god Krishna is said to have caused among the Hindu community of Bombay is natural, but we lack the ability to carry it far enough to a desirable termination. Our self-respect is hypocritical and hollow. It cannot last long and bring about the desired object. Our want of self-reliance is the cause of this state of things. We require the assistance of Government even for kindling the fuel in the oven. There are no people in the world so weak and pusillanimous as the Hindus. The Hindus are the only people who bear the revilings against their religion, and this is the cause of the Christian converts taking such liberty. Should Hinduism be persecuted with impunity in a city like Bombay? Should converts who traduce the venerable god Krishna be permanent residents in Bombay? What is the cause of the famous massacre at Bartholomew? What does the 24th of 1572 notify? Are there few martyrs who have been written about in European and Asiatic history? The people of Bombay should not lose sight of the fact that there is no provision in British law to bring to account such si'ly writers, while there is a provision in that law, as interpreted by Mr. Lee-Warner, under which a Bráhman from Wái could be sent to prison for telling a Christian convert not to touch him. Though municipal law may permit the traducing of a god held extremely venerable in other people's religion, religious or holy law ought to prohibit it. It is necessary to suggest to Government the desirability of prohibiting Christian converts from standing and preaching in any place till the Gokul Ashtami affair is satisfactorily disposed of. The people in our part of the country are bound to consider this matter, but the filthy tracts not having spread widely here, there is no occasion for much irritation on that account.

15. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 1st November, observes :—

The handbill issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society on the last Gokul Ashtami day and the further steps taken by the Gujaráti Hindus.

The handbill published by a missionary society on the Gokul Ashtami holiday of the Hindus, in which many disrespectful and obscene remarks are made about the god Krishna, is objectionable and the promoters of the public meeting of the Gujaráti Hindus held recently to protest against it have, we hear, obtained the opinion of an English counsel on the matter, and steps will soon be taken thereon.

16. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 1st November, observes :—

A request to Government in connection with the handbill.

The British Government is well known for its impartial administration of justice and tolerance of religious views, and it is therefore to be regretted that it should not have yet taken any notice of those Bombay missionaries who have wounded the religious feelings of the Hindus by the free circulation of an objectionable handbill on the last Gokul Ashtami day. It is gratifying that the Hindus have not yet been so much excited as to take very bold steps against the missionaries, but it is the duty of Government to take measures of their own accord for protecting their Hindu subjects from such malicious attacks upon their religion.

17. The Bombay Samáchár (97), in its issue of the 2nd November, says :—

A gathering of the Deccani Hindus to consider the steps to be taken against the publishers of the "Gokul Ashtami" tract.

A large assembly of Deccani Hindus met together under the presidency of Mr. Dhondu Shámráo Garud to consider the steps to be taken against the publishers of the tract called "Gokul Ashtami or Janmáshtami." After learned discourses from Mahámahopádhyáya Rájárám Shástri Bodas, Shástri Válji and others it was unanimously agreed to call a mass meeting of the Hindus by writing letters to the headmen of all the various castes, requesting them to assemble together to consider the matter further. It is reported that a celebrated barrister has been consulted by the Hindus in this matter. [The Akhbár-e Soddgar (95), in its issue of the 6th November, gives a similar account and adds:—The conduct of the Hindus, although their feelings were hurt, was throughout simply exemplary. Even in the meetings where hundreds of every class had come together their proceedings were characteristically mild and thoughtful, and it is to be rejoiced at that the Hindus have not taken the law into their own hands, but have consulted a learned barrister very thoughtfully. Now these offending missionaries will have to go through a judicial ordeal and will have to abstain in future from abusing the gods of the Hindus. If the missionaries are wise, and it is well known that they do not lack wisdom, they will distribute a pamphlet acknowledging their mistake in issuing the "Gokul Ashtami" tract, and that will satisfy the Hindus, but if this be not done, the Hindus will not rest till they have made the missionaries feel their just wrath.]

The defence of the alleged attack on the character of the Hindu god Krishna contained in a recent tract on Gokul Ashtami.

18. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 5th November, writes:—A mass meeting of the Hindus of Bombay was held on Saturday last at Thákurdwár to consider what steps should be taken to defend their god Krishna from the alleged libellous attack contained in a recent tract on Gokul Ashtami. The speakers spoke of their great reverence for Krishna and how deeply they were grieved that such charges of immorality were made against him. It was decided that Government should be appealed to on the basis of the Queen's Proclamation of 1858. It is rather curious that our friends should be so much exercised about defending Krishna's character. We would suggest that before they go any further they should read the account of Krishna's life in the Bhagawat Purán. With the exception of one incident, which refers to a custom observed at Jagannáthpuri, they will find that the tract deals in a very mild way with his failings. Unfortunately the authors of the Purans are dead, otherwise they might also be included in the appeal which it is proposed to make to Government.

An attack on the reformers of Hindu society.

19. The Pandhari Mitra (56), in its issue of the 1st November, observes:—In India virtuous conduct and high or noble birth have from time immemorial carried weight and respect, while in western countries the sweeping or levelling principle of equality recognises no distinction between man and man except that of wealth and education, and consequently allows even a cobbler's son, if he be well educated, to associate with the religious head of the community. Consequently those classes of Hindu society, who under Native rule occupied very low positions in life, have had opportunities under the British rule of raising their heads by means of wealth and education. . The so-called reformers and leaders of Hindu society are men whose ancestors held the lowest position in society, and who having acquired their present importance by learning English, have naturally great respect for the institutions obtaining in western countries, believe in the advice and opinions of their benefactors, the English, as in gospel truths, and force upon the country practices like widow-marriage, and laws like the Age of Consent Act, the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, &c. These men are not really persons whom Native society at large acknowledge as their representatives, but are mere upstarts and have no sympathy whatsoever with their distressed countrymen. The latter should therefore no longer rely on such self-constituted leaders, but should consult their own interests independently of them and promote them by encouraging and patronising home-made articles and thus prevent their wealth from being drained to foreign countries.

Remarks upon a suggestion said to have been made by a Collector upon the police reforms in Bengal.

20. The Dhdrwadr Vritt (32), in its issue of the 29th October, has the following paragraph:—Our readers must be aware that in Bengal the subject under discussion at present is police reform. The local Government sent a circular to every Collector in which he was asked to give his opinion, and one of the wise gentlemen in giving his opinion remarked that as the people were getting wiser and wiser every day they ought to know how to protect themselves, that if the people carelessly kept their doors wide open and then complained of being robbed the police could do nothing, and that, therefore, the owner of a house attacked by a band of robbers should be fined for not taking proper measures to guard his own property against such a contingency. This wise gentleman plainly stated that such a course was always followed in China. Happy and fortunate is the collectorate which is blessed with such a ruler! The Bengali Bábus alone ought not to be proud of having such preciously wise Collectors; we of the Bombay Presidency, too, have had such sapient officers. A few years ago when the crops were totally destroyed by rats, a Collector on this side proposed a scientific solution of the problem, on being consulted by Government. He suggested that the people should keep serpents to destroy the rats. One can very well imagine the fate of a country when its Government is entrusted to such wiseacres.

Discordant Native music.

21. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 1st November, writes:—A good deal of correspondence has lately appeared in the Bombay English dailies regarding the discordant music of the Native community and the shouting propensities of the low classes of people, and if these grumblers could have everything in their own way they would at once appeal to the legislature and have a short enactment passed to put a stop to what they deem to be a nuisance. They would at once invest the police with very large powers, empowering them to interfere with even devotional music. We should like to know what right these grumblers have to ask the innocent people to stop their music, simply because it sounds so discordant to ears not accustomed to it? Have not these correspondents sufficient toleration to permit them to think for a moment whether it is just to deprive poor men of an innocent pleasure they enjoy after working the whole day? Besides, if they have a right to sleep undisturbed, their Native neighbours have an equal right to have their devotional music, however unpleasant, until the grumblers can provide them with more fascinating and tranquillizing music. Are not owners of carriages everyday troubled when they have to pass by churches and cathedrals when prayers are being offered or sermons delivered? No sensible man has complained of reasonable restraints on such occasions, though very few will admit that the police do always keep within proper limits. Then again the correspondents seem to think that Native music is perhaps the most disagreeable thing in the world, because that is their experience of the music of their servants and other low-caste people. We only pity the gross ignorance of the European community on the point and will rest content with asking them to suspend their judgment and not to pronounce it with a jaunty air of dogmatism. No one can afford to entertain and act up to dainty notions of living in an overcrowded city like Bombay, with so many creeds and races whose hours of prayer and devotion not even Government has any right to regulate. Englishmen have their own churches and cathedrals, but every Native household is a church and cathedral for itself, and it is nothing but a piece of intolerance to say that he shall not have his music and prayers, because others do not like them. In every city there will be noisy drunkards, and if Bombay supplies its own quota there is nothing surprising in it. Drunken European sailors and roughs make nights as hideous and sleepless as their Native analogues. But the Native community has never thought it decent to kick up a row just as if the heavens were about to fall. It knows that the inconveniences of city life are inevitable to a certain extent, and puts up with them with a patience and spirit of tolerance that some of our intolerant neighbours would do well to imitate.

Part II.—Education.

Comments on the education policy of Government.

22. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 1st November, writes:—The times are indeed out of joint, as the Indian Mirror would say. Thirty years ago the Government would have willingly allotted any sum of money which could be profitably spent on such measures as the spread of primary education among the masses, on village sanitation, female education and medical relief, and the like. But these things were not then quite practicable, and now that they have become not only feasible but even necessary, the Government has no money, Is it because it has grown poor or reactionary? Nothing of the kind. It is as alive as ever to the importance of these objects, while its revenue has increased and is increasing with leaps and bounds, and now presses close upon the revenue of England itself. Yet it has no funds for those objects. It was thus that His Excellency the Governor threatened the other day to withdraw his support from the Poona Female High School, the only institution of its kind in Western India, and to reduce it to a grants-in-aid school, which in the present circumstances would mean its closure. About the same time we saw it stated that 100 lakhs of rupees were to be assigned next year for frontier railways! It is these vast sums of money annually spent on frontier measures in the name or for the sake of Imperial politics which are gradually starving provincial or local services. England should bear the greater portion of these expenses, yet no effort is made to demand this financial justice, but attention is devoted to other measures of so-called political reform which are trifling in comparison with the serious drag.

Extra fees levied in the Government High Schools at Ahmedabad for drawing class, &c., disapproved and a request to authorities in the matter.

23. The Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 5th November, regrets that Government should be trying gradually to withdraw from education by throwing the burden of its maintenance on the people and thus making education costly and that the Head-masters of High Schools, as for instance the Head-master of the Ahmedabad High School, should make it still more costly by levying extra fees on students for supplying them with drinking water, drawing classes and cricket clubs, which come up to a rupee in addition to the usual school-fee of Rs. 3 per mensem. The paper adds that this additional fee will surely debar parents in ordinary circumstances from sending their sons to the Government schools, and requests Government to see that no extra fees are levied from students.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Imposition of a house-tax by the minor municipalities in the Hyderabad District in Sind complained of.

24. The Sind Sudhár (163), in its issue of the 31st October, writes:—We have received very painful news from the Hyderabad District to the effect that in the minor municipalities of that district the officials are using pressure to impose the house-tax. In the mofussil towns it is only the trading class that can be said to have any source of income, but the number belonging to that class is limited. The majority of the population consists of people earning their livelihood by manual occupation. The wages which a labourer receives are four or five annas a day, a sum which is hardly enough to cover his expenses. In those towns it is not customary to let houses for rent. Moreover, there are no grand buildings. The poor people own small houses, which have descended to them from their ancestors. These poor people cannot even afford to get their houses repaired. They look upon the house-tax as a sudden foreign invasion or as a catastrophe from heaven. If instead of levying the house-tax the rates of town duties on commodities are increased, the people will not feel the burden so heavy as that of the house-tax. In imposing any new tax it is necessary that regard should be had for the feelings of the people in the matter. We therefore hope that Government will consider it altogether undesirable to levy a house-tax in small towns. It will surely be hard to levy this kind of tax in minor municipalities, and more especially in those in which there is no deficit of funds. The Matari Municipality is an instance in point.

Recalling a meeting of the municipal corporation at Hyderabad, in Sind, by the Collector to consider the propriety of imposing a house-tax, and remarks thereon.

25. The same newspaper writes:—From the proceedings of the special general meeting of the Hyderabad Municipal Corporation, held on Monday the 20th of October 1891, it will be seen that the inhabitants of Hyderabad submitted to the Collector on that day a lengthy memorial containing their reasons against the imposition of the house-tax, and that with the exception of three or four nominated members all the members, elected as well as nominated, were against the proposal. We are unable to understand why the Collector again called a meeting of the members to consider the propriety of the proposed tax, seeing that at the preceding meeting almost all the municipal commissioners had expressed their opinions against the imposition of the tax under any circumstances whatever. The object of appointing municipal commissioners is that they should furnish true and full information respecting the condition of their town and protest against all measures which may appear to them unsuited to the circumstances of the country. We cannot understand the object of the Collector in trying so hard to bring the municipal commissioners over to his side. This can hardly be called local self-government. What is the good of having that nominal form of local self-government in which the members should simply say, "it is thd Huzur's wish," and nod their heads, like wild elephants, at the proposals ane measures brought forward by the Collector or should not express their opinions freely and impartially, or that those who may venture to express their views truly and fully should be discouraged from doing so ?

Approval of the decision of the civil suit brought by the Mahájans against the Dhandhuka Municipality and a request to Government in connection with municipal affairs.

26. The Gujardt Darpan (84), in its issue of the 29th October, observes :— The proceedings of the civil suit brought by the Mahájans against the Dhandhuka Municipality for the unjust levy of the house-tax on the people clearly show that the authorities were arbitrary in their conduct, and we are glad that the Mahájans have succeeded in getting the order for the imposition of the house-tax cancelled and that the municipality has been made to pay the costs. We hope to revert to this case again very shortly, but in the meantime request Government to carefully inquire into the management of a municipality before it is suspended, in order that it may not be made to suffer for the arbitrary conduct of the authorities.

Part IV.—Native States.

Imperialisation of the armies of Native States and its alleged objects.

27. The Indian Spectat r (2), in its issue of the 1st November, writes :— The visit of the Viceroy to Kashmere is destined to be prolific of some important events. These have already cast their shadows beforehand. From the very guarded but honeyed sentences in which His Excellency Lord Lansdowne responded to the health of the Mahárája, it is obvious that Kashmere is on the eve of many an administrative and military change in its government. We suspect that when these will be announced it will be found that the latter predominate. The civil reforms are chiefly to be financial. These have been already limned, and the secret has been let out by the Regency. They will consist of a better system of collection of the land revenue and the introduction of a department of audit and accounts. As to the military reforms and military activity, the less we say the better. In our opinion they are utterly mischievous and uncalled for. The public at large do not yet seem to have seen through the real object of that new-fangled service, called imperialised troops of Native feudatories. So distrustful has the Government of India grown of the army of Native States,—a distrust which in itself is a strong indication of the timidity of a Government which is powerful and strong and full of resources,—that it felt two years ago that something or other must be effectively done to have it curtailed and thus allay that hysteria of fear conjured by the imagination of its own military advisers. The sole origin of this precious service was the dread of Native Princes, with their rabble troops, secretly combining with the Russians in the case of an invasion. What a sorry and weak and confounded reason, to be sure ! One may wonder at this pusillanimity of the mighty British Government. How illogical is its reasoning, apart from the very remote contingency of an external aggression ! The Russians are undoubtedly advancing nearer India, but we refuse to believe that they are going to invade India. That is simply nonsense. It is a ruse of the Simla pyrotechnists to further their own self-interests and fulfil their vaulting ambition. Military glory and military honours and decorations are the sole motive of their activity. It is they who have for the last five years raised this absolutely absurd alarm of a probable invasion at any time, and have under this pretext sucked the very life-blood of the people by means of enhanced taxation and absorption of a revenue of over 45 krors. And it is this very party which has criminally misled the Government of India into the belief that there is a real and veritable danger in allowing the Native Princes to keep up a large army. Now, the Government of India has over and over again observed that this army is a rabble, irregular and undisciplined one, that it could be dispersed like chaff before the wind, and that it need not cause any uneasiness. It was said so a few years ago by the official at the India Office whose inspired letters appeared in the columns of the London Times. Entertaining this opinion, is it not very unreasoning now to apprehend mischief from such a force? Either it is an army which is to be feared or not feared. If the latter, as they have all along openly and courageously declared in State minutes and despatches, why should they pretend to fear it now? Surely, it has not undergone a change for the better. Where is the evidence that all of a sudden the force has grown so powerful, so well disciplined, so well equipped with the latest arms as to be a standing menace? And if no such evidence is forthcoming, what, may we ask, is the reason which has so heavily weighed with the Government of India as to make it take steps for disbanding these forces and substituting for them this so-called compact army of imperialised troops? If it is to be logical, then it need not have disbanded the forces. But if, on the other hand, it fears that force, why does it not say so openly? Why does it not frankly tell the feudatories that it is afraid of their army as one which is a menace to British Government? Every way the Government of India is on the horns of a dilemma, but it ought to wriggle out of it without injury to its prestige.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne's visit to Kashmere and the expenditure incurred by the State.

28. The Sind Sudhár (153), in its issue of the 31st October, writes:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne, the Viceroy and Governor-General of India, has started on a tour. He is now travelling in Kashmere. It seems that the Kashmere Darbár has sanctioned a sum of Rs. 75,000 for the reception of the Viceroy. The Mahárája will not pay this charge out of his own pocket. It will be disbursed from the State coffers, and eventually fall on the subjects. We do not mean to say that the Kashmere Darbár should not make arrangements for the reception of the Viceroy, but we are of opinion that the expenditure of such a large sum as has now been incurred only for the reception of the Viceroy is sheer waste of money.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Gujarát Mitra (86), in its issue of the 8th November, compares the condition of the Indian people under the former Native rulers with that under the present British Government, and shows that the balance of advantages is in favour of the Native rule, saying that though under the British rule the subject people have full liberty of action as regards social and religious matters and can eat and drink whatever they like and put on any kind of costume, they have lost the substantial advantages of liberty to use arms, cheap salt, free pasture-grounds, &c., and are subjected to unlawful treatment at the hands of the members of the ruling class.

The condition of the people of India before and under the British rule.

2. The Ahmedabad Times (93) and the Svadesh Bandhu (130) of the 11th November, and the Din Mani (82) of the 8th idem, are very uneasy at the advance of Russians in Central Asia and the embassy which the Amir of Kabul is reported to have sent to the Russian Government, and seriously blame the British Government for continuing an attitude of indifference to this political movement of the Amir, whom they call ungrateful and suspect of treachery and say that Government are mistaken if they do not consider the action of the Amir to be dangerous, and that they will act wisely in taking strong measures to check Russian advance and in securing the confidence of the Indian people.

Remarks on the advance of the Russians in Central Asia and the policy of the Amir of Kabul.

3. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—The reports that have reached India about the Amir's mission to Russia have tended to unsettle the minds of the people. That the Amir who fattens on twelve lakhs of Indian money per annum may turn round against England in the hour of need, seems incredible. But he has broken one of the terms of the treaty entered into with him if he has sent a mission to Russia. The complacence with which he has viewed Russian encroachments in the Pamirs may lead us to think that he has turned a traitor, and the announcement of the Standard that Russia is to make a caravan road to the frontiers of India supplies grounds for the supposition that there are some secret springs at work.

Reports about the Amir's mission to Russia and remarks in connection with it.

4. Mr. Haji Suleman Shahamamad Lodhia, writing from Cape Town to the Rást Goftár (90) in its issue of the 8th November, complains that for a long time past the European British subjects in Orange Free States and Transvaal in Africa have been harassing the natives of India trading in those countries in various ways, as, for instance, by not allowing them to purchase estates and lands in their own names and even by withholding trade licenses from them, and says that unless the Government of India come to the rescue of these down-trodden people there is no hope of their getting any redress.

A complaint of the natives of India residing in Orange Free States and Transvaal in Africa against the European British subjects and a request to the Government of India.

5. The Makrátta (5), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—His Excellency Lord Harris, whatever else may be said of him, is at least determined to personally visit the districts which form the presidency, more than once, during his quinquennial régime and thus to come into direct contact with both the people and the officials. His Excellency has been thus fulfilling at least one of the essential functions belonging to his exalted office, beyond comment or cavil, and that is saying a good deal. His frankness of speech, straightforwardness of reply and simplicity of views, interpreted by some into narrowness of vision, have also become by this time universally known, and whatever one may think of the spirit of official one-sidedness that seems to lurk behind the set phrases and expressions, there is no apparent attempt at mincing matters. His lucid style, moreover, aided by his directness of address, in which the pronoun "you" plays an unusually large part, goes straight home to the understanding of all his listeners, and if it may sometimes fail to gratify their sentiments or satisfy their reason, there is no mistaking as to what His Excellency means. Possessed of settled views on the matters generally touched upon in the local addresses as Lord Harris is, it is no wonder that His Lordship's speeches, shorn of any attempt at rhetoric or eloquence as they are, should strike the public mind as breathing monotony. But like varied oratory and lofty periods, simple style and small sentences have also their uses, and if the vigorous common sense and the studied candour on the part of His Excellency make our municipal Ráo Sáhebs a little more practical, their bracing influence will not have been exerted in vain.

Remarks in connection with the resolution recently issued by the Government of Bengal on the tours of inspection of revenue officers and heads of departments.

6. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—It seems that the recent resolution of the Government of Bengal on the tours of inspection of revenue officers and heads of departments has created a great flutter in Bengal official circles. As usual, the official dissatisfaction against the edict of the great Bengal proconsul has found a loud echo in the leading organ of the bureaucracy. This very fact is a proof conclusive to our mind of Sir Charles Elliott's circular being justified. An official of wonderful energy, which reminds one of his former predecessors who used in his days to astonish India by his famous rides and tours, and a man of keen observation whose lynx eyes would detect the smallest of small irregularities, it is quite conceivable that he should have been compelled to remind the district officers that they have a solemn duty to discharge—a double duty, in fact, one to the Government to whom they are responsible for their acts, and the other to the people over whom they are called upon to rule. We know that district work is of a most exacting character; that to the civilian who would conscientiously endeavour to go through it, it is no picnic affair. To him it is no holiday tour-making—a railway speed scampering and scouring, in order to be back at the central seat in the shortest of all possible time. But it seems that in the Bengal district inspection has degenerated, and well it may. For when exalted authorities, who ought to set a better example, are themselves guilty of forgetfulness of the duties they owe to the millions entrusted to them by Providence, it is not unnatural to observe the same spirit of negligence pervading the service. "Like master, like man" is an old adage. When Viceroys and Governors, under the pretence of making extensive tours, simply enjoy a long holiday at the cost of the tax-payers, it is not surprising of the district officers to go and do likewise and really neglect their proper work, which, if conscientiously performed, would greatly allay that discontent of which we now so frequently hear from all parts of the empire. The exalted authorities are the worst sinners. No doubt Sir Charles himself is an exception. But we want a Viceroy and Governor-General of the hard administrative capacity of an Elliott to set a good example. It might be even some comfort if we had no such weak-minded mediocrity as a Lord Cross for our State Secretary. Where the central authority is strong there will be a strong Government, diffusing its own strong energy among those subjected to its will. Hence it is that we find sporting and dancing mediocrities passing the greater portion of their time at favourite hills or other sanitaria, as if gubernatorial life was all lawntennis or cricket, champagne and dancing devils. The rot sets in, with this distinct disadvantage to the ruled, that administrations become demoralised with some favourite Secretaries governing provinces at their own sweet will. Thus provincial and Viceregal administrations degenerate while India cries in the wilderness. A reminder of the character issued by Sir Charles Elliott from some higher authority is now and then needed for our Viceroys and Governors. We may then witness a limitation of the annual exoduses and a reasonable contentment throughout the land. At present, the general rule seems to be "all play and little or no work." This is deplorable, and a huge blot on the administration.

Remarks upon a probable abolition of the income-tax.

7. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 9th November, says that if on account of the alleged satisfactory condition of the Indian treasury for the last three years it is under contemplation to reduce the burden of taxation on the people of India, Government will do well to reduce, first, the duty on salt which affects a larger mass of people than the income-tax, and being afraid that the European community being more interested in the latter imposition will urge its remission, advises the Indian National Congress to draw the attention of Government to the proper course.

Approval of the conduct of Sir A. Collins, Chief Judge of the Madras High Court, in dealing with the Sergeant's case.

8. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 12th November, approves of the sentence passed and the moral courage displayed by Sir Arthur Collins, Chief Justice of the Madras High Court, in deciding the case of the Artillery Sergeant sentenced to be imprisoned for three years with hard labour for causing grievous hurt to a Native cobbler, and says :—If all the Judges were to follow the noble example set by Sir A. Collins in discharging their duties impartially and in expressing complete disapproval of the unjust conduct of the juries empannelled in criminal cases, there would be considerable diminution in crime of this sort in India. The efforts of the Judges in this direction will only enhance the popularity of the British rule among all classes of Her Imperial Majesty's subjects. Government ought to publish a report of such murders committed during the last ten years, with full particulars of the cases, the decisions of the Judges, and the punishments inflicted ; for, such a report will prove to be a sort of check upon the insolent and rash behaviour of the Europeans towards the Natives. [The Bombay Samáchar (97), in its issue of the 12th November, expresses similar sentiments.]

Mr. Mahmadbhái Buránudin, Mullanji of the Bohrás, and a request to Government to postpone conferring on him any distinctions till his debts are cleared.

9. The Kásid-e-Mumbai (112) of the 11th November hears that it is the intention of the Bombay Government to confer the personal distinction of 'Sardár' on Mr. Mahmadbhái Buránudin, the present Mullanji of the Bohrás at Surat, in addition to the privilege of exemption from personal appearance in law courts, says that Government should postpone doing so in the interests of the numerous creditors till the Mullanji has cleared off the debts of his predecessor, and warns the authorities to guard against being taken in by his present unsafe practice of incurring fresh debts to pay off the old ones.

Prospects of a threatening famine in the Bijápur District.

10. The Rámdás (17), in its issue of the 7th November, says that the poor people of the Bijápur District, depending solely upon husbandry for their sustenance, have been struck with dismay at the threatening prospect of a famine for want of rain, that some of them, to save themselves and their families, have migrated to districts better favoured with rain, that the market prices of provisions have been rising daily, that the cattle are dying in numbers for scarcity of fodder, which is felt so much that a cow was sold by the Mámlatdár of Muddebihál at an auction sale for a sum of one anna and a quarter, and that it is a matter of surprise that Government should have done nothing as yet to relieve the distressed, and prays the Government to remit wholly the land assessment for this year.

Pitiable condition of Dublás and other low class menials in the Thána and Surat Districts.

11. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 8th November, regrets that whereas the British Government and the philanthropic socialists are trying to root out slavery and to secure for the poor the same rights which the rich enjoy, it is a pity that no notice is being taken of something like a slave trade which is being carried on in the close vicinity of Bombay in and about Verár in the Thána District and from Pálghar to Surat and in some villages of the Surat District, where whole families of Dublás or servants belonging to a low class of people have to serve a master for a whole life-time on a meagre pittance of food in consideration of a small sum of money advanced for marriage purposes. The paper exhorts all philanthropic gentlemen to take up this pitiable case of the Dublás.

Remarks on the speech delivered by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade at the farewell meeting held in honour of the Honourable J. G. Moore at Poona.

12. The same newspaper dislikes the eulogium passed by the Honourable Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade on civilians at the farewell meeting held at Poona last week in honour of the Honourable Mr. Moore, and observes :—The civilians of the present day are, no doubt, careful in watching the interests of Government and their countrymen, but a majority of them are anti-

Native and widely differ from their predecessors of old in their conduct towards Natives, for the old civilians always considered their happiness as being bound up with the welfare of the people of this country and were always kind and good, so much so that they are even to the present day remembered with gratitude. The Honourable Mr. Ránade is mistaken in supposing that a large number of Anglo-Indians after retirement spend their life in England in serving India, for, as a matter of fact, 99 per cent. of the civilians, after retirement, lose total sight of this country, while the greater portion of the remaining 1 per cent. who take part in public life take every opportunity of crying down India and check-mating the Natives in their just demands, such as Sir Lepel Griffin, Sir Richard Temple, Sir Roper Lethbridge, Mr. Ashburner, &c, while there are only a handful of retired civilians like Sir W. Wedderburn and Mr. Hume who take a real and abiding interest in the welfare of the Natives.

13. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—Ráo Bahádur Ránade, we fear, is fast changing, and what is still more to be regretted is that he is developing in him a passion to speak. The late lamented Mr. Kunte had this passion, which threatened to show strange developments towards the untimely close of his career. The Honourable Mr. Ránade once wrote much and spoke little. Now he does the reverse, and those who watch his speeches generally agree with us in thinking that he is fast degenerating into a platform speaker of a low type. The last speech of his which calls for remark was the one he delivered on the occasion of the reception which was given to the Honourable Mr. Moore. He told his audience that he did not want to speak of the services of Mr. Moore, but wanted to give them the moral of such gatherings. In his remarks he controverted the doctrine that Anglo-Indians were only birds of passage in India. He said the people were wrong in holding that view, because few Anglo-Indians, said he, left India without leaving behind them their relations. It is a fact that most of the retiring civilians leave behind them, either in the covenanted or in the uncovenanted branch of the service, a son, a brother or a nephew. But to refer to this fact on an occasion when we met to say good-bye was certainly not graceful. But the worse part of his remarks was that in which he eulogized the Anglo-Indians because even after they retire they continue to do us service. Except one or two exceptions, e. g., Lords Ripon and Reay and Sir W. Wedderburn, we know retired Anglo-Indians do worse mischief than their brothers in the service. Ráo Bahádur Ránade then referred to the influence which members of the Civil Service exercised upon the conduct of their Native compeers in the subordinate ranks. The whole nation from the Himálayas to Cape Comorin has been crying that Natives are in no way inferior to Europeans, and as such ought always to be given employments of the same emoluments and honour as the Europeans. Our Ráo Bahádur would, however, suggest that the top of the service should continue to be occupied by Europeans, so that they may continue to exercise their influence. It would be absurd to say that in giving expression to such utterly prejudicial views the Ráo Bahádur had a motive, and we therefore abstain from making such a suggestion. But we certainly cannot help observing that the Ráo Bahádur has either changed his views, or that now-a-days he speaks what he feels, whereas in the years gone by he concealed his own thoughts and spoke as a representative man. It is unfortunate that we have to allude to these facts, but duty requires that we should carefully read the Ráo Bahádur and give to the people our reading of him, lest they might not know him until it is too late.

14. The Sudódrak (19), in its issue of the 9th November, writes:—

Significance of social reform in the West and in India.

Students of European politics need not be told that the expression "social reform" does not bear the same signification in the West that it does at present in India. With us this reform, at any rate at present, concerns itself mainly with the emancipation of the Indian womankind. Female education, widow re-marriage and raising the age of marriage—these are the main planks of our reform platform. It is not so in the West. There woman is already the equal of man in all walks of life barring politics, and in many respects she is an object to be respectfully treated by him. Social reform in the West principally represents the struggle that is at present going on between labour and capital, the efforts for the amelioration of the unwashed millions. A considerable part of the best intellect of the Western countries is engaged in suggesting means and trying schemes for bettering the status of the labouring classes. In India, however, it is sad to think that there is no conscious effort on the part of any one except the Government to better the lot of the labouring millions. Our caste system, with rigidity and its injustice, discourages all sympathy of class with class, and inculcates the woful doctrine that some human beings are hereditarily impure and accursed and that their very touch ought to be avoided as contaminating. The most woful part of the matter is that the minds of these "impure and accursed" creatures have been so far enslaved that they are contented with their lot and have no idea of ever trying to assert their equality as human beings with men of higher castes. Our present agitation about social reform, about the education of women and so forth, concerns the Bráhman and quasi-Bráhman communities only. What matters this agitation to those millions whose women are allowed to re-marry and the ignorance of whose women has nothing remarkable about it, inasmuch as in that respect they are no worse off than their men? It is idle to expect that India will ever be able to take her rank among the great nations of the modern world if the hundreds of millions of her children continue steeped in their present ignorance, poverty and mental degradation, and if they never realize their dignity as men. Every true lover of this country ought to abhor a system of national existence which keeps more than 90 per cent. of the population in phenomenal ignorance, and which enables a handful of men, arrogating to themselves a monopoly of learning and things sacred and great, to exercise a despotic sway over the hearts of their less fortunate brethren. The whole edifice of Hindu society is in this respect rotten from top to bottom, and only a huge effort, one often thinks, like the great French Revolution of 1789, can pull it down and sweep away its ruins, leaving the ground clear for a social structure that would aim at uniting in itself all that is great and good in every society, including our own. But such an effort is not possible for various reasons. In its absence the work will have to be done slowly but surely by the machinery of education. So long as 90 per cent. of the population are unable even to read and write, it is no wonder that the shrewd and learning-monopolizing Bráhman should be regarded by the other classes as a being invested with almost magical powers, and as one whose spiritual despotism they are bound not only to tolerate, but even to welcome and invite. And we deliberately express the opinion that a cure may be found for this state of things in some system of compulsory education. Even the most elementary education will enhance or rather create a feeling of self-respect in the minds of our lower classes, and raise, however little, their standard of living—two things most essential for their emancipation from an existence of degradation and misery. We do not underrate the difficulties that must necessarily lie in the path of everyone who would try to devise an effective scheme for compulsory education in a country like India, but it is not extravagant to hope that the resources of English statesmanship, if called forth in an earnest spirit, would not be inadequate to successfully cope with the task. The salvation of India lies in the education of her people, and leaders of society and Government will, we trust, adequately realise their solemn responsibility in this direction.

Approval of the action of the Bombay Police to stop the performance of Khalif Harun-al-Raschid.

15. The Kdsid-e-Mumbai (122), in its issue of the 13th November, is glad that Mr. Brewin, Police Superintendent, Bombay, on Monday last, compelled the Alfred dramatic troupe to stop the performance of Khalif Harun-al-Raschid as being likely to wound the feelings of the Mahomedans, regrets that no such steps were taken before this, and says that Khalifs are held in great reverence by the Mahomedans, who being more religious than the Hindus are more sensitive and have a greater right to ask for the stopping of such a performance.

Remarks in connection with Christian missionary publications abusing the gods of the Hindus.

16. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—The missionary publications abusing the gods of the Hindus have not fortunately been circulated in so large a number in Gujarát, or else the people here would have been as much excited over them as those at Bombay. During the course of the last few days several meetings of Gujarátí and Maráthá Hindus have been held in Bombay to request the Government to stop the circulation of the mischievous tract recently published by the Tract and Book Society aspersing the character of the Hindu god Krishna, and we do not doubt that if the Government turn a deaf ear to their protestations there will be endless mutual recriminations. The Mahomedan riot of Bombay should be a warning to those who allow any mischievous publications to excite the populace. If the Hindus retaliate by abusing Christ and his mother Mary, the missionaries and the Christian people will be the first to protest and complain as injured persons. They would not fail to move heaven and earth. Why then should the mild Hindu allow his favourite god Krishna to be abused? The inventive genius of the Christian writers has laid imaginary crimes at the door of the Hindu hero. Is it in order that the deluded people in England may give large sums of money for this militant propaganda that the preachers injure the religious feelings of the Hindus? Do they not know that the greater part of the Bible is as much a romance as any of the Hindu Puráns?

Some questions on Christianity.

17. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 9th November, publishes the following questions on Christianity as proposed by a correspondent for solution either by "B. P." or some other Christian:—(1) It is stated in the Bible that God includes in Him the Father, the son and the holy spirit. Who combined the three into a god and in what proportion were the three components mixed? (2) If all men are the children of God, why do they require Jesus Christ as their mediator? Is it necessary to have an interpreter when children speak to or ask anything of their father? (3) When it is asserted that only those are holy and only those will get salvation who are baptised at the hands of the disciples of Christ, what has become of all those who lived before him, i. e., 1891 years ago? Were they all meritorious and required no baptism? If they required it, who performed the ceremony? (4) Who was the generator of Jesus Christ? Is it possible for a virgin to give birth to a child without her virginity being violated? If God is his father, has He a form? The god of the Puráns who issued out from a pillar to the assistance of Pralhád, and who condescended to appear even as a Mahár in the case of Dámáji, is a better god. But no, he is a useless, unreal god! Why? Because, perhaps, he is not the same as one who is made up of the Father, son and holy ghost and who could silently bear to see his own son nailed on the cross by the people! Where was the Heavenly Father gone to when his son was so cruelly treated? (5) Was Jesus suspended on the cross by others or did he suspend himself? If crucified by others, what is the reason of his crucifixtion? Is it possible that Jesus died because other people committed sin? A commits a murder; B comes and offers to be hanged. Is our just Government prepared to allow this? If the Government does not allow it, how can God, the governor of all the governments, allow it? And if he allowed it, is it likely that even a child would call him wise, just, &c.? (6) Is God all-pervading or stationary in the heavens? If the former, why do the Christians say "Oh Heavenly Father" when they offer prayers? (7) Does the word of God change like a railway time-table? Why was the old testament replaced by a new one? Was he not in his senses when he made the old testament? (8) If the water of the Ganges cannot purify, how can the water used at the baptism ceremony do so? (9) If all people are created by God, why should Satan, the deceiver of all, have been created by Him who is omniscient? If he knew what was to befall, why should He not be held responsible for His children's sinfulness and for their yielding to the temptations of Satan?

Remarks on the appointment of Mr. Walshe as an Assistant Collector of Customs.

18. The Akhbár-e-Soudgar (95), in its issue of the 9th November, says that injustice has been done to Mr. J. A. Wadia by the appointment of Mr. Walshe, of the Preventive Service Department, to act for Mr. J. D. Karaka as Assistant Collector of Customs, as Mr. Wadia has acted on more than one occasion for Mr. Karaka and given satisfaction. The paper asks how a clever and honest Native officer could ever hope to have justice done to him when officers from the Preventive Service Department—a department specially reserved for Europeans—are appointed to act as Assistant Collectors of Customs.

19. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 8th November, publishes a letter over the signature of "G. V. Joshi, self-constituted Full Power Magistrate of India," in which the writer finds fault with the decision of Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, in a case of defamation brought against the Poona Vaibhav newspaper by one Mr. Pandit in connection with a tea party given at the Convent School, Poona, and charges the reformers with want of moral courage and stealthily breaking the caste rules regarding eating and drinking. About Mr. Plunkett the correspondent says:—Henry Arthur Plunkett, being the representative of the British Court of Justice, ought not to have entertained this complaint, but referred the parties to their spiritual guru or the Hindu archbishop. He failed to do so. My court does not know how to account for this inattention to the custom, even now prevalent in England, of referring ecclesiastical cases to the Archbishop of Canterbury, as was done in the instance of the Bishop of Lincoln. The British Courts of Justice in India have consequently made a mess of our social and religious institutions by unnecessarily meddling with our social and religious life, and encouraging people to quarrel among themselves. It is to be regretted that this case was taken before a Christian who does not know what caste rules are and how they are worked out. The reformers and the orthodox are both to blame; one cannot find fault with another, without bringing odium upon himself. It is, however, world-wide known that the British Court of Justice has been the recognised friend of reformers. It is ever ready to uphold them even in their nefarious deeds. I must not, therefore, be surprised at the attitude shown by the Magistrate in conducting this case. Spite, malice and grudge are the three crowning epithets which Henry Arthur Plunkett has hurled against some of the witnesses on the defence side. Sister Superior and Revd. Mr. Rivington deposed that it was a public meeting and arranged for public manifestation, while Henry Arthur Plunkett has decided that it was private. Even in the examination of one witness, the word 'private' was put into his mouth when he answered that it was public. This course was unjust as much as it was unwarrantable. On being questioned as to whether the sociable was public or private, one witness plainly stated that it was public, but the Magistrate objected to it by saying that as it was not open to all, it could not be called public—a very good definition, indeed! What is then public? Almost all the meetings, according to this definition, would be private and nothing but private. This point must be cleared. My court is bound to decide that the sociable was not private, but as public as any public gathering could be. It is wrong to say that the sociable was private when so much public thought, energy and expense were bestowed upon it. It was made the subject of newspaper articles before and after it was held. I can only say in astonishment that Henry Arthur Plunkett would be the only Magistrate who could say that it was private. Now the charge of malice, spite and grudge which the Magistrate has so largely drawn support from for his decision is, perhaps, an imaginary one. The evidence before my court does not in the least substantiate it. The sociable was arranged for strengthening the hands of reformers in fulfilling their cherished desires. Their names were published in order to put them to shame and that they may gain strength in carrying out their resolution to practise reform, but Henry Arthur Plunkett, in deciding this case against the defendant and in favour of the prosecution, caused both the parties to be checkmated. What are we to learn from it? It will only help the reformers to be always immorally disposed towards things which are innocent in themselves. Of the reformers the writer speaks in the following strain:—The reformers have got into a habit of stealthy eating and drinking. Its influence is pernicious and it has been universally acknowledged to be an evil of a very great magnitude. As good comes out of evil, so some of these reformers thought it their duty to make a public manifestation of their avowed object. Love-dinners have therefore been annually held, to which all kinds of people, Mahomedans, Jews, Christians, Pársis and Hindus of all shades and shapes from Bráhmans down to Mahárs and Mángs of respectability are invited, and they all sit to take their meals without observing any distinction of caste or colour. Mr. Modak and others do still assert that it is done but publicly. No privacy or secrecy is ever attached to it. But when it is made a matter for publication, the reformers have invariably shown a great concern, not because they had done anything against their own conscience, but because the society in which they move and with which they are so closely connected would dislike it. Notwithstanding this fear, these promiscuous dinners have been arranged from year to year, sometimes with the connivance of the anti-reformers or the orthodox people, sometimes under a faint or quaint garb of caste. I can name almost all the reformers who freely resort to European hotels and refreshment-rooms and eat all manner of things. My court is in possession of overwhelming evidence in support of what I state. Ráo Bahádur Ránade is the head of this reform party. There is not a caste or sect, low or high, at whose hands he may not take water. Men who are actual drunkards and flesh-eaters have been his hosts, and I am sure he will never deny it. It is Mr. Ránade, so far as my court can ascertain, who has given this shifting character to our young men. It has always been his policy to do things by underhand means, never bold, never to the front, always backsliding. It is the misfortune of India that he should be wanting in moral courage. Had it not been for his weakness, this sociable at St. Mary's Convent could certainly have been prevented from coming into the British Court of Justice. But the mischief has been done, not only in the social world, but also in the political and religious ones. I am very sorry to record this fact. Mr. Ránade is a great man, indeed, but with all his greatness and nobleness of heart, he has been instrumental in giving a cowardly tone to Hindu society at large. Young men of this generation are not true to themselves. They are always ready to falsify themselves, even sometimes for no earthly gain. Honesty has altogether disappeared, and my court holds Ráo Bahádur M. G. Ránade and men of his time responsible for it. It will take years before this mischief, done to India by these reformers under the guidance of their weak potentate, can be removed. We were a fallen nation when the English came to India. We are still more miserable when we cannot point our finger to a single soul who could stand the test of trial. English education has therefore been totally useless, at least in India. It has produced immoral tendencies and sceptical dispositions in the minds of all those who have been to schools and colleges. There are many other reformers like the Honourable Justice K. T. Telang. But I do not think that I can speak better of them. This, indeed, is a very deplorable condition, and without a remedy.

20. The same newspaper writes :—After dragging over the weary length of nearly a month and a quarter, the Poona Vaibhav defamation case has ended in the conviction of the accused and a fine of Rs. 200 has been imposed upon Mr. Shankar V. Kelkar, the editor. Mr. Plunkett, the City Magistrate who tried the case, is known to be a practical man of sound common sense and his decision has given satisfaction to the reformers of the town, who have now got a sanad to make a free use of their tongue. We are, however, constrained to observe that the Magistrate has simply blundered in expounding the law on the subject. There was little or no dispute about the facts in this case. A sociable was held at St. Mary's Convent and Ráo Bahádurs and Professors of the city were amongst the guests. The complainant admits that he had been there, but denies having taken tea at the place, or having gone there with that object. It is in evidence that he knew the object of the sociable and that a cup of tea was given in his hands. It is also on record that the party was organised and expenses paid by a gentleman of the reform party, a Ráo Bahádur we might say. The report published by the accused is again believed to be substantially correct. And yet Mr. Plunkett holds that this was a private party and that no one has a right to publish what took place on such an occasion. His Worship, however, is not pleased to quote any High Court decision or any other authority in support of this view, nor are contrary authorities discussed or even so much as alluded to in the judgment. All that we can, therefore, say on the point is that Mr. Plunkett has utterly failed to understand the situation. He was probably under some delusion when he laid down that a member of a caste has no right to question the conduct and acts of another member when such acts are public in the sense that they are openly done. Mr. Gopálráo Joshi's letter, which we publish elsewhere, is worth consideration in this connection, and we hope that the matter will not be dropped until a decision of the highest court is obtained. The courts have always professed not to interfere with caste rules or their working; but if Mr. Plunkett's rule is to be followed in future, it will only serve to further demoralise the society by granting a free charter to every kind of libertinism—an evil that is already threatening to be the bane of our community. Progress and reform, when such are the sins committed in your name, what hope is there for our educated classes?

Complaint of an income-tax payer in the Kaira District and a request to Government in the matter.

21. The Swadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 11th November, says that the income-tax is a very obnoxious tax and that it becomes more so when the income-tax collectors in the mofussil depend on the Talátis and such other subordinates for information and dispose of the appeals of the people without hearing them properly, in an off-hand manner, that two such instances have recently occurred at Mahudha in the Kaira District, in which Jamnádás Ráyji and Chhagan Zavér being assessed by the Taláti, although their incomes were under Rs. 500 each, appealed to Mr. Lawrence, Income-tax Collector, and the former's appeal was decided in his favour while that of the latter was rejected. The paper adds that it seems that the Collector has not carefully examined the accounts of Chhagan, but depended mainly on the Taláti's statement, and that it would be well if Government did justice in such cases.

A complaint against the conduct of Mr. Vincent, Superintendent of Police, Karáchi, towards one Mr. Carson.

22. A correspondent, writing to the Phœnix (6) in its issue of the 7th November over the signature of R. J. Carson, writes:—Newspapers have trumpeted the fact that one Mr. Carson has been fined by the City Magistrate, Karáchi, for standing on the foot-board of a tramcar while in motion. But there are some particulars connected with this unfortunate case which should be made known, in justice to my character as a gentleman and in the interests of the public at large. On the evening of the 14th October last I was waiting near the house of the Persian Consul for a tramcar to the Sadar. Two cars passed one after the other with the annoying cry "no room," "no room." The third came with the same cry, but this time I got up and stood on the foot-board. I knew it was against the bye-laws of the company, but urgency of business made me follow the strong maxim "necessity has no law." I was asked to get off the board and I did so, not by getting down from the car, but by forcing myself on a seat. When the car reached the Small Cause Court some passengers alighted and then a ticket was issued to me. I thought all troubles were now over, but it was not so. As the car came opposite the bungalow of Mr. Vincent, the Police Superintendent, the tramcar inspector had the car stopped and brought a gentleman to me, whom I afterwards came to know as the Police Superintendent. He demanded my name and I answered him in quite a John Bull fashion, "Who the devil are you to demand my name?" I did not know he was a police officer, for he had no uniform, and I felt very much irritated at this indecorous query and breach of etiquette. Hence such a rude reply. He got furious and ordered me to alight. I showed him my ticket and refused to get down. He called two Native constables to his assistance. He laid hold of my leg, while the constables had me by the arms. I remonstrated with him and told him he was acting against law, but in vain. At this juncture I had no other recourse but to get down. Mr. Vincent continued furious and ordered the constables to take me to the chowki and have me locked up. I was taken like the worst of criminals along a public street to the chowki, where I was received by two European constables, who told me it was the Police Superintendent who had ordered me to be locked up. The Police Superintendent came following up, and told the constables to get the name of "that European brute," meaning my name. I again remonstrated against his ungentlemanly conduct, but to no effect. He continued to shower invectives on me. After all, my name was taken and I was let go. Now, Sir, I have stated the facts of the case and let the public judge. I have nothing to say in my defence, for the facts certainly go to palliate the misrepresented gravity of my offence. As regards the conduct of Mr. Vincent, the Police Superintendent, the public should do well to consider the following questions. Was he within his legitimate right as a police officer to force me down from the tramcar when I had a ticket and was properly seated, on the ground that I was standing on the foot-board of the car some time ago? Was he justified in abusing me with Billingsgate epithets and sending me like a felon to the police chowki to be locked up? Had he any right to arrest and detain me? These questions should be thoroughly and properly sifted and representations made to the higher authorities to check the high-handedness of the executive underlings. I write this not to gratify any personal motive, but with the hope that the respectability of gentlemen may be made safe from the rude handling of the police.

Part II.—Legislation.

Remarks on a Bill to make vaccination of children in certain portions of the Bombay Presidency compulsory.

23. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 12th November, writes:—The Bombay Government has brought before its Legislative Council a Bill to prohibit the practice of inoculation and to make vaccination of children in certain parts of the Bombay Presidency compulsory. Government has seen that the voluntary system is ineffectual on account of indifference, indolence or ignorance, and that the people have no rooted objection to vaccination. Some great outbreaks of small-pox in Sind have made the Bill a pressing necessity. Here there is a little contradiction. How, if the people were only ignorant, indifferent or indolent and not opposed to vaccination on religious grounds, could they not take advantage of it even when they were startled out of their wits by such severe visitations? For aught we know, we can say that religious scruples, though in a gradually diminishing degree, should be considered one of the reasons of the people not resorting to it. The Bill empowers the Governor in Council to extend the compulsory system to any local area in the presidency and also to withdraw or suspend its application in any area to which it may have been extended. Any doubt about the legality of vaccinating prisoners and convicts has been removed in the Bill. It is, in fact, framed in a cautious spirit. Where there are religious scruples, it is hoped it will not be applied. However, to disarm all opposition, the Government should order a wide use of animal lymph.

Part III.—Education.

Remarks on the advice given by the Honourable Sir Raymond West to the Poona City Municipality to increase its grant to the Poona Native Institution.

24. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 9th November, writes:—The Honourable Sir Raymond West asked the Poona Municipality to increase its grant to the Poona Native Institution on the ground that that school sends out educated citizens to fill its ratepayers' lists. Even if this principle be admitted for a moment, the Poona Suburban and the Cantonment Committee ought to have been as well asked, or rather advised, by Sir Raymond to take their fair share of the increased burden, for the alumni of Mr. Bháve's school are partially drawn from these districts as well. Similarly, the "land tax" derived by Government from the Central Division districts ought to pay up decently, for the Government is as much interested in having educated subjects as local municipal committees are in securing educated ratepayers. But the fact of the matter is that it is as easy for the Government to say "We have to deal out to so many institutions that we cannot possibly pay you more," as it is easy for a Kesari or a Mahratta to find fault with the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act. It is a stock answer, framed after many anxious hours of Secretariat red-tape thought, which every Governor who trusts to his Secretaries more than to his personal knowledge, soon manages to learn and retails in reply to the addresses he receives. But we cannot say the same thing of a Councillor like Sir R. West. And yet he, too, plays the same tune. The Government know too well that we have yet to learn to spend our money in educational undertakings. The lesson is a stiff one, and will take a long time to be assimilated. But until that happy moment, Lord Harris' "crutch," (not Mr. Lee-Warner and Sir Charles Pritchard, but Governmental aid, we mean) should not be withdrawn. Applying these remarks to the Female High School, we will ask Government whether they are ignorant of the hard fight the advocates of female education have to make here in Poona. We assert that no Government is so well aware of it as that which entrusts the details of the educational portfolio to Mr. Lee-Warner. He knows the situation only too well.

But like every officer, or, for the matter of that, like every human being, he is a man of 'fads.' His special weakness is his strong-mindedness, and that leads him to stick like a leech to an opinion he once forms, and being master of details he soon succeeds in persuading the Governor or the Councillor of the ultimate utility of his opinion. Unlike other Secretaries, he cannot rely on the information and the opinions of the officers of the department which he is supposed to represent in the Secretariat. Why should he? He knows as much as they can ever teach him, and, besides, he can do what they cannot, viz., induce his own opinions into the recipient minds of his chiefs. As regards knowledge of circumstances, therefore, the Government cannot plead ignorance. Well then, what on earth do they mean by foreshadowing a future of starvation for the Female High School? Or have they come to be of the Pioneer's opinion (and of his followers) that in educating the men of India Government has raised a fine hornets' nest about their ears, and do they therefore wish to deny the women of India the same benefit of education? We are very unwilling to say this of an English Government which always follows out consistently a principle, regardless of its temporary ill effects, if any such there result. But perhaps "English" human nature deteriorates by time when transplanted in alien soil, especially in Asiatic soil!

Remarks on the present condition of the Government Law Class in Bombay.

25. While reviewing the last Annual Report on Education in the Bombay Presidency, the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 12th November, says:—In its resolution on this report the Government has expressed its satisfaction at the prosperity of the Law Class in Bombay, but those who are acquainted with its real condition will be surprised at this. The Professors of the Law Class have nothing to do with the smallness or largeness of the number of candidates passed. The Law Class is not in the least useful to students studying law; they only attend it because they are compelled to do so. If it is to remain in its present condition the money spent on it is simply wasted, and it will be better to spend it on some useful work in the Educational Department. The present state of the Law Class is very disgraceful, both to the University and the Government.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Advice to ratepayers to sue municipal commissioners for money spent on the reception of the Governor.

26. The Shubh Suchak (68), in its issue of the 6th November, advises ratepayers to sue municipal commissioners for money spent on the reception of the Governor, saying that this use of money is contrary to the provisions of the Municipal Act and that the practice of doing honour to the representatives of Her Gracious Majesty at the expense of municipal funds will, if not checked in time, entail heavy loss on the poor ratepayers and encourage municipal commissioners to persist in their abuse of powers, and observes that the ratepayers of Sholápur and Nagar will be doing their duty in suing the municipal commissioners for moneys recently spent by them on Lord Harris' reception, compelling them to make reparation for the loss occasioned by the neglect of their duty towards the ratepayers whose interests they are bound to protect, and thus setting an example to other districts, and that though they cannot be sure of their success in such a suit, it is difficult to suppose that it will be decided against them, as such use of municipal funds is not sanctioned by law.

Approval of the re-election of Dr. Blaney as a member of the Joint Schools Committee by the Bombay Municipal Corporation.

27. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 9th November, writes:—The Bombay Municipal Corporation has paid a graceful compliment to Dr. Blaney by re-electing him member of the Joint Schools Committee. The worthy doctor is one of the few citizens of Bombay who work zealously and well in our civic affairs, without ostentation and without the hope of reward. He is now about the oldest member of the municipality, and has still retained his earnestness and ardour as strongly as when he was fresh to the work. In all municipal matters he has taken a leading part, and has almost invariably been on the popular side. The Corporation could have found no better representative to administer its affairs in the branch of education, and the choice does as much honour to the electors as to the elected. [Several other papers of the week express similar sentiments.]

A fish-market on the Back Bay beach in Bombay disapproved.

28. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 8th November, writes:—A fish-market nuisance has sprung up in a quarter where it ought not to be tolerated. Hundreds of people, young and old, go out in the evening for a refreshing promenade on the Back Bay beach, but now-a-days the pleasure of the evening walk is so completely marred by the all-pervading and abominable smell emanating from the fish-market held near Chaupáti that many who are fond of a constitutional are compelled to stay at home to avoid the intolerable nuisance on the seashore. We do not know if the unsavoury and quarrelsome fishermen have been permitted by the same eccentric municipal officer to hold a bazar there whose sense of æsthetics refused to be gratified with anything less than a latrine in a central public place. It is simply cruel to deprive people of the pleasures of a walk, and we fail to understand the propriety of granting permission to create a grave nuisance in a place of public resort. We do not know if the matter has been brought to the notice of the municipal authorities. If no such permission has been given, they should take early steps to put a stop to a nuisance which contaminates not only the surrounding atmosphere, but even the western breezes sweeping over the town. Girgaum and the neighbouring districts are doubtless in need of a convenient market, but the present substitute is a positive nuisance to every one. The police are ever ready with their illegal threats to poor bare-headed mourners, if they meet with any, on the Queen's Road. Can they not put an end to a real nuisance?

Part V.—Native States.

Mahárája of Kashmere as President of the Council of Regency in that State.

29. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 12th November, writes:—His Excellency the Viceroy has done a graceful act in re-investing Mahárája Partábsing with some of his powers. The Mahárája will henceforth take his seat as the President of the Council of Regency, and any differences that will arise among the members will be referred to the arbitration of the Resident. It is right that we should consider this tardy, but none the less hearty, acknowledgment of the Mahárája's claims as an earnest of still greater powers to be conferred upon him, and every loyal subject of the British Government should be all the more glad to know that the Imperial representative has begun to rectify the tremendous mistake of the beginning of his reign after a personal inspection of the State affairs in the Happy Valley. The new arrangement, while it will gratify the patriotism of the Kashmeri's, will bestow all the advantages of the British rule on them. The school-master also seems to have been abroad in Kashmere, as evidenced by the speech of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne at a missionary institution. The British influence and prestige being established in the State, it would remain for the paramount power to see that they are maintained intact. By an act of justice like the present, the Viceroy has added a strong link in the loyalty which binds Kashmere to the Government of India.

Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick as Resident at Hyderabad (Deccan).

The Varhád Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 9th November, writes:—Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick has certainly won the good name of a successful and wise Resident. He has immensely improved the relations of the Nizám's State with the representative of the suzerain power and has acted in the pleasantest and most confidential manner to secure the welfare of the State with his able and mature judgment. He has remarkably stood the test of his predecessors Sir Richard Mead and General T. Denneby, who dwelt on official relations with orientals in two separate and instructive papers at the last Congress of Orientalists in London. He did not transgress his limits in advising the Nizám and his counsellors on matters of State with the result which he believes generally to be beneficial to the interests of the State. He guardedly preserved the due order of authority and did not allow such loopholes in the administration to enable the Nizám's men to overtop their master. Having brought into active play a stimulus to straightforwardness and the sacredness of responsible duties in the State, he inspired confidence and respect amongst those who came in contact with him and the Nizám. Therefore it is but natural that the delightful news of his elevation to the Lieutenant-Governorship of the Panjáb should arouse the Hyderabad State to the feeling of the sore loss of its experienced and excellent Resident. He goes next week to England on a short leave of three months before he takes up the charge of his new office. He is practically leaving Hyderabad for good, and the Nizám and his minister have arranged a grand farewell party in recognition of his rare goodness and high abilities.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Russian advance towards India and the steps that the British Government should take in view thereof.

1. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 15th November, says that from the slow but sure advance of the Russians towards India, the friendly attitude shown by the Amir of Kabul to Russia in spite of the large subsidy received by him from the British Government, and the active preparations which the Indian Government is making to meet the advancing enemy by re-enforcing the frontier defences, making efforts to secure the good will of the Afghans and the Amir on their side, patting the Mahárája of Kashmir on the back, deprived though he is of all real administrative authority, with a view to pacify the minds of his subjects, strengthening Indian harbours like Karáchi, Bombay and Madras and striving to enlist the sympathy and co-operation of Native Princes, it is evident that there is a prospect of Russian dominions becoming adjacent to the British Indian territories in the near future, that this proximity of the territories of the two powers will serve to keep both the powers in awe of each other and to make them more careful and solicitous about the happiness and contentment of their respective subjects, and that in the present political circumstances of the country, though the people of India will continue their allegiance to the British Government, it is very desirable that the latter in their own interests should promote the welfare of their subjects by relaxing the rigour of the hard-pressing salt, forest, income tax and similar other imposts.

An astrological prophecy about a coming national disaster.

2. The Jagannmitrá (40), in its issue of the 16th November, publishes a communication in which the writer says that on the 1st of November current, the new moon day of the Hindu month of Ashwin, there was such a conjunction of the planets as is ominous of coming war, destruction of men, cattle, birds, &c., political disaster and other national calamities, that there was a similar planetary conjunction in 1856 as was notified in an issue of the Jagannmitrá of that year, and that the sad events signified by this year's conjunction must take place everywhere, especially in India, within a year.

Remarks on the annexation of Zanzibar as a British territory.

3. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 15th November, writes :—Whether the annexation of Zanzibar as British territory, with the Sultan as the reigning puppet, is justifiable and reconcileable with the code of international politics and ethics, is a moot question. We may leave it to be decided by those most conversant with its past history. But this much we can say that the fall of Zanzibar is of a piece with the fall of other Native States, Asiatic or African. It is the logical sequence of that complacent theory in politics which affirms that the flag follows trade. The Honourable East India Company came to trade in India, and established their first factory at Surat. The inch of the British foot under the guise of commerce was planted. The ell came in due course. And the rest is only ancient history. Zanzibar is only a strip of narrow territory bordering on the eastern coast of Africa. The British got their foothold there in 1856, thanks to the pluck and energy of Colonel Rigby. Commerce was the sole aim pretended; and next the philanthropic mission of emancipating the slaves. And to-day we see here, too, the logical sequence of trade. The British flag is predominant. High flutters in the breeze the Union Jack. Where reigned and ruled Syad Burgash thirty-five years ago, there reigns his successor with the British as rulers de facto. No doubt trade will flourish and expand to a greater degree. We may fully expect the blessings, and the curses also, of Pax Britannica. But of what use all this? To what purpose this elbowing out of native chiefs and supplanting them with benevolent British despots? Is there any political morality in the transaction? Even the indigenous administrative and executive agency is to be gradually abolished. The thin end of the wedge is already driven. This is certain to become wide and thick enough, as the modern requirements of a highly refined civilised administration multiply. Already the big loaves and fishes of the high administrative offices are distributed among the ruling caste. The White Brâhmans will eat away the Black Pariahs. And lo! the people may be impoverished, just as Indians have been. Wealth will accumulate, but for whom? Not for the native of Zanzibar. No. It will be for the native of the British Isles. This is the sad moral of the annexation of Zanzibar as a British territory. The Anglo-Indian dailies have presented to the public the obverse of the shield. We present this reverse, and ask our people to reflect on it.

Remarks in connection with the transfer of Sir John Gorst from the post of Under Secretary of State for India to the treasury bench.

4. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 13th November, writes:—Sir John Gorst, poor man, has been shunted to the treasury! What a fate for the ambition of so superb and proud a Tarquinius as this whilom member of the fourth party and the Under Secretary of State for India! But Sir John need not lament this fate. His philosophic cynicism should comfort him that in this age of brazen impudence, mendacity and political tergiversation the race is not for the ablest, the brightest and the cleverest, but for the mediocre who could truckle to his official superior, black his boots, and sit with folded hands. India may perchance regret this promotion, though had he served the people as he would serve his conscience, he might have to-day found the 25 krors of Indian people loudly demanding the Principal Secretaryship as a reward for his five years' labours. He now goes to the treasury unenvied and unlamented. This may be gall and wormwood to the sensitive temperament of so superior an official as Sir John. But it will serve him as an imperishable reminder the rest of his political life. The blessings of a grateful people are, after all, a higher, richer and nobler reward than all the honours, titles and promotions of office, ministerial or non-ministerial. India weeps not for Sir John. Nor will it rejoice for a Curzon or a Maclean. She will only weep for a Fawcett or a Bright, a Bradlaugh or a Slagg.

Remarks in connection with His Excellency Lord Wenlock's reply to Mr. Caine's attack on his famine policy.

5. The Gujarâti (85), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—His Excellency Lord Wenlock's reply to Mr. Caine's impeachment of the famine policy of the Madras Government has been rightly characterised as a very tornado of fury. The language used by the "devil-dancing" Governor was absolutely undignified for a high officer of his station, and has been rightly denounced, both in India and England, by all independent writers, with the exception of those official apologists who profess to write with an air of supercilious superiority, but with jaundiced eyes assisted by rose-coloured spectacles. Even supposing that Mr. Caine's allegations were not quite accurate there was no malice in them, as he distinctly admitted that his statements were based upon the facts supplied by a correspondent in whom he had full faith. So that at least as an English gentleman he should not have been attacked with the ferocity and recklessness worthy of a professional bully or wrestler. India at this time presents the sad spectacle of a country governed by mediocrities, none of whom can decently lay claim to genuine statesmanship. We have cricketing Governors, athletic Governors, and auxiliary Secretary Governors and a weak Viceroy in the hands of inexperienced councillors, who, under more favourable circumstances, would not have blundered as grievously as he has in many matters, and would perhaps have distinguished himself like his predecessors, Lord Mayo and Lord Ripon. A cricket field or a gymnasium is not the best training-ground for a politician, nor fancy dress balls, devil dances and a round of cricket games and pleasure parties the best mode to learn the grievances of the subject population and initiate fresh reforms or complete those already initiated by one's predecessors. For how did Lord Wenlock once propose to deal with the impending famine in the Madras Presidency? By playing a match with our Governor's team. It was only the pressure of public opinion and strong comments in the press that roused Lord Wenlock into activity and induced him to give up the pleasures of devil-dancing at Ootacamund.

The helpless condition to which the local Governments are alleged to have been reduced by the system of provincial contracts and the necessity for reforming it.

6. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th November, writes:—It is rather sad to see the helpless condition, financially speaking, to which the local Governments are reduced by the operation of the provincial contracts. We are not aware of what precise condition the other provincial Governments are in. But the Bombay Government is, at any rate, always showing itself to be hopelessly impecunious. For every proposal of administrative reform the invariable reply is "No funds: the Government of India has so tied down our hands." The scheme of provincial contracts was devised to give freedom of action and liberty of progress to provincial Governments. But each time the contracts are renewed, the grants are so curtailed that there is increasing difficulty felt by the local administrations every year. The aggressive foreign policy of the Government of India makes new demands upon its purse, and the effect of those demands is felt by the provinces in the starvation of all useful administration. The administrative machine is, indeed, going on. There is no lack of high salaries to the European agency. But let any useful work be pressed on the Government, such as the promotion of education in one form or another, and the Government is invariably prompt with the excuse that the Government of India leaves it no liberty to increase the grants. Surely such a system requires to be revised.

Remarks on the Indian National Congress.

7. The Dnyánodaya (12), in its issue of the 19th November, writes:—There is apparently very little interest taken in this presidency in the National Congress which is to be held next month at Nagpur. It is an undoubted fact that the Congress has not accomplished what its promoters expected, nor what its friends wished for. It is a large body that represents a few political agitators, but not the masses of the people. It is clamouring for concessions for which the country is not ready, and its efforts are confined to the few days of oratorial display. Forgetting that social reform must be at the basis of political reform, it is striving for the latter without attaching importance to the former. It would be far more sensible if the Congress would resolve itself into a Social Reform Congress and spend the next twenty years in effecting those internal reforms that are first needed, as a basis for the desired political changes. We are surprised to see that it is suggested that the Congress should condemn the Age of Consent Act. That would, indeed, be a backward step, from which the Congress would not recover for many years. The Congress would lose every English sympathizer and put off to a very far future the thought even of representative government in India.

A suggestion to the Indian National Congress to take up the subject of the abolition of the ecclesiastical departments in India.

8. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 19th November, writes:—We suggest a question for the consideration of the forthcoming Indian National Congress. The question is whether it is just and equitable to maintain the several ecclesiastical departments under the Supreme and Provincial Governments? The departments are maintained by the heathen taxpayers for the spiritual benefit of Europeans. When the discussion in relation to the departments was started some years ago, many Anglo-Indian newspapers admitted the injustice. It is unnecessary to give here all the arguments against the existence of these departments. They will readily suggest themselves to those who look into the question minutely. We hope that the Congress will take up the question and press it upon the attention of Government.

Remarks in connection with the appointment of a commission to enquire into the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

9. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—It has been announced that a commission will be shortly appointed to investigate the land indebtedness question. Without mincing matters we must say that the people have grown sick of these itinerant and costly commissions, which bring no good in return, their bulky reports being generally allowed to rust among other Government records. If Government, however, are really anxious to appoint a commission, we hope its proceedings will, unlike those of the Star Chamber, be open and public, and that representatives of the people most directly concerned will be nominated on the commission, if its proceedings are to command any confidence of the public. It would be impossible to suggest the names of abler and more experienced representative men than Ráo Bahádur Mahádev Govind Ránade and the Honourable Mr. Javerilál, and any such commission, unless these gentlemen are associated with it, had better be not appointed at all. Why should not the Presidency Association move in the matter and ask Government to nominate on the commission two influential Natives well conversant with the condition of the peasantry and the results of the operation of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act? The Association has by this time grown sufficiently callous to rebuffs, and it should not be afraid of doing its duty, even though there be no certain prospect of success.

Poverty of the peasants in the Konkan, its causes and a suggestion to Government in the matter.

10. The Dnyánodayá (12), in its issue of the 19th November, writes:—We understand from good authority that in many parts of the Konkan only one-tenth of the land is in the hands of the peasants, the nine-tenths being in the hands of the Khots or Márwádis. The ignorant farmers have contracted debts, mortgaged their lands, and finally lost all right to them. This is a very sad state of affairs, for which it is hard to suggest any remedy. The people are their own worst enemies. They rush into debt as moths into the fire. Once in debt the money-lender has it all his own way, and the poor peasant pays for his folly by the loss of all. Nevertheless their very ignorance, and the ease with which they fall a prey to the money-lender, is a reason in itself why Government should step in and prevent by some means the greed of those who are reducing the people to such abject poverty. There are whole villages where not a rood of land is owned by the people. It is all in the hands of the money-lender, and the existence of the people is from hand to mouth.

A request to Government to prevent frequent accidental shooting of Natives by Europeans.

11. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—The Dumdum shooting case in Bengal seems to exercise the minds of the people there so much that there is every fear of its reopening the question of race differences. Whatever the side issues in the case, the accidental shooting is an evident indication of the fact that due precautions are not taken to prevent accidents. The practice of shooting is necessary to keep up military efficiency, but that is no sufficient reason for neglecting all necessary safeguards against accidents. From the facts that have appeared in the Patrika it is plain that the shooting range is near enough the village to endanger anybody's life, and that this circumstance should escape the attention of those who have the charge of the range is a matter of no little surprise. The increasing military murders, the inexcusably light punishments passed upon European offenders, and the supreme negligence of military authorities to improvise stringent rules for the guidance of shooting parties are more likely to strengthen the popular belief that in the estimation of the authorities the life of a European is of greater value than that of a Native. And to this growing belief the recent opinion of a Poona Magistrate in the Dehu fishing case, that the punishments meted out to Native offenders as against Europeans must be severe, must give a point. Indeed, for a Magistrate to promulgate this doctrine from the judgment seat is a fete that might favourably compare with that of a speaker who during the Ilbert Bill controversy urged his hearers to march upon the Government House because the Bill interfered with their birth-rights. Be that as it may, Government ought to lose no time in adopting measures to check the frequency of such fatal accidents. The situation on the north-west borders is sufficient to exercise the mind of Government, but surely the safety of a people has a greater claim upon its attention than even the frontiers. Will the Government of India and the Provincial Governments feel interested in a matter of such supreme importance?

Remarks on the administration of jails and a request to Government to make a change in the Penal Code.

12. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 16th November, while commenting upon the administration of the jail system in India, says:—It cannot be denied that there were jails in India formerly, but the jail system as prevalent then was very beneficial. The number of crimes was very insignificant as compared with the present one; very few criminals were sent to the jails, a large number of them being only fined. Taking into consideration the sums spent upon the maintenance of the jails in India, it is very plain that the health of the prisoners is not satisfactory at all. In this presidency at least it was so terribly bad that the Surgeon-General with the Government of Bombay was ordered to investigate the matter and to submit a report. In short, it is quite plain that the Government of India has burdened itself with much useless expenditure—useless because it does not serve its original purpose of lessening crime. If in future the punishments of fine and whipping be substituted for imprisonment, Government will not only save this useless expenditure, but there will be a palpable decrease in the number of crimes. This theory is supported by able men like Sir W. Wedderburn and was unanimously approved of by the International Congress at Christiania after a severe and lengthy debate.

Threatenings of famine in the Bombay Presidency.

13. The Vrittasár (79), in its issue of the 16th November, observes :—Here as in Madras we see around us signs of imminent famine, and people have been in anxiety as to the means of their livelihood. The first crops have already been destroyed and we cannot hope to have the second ones for want of rain. What makes the people tremble the more about their future is the daily increase in the export of wheat. Their Excellencies Lord Lansdowne and Lord Harris are leisurely enjoying their tours without seeming to care for the people. Is it not very strange that nothing should be done by the Government to avert the coming danger? Is their indifference owing to their being not aware of the grievances of the people, who are hovering about the authorities above them and dinning the grievances in their ears without any desired effect? Is it not a stain on the good British administration that the authorities should be so careless about the welfare of the people in their charge? The present crisis calls for immediate relief to the poor, and it is necessary that the Government should permit free grazing of cattle in forests, stop the export of corn and start relief works at once.

Remarks on the suggestion of the Military Sanitary Commission of England to Parliament to appoint a special commission to enquire into the causes of the high rate of infant mortality in India.

14. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 17th November, while writing about the death-rate of infants in India, says :—Though all the disadvantages under which births and deaths are registered in India be taken into consideration, the death-rate of infants will be found very alarming. This rate has increased so tremendously that the Military Sanitary Commission in England has thought it fit to draw the attention of Parliament to it and to recommend the appointment of a special commission to enquire into its causes. There are two principal causes of this enormous mortality of infants, and they are ignorance and poverty. It is well-known that the Government of India is not at all liberal in educating the masses, and their poverty is also a patent fact. The wives of the working men are obliged to work with their husbands for their bread soon after they are delivered, and are unable to nurse their children properly. In almost all cases these poor mothers, getting no sufficient food themselves, find it very difficult to give their infants their natural nourishment. This, of course, increases the death-rate of infants in this warm country. We hope that the report of the commission will enlist the sympathy of the noble-minded people of England and will induce them to improve the condition of the poverty-stricken masses of India.

Remarks on the alleged stringency of the forest regulations and a request to Government.

15. The Jagadidarsh (38), in its issue of the 15th November, while complaining about what it calls the harassing regulations of the Forest Department, says :—The Survey Department first turned many large pastures into arable land and the Forest Department, following in its wake, deprived the already complaining cultivators of their remaining pasture grounds. The cultivators, therefore, find it very difficult to pay the land revenue, for the animals on whom farming in this country chiefly depends are almost starved on account of the absence of fodder. The cattle commit now and then trespass on the reserved forests and their owners are obliged to free them from the cattle-pounds by paying fines. Moreover, the farmers are obliged to keep themselves in the good graces of the officers of the Forest Department, which is a question of money. Farmers are, therefore, the people who suffer most from the regulations of that department. No doubt there was a Forest Commission appointed, but it was a failure inasmuch as it did not remedy the grievances of the poor farmers. The conservation of forests is not bad in itself, but the interests of the people for whom forest conservancy is intended ought to be consulted. Some of the crimes now coming into the Courts of law to be tried have their origin in these stringent forest laws. We request Government to take pity on these poor people and to lessen their miseries.

Remarks on the speech of the Honourable Mr. Moore at the farewell entertainment given to him recently at Poona.

16. In alluding to the speech of the Honourable Mr. Moore at the farewell entertainment given to him recently at Poona, the Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 15th November, remarks :—The Honourable Mr. Moore has with perfect justice said that Natives lack manly independence and have yet to learn how to act without fear or favour. This is rendered manifest by the way in which local self-government is worked in this presidency. A majority of the municipal commissioners in the mofussil, instead of watching the interests of their constituents, generally try to curry favour with the District Collectors and other officials and thus render nugatory the franchise granted to them. Even Bombay is not an exception to this rule, and it is to be regretted that the European members, who ought always to be independent and to set a lesson to the Natives, should not be free from this defect. Thus the remark of the Honourable Mr. Moore does not apply to the Natives alone, but to Anglo-Indians as well, and if Collectors and other officers connected with municipalities were to change their present policy and act properly, the Natives, who are no doubt wanting in the quality of independence, and particularly the Hindus as is seen from the progress of social reform amongst them, would soon improve. But we cannot echo the advice the honourable gentleman gives to the effect that people ought not to show their independence towards Government, for, he says, that would be ingratitude and unmanliness. This would argue submission to all the measures of Government, which, indeed, is the view of the narrow-minded Anglo-Indians. It savours neither of ingratitude nor of unmanliness to make reasonable requests and complaints. If the Honourable Mr. Moore thinks that there ought to be no political associations and no political movement in this country he is mistaken, because the Natives are now far advanced to understand their duty in this matter.

Remarks in connection with the Rájábái Tower tragedy case.

17. The same newspaper exultingly refers to and quotes from an article recently published in the British Medical Journal, reviewing the evidence recorded in the case known as the Rájábái Tower case, including that of Dr. Smith, Coroner's Surgeon, and pronouncing this medical officer to have been wrong in discarding the theory of outrage and attributing the death of the two Párai ladies, the subject of the case in question, to accident or suicide, and concludes as follows :—But what is the moral of all this? We are reluctant to reawake the angry and bitter controversy of the last six months. We are reluctant to throw the blame of the gross miscarriage of justice from the beginning on any head. Nay, we will be charitable enough to assume that the law officers of the Crown erred, that the Judge erred, and that the Government too was misled. But what are we to say to the "more than an error of judgment" on the part of the Police Surgeon on whose insufficient and unreliable evidence the whole superstructure of the abortive criminal prosecution was raised? We are devoutly of hope that after the criticism to which we have above referred, neither the Government nor the Judge will be misguided any longer; that in bare justice to the bereaved family and the peaceful citizens whom they have grievously wronged, they will now freely and unreservedly acknowledge in public the error into which they were led. Nay, more, they will seriously consider whether it is advisable for the safety and the welfare of the community at large of this great city that the Coroner's Surgeon could be any longer allowed to fill the office that he occupies. It is clear that the popular verdict was after all right, and that it was not the people who lost their heads but those who gravely forgot the duties of their responsible office. After the authoritative judgment of the British Medical Journal, it is to be hoped the Government will be pleased to see the error into which they were led, and to do that reparation to the feelings of the family of the deceased which the circumstances require—the feelings which, it is needless to say, have been grievously hurt by the ill-advised and unfounded insinuations made in the last resolution of Government on this unhappy tragedy. The last word is not yet spoken on the subject. But we are quite convinced that when it is, the majesty and power of truth will have been once more vindicated. We therefore eagerly look forward to that happy day which will also be the day when the so-called "dark mystery" will be removed and the real cause of the foul murders revealed to the public gaze as irresistibly as the noon-day sun, and thenceforth Nemesis will, as the mighty avenger, dog the footsteps of the perpetrators of that atrocious crime.

A complaint filed by a certain Deputy Inspector of schools against the Superintendent of a Mission School at Nágpur and the conduct of the Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces, and the Deputy Commissioner, Jabalpur, in the matter.

18. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 14th November, writes:—A curious case is reported from Nágpur. A certain Deputy Inspector of schools brought a complaint against a missionary, resident of that station and the Superintendent of the Mission School. The charge was one of defamation and was instituted in the Court of the District Magistrate, Seoni, the complainant having first obtained the permission of the Inspector-General of Education to open prosecution. The ground of the complaint was that, during the course of the last middle class scholarship examination, held in the Victoria Library at Seoni, the missionary had grossly insulted the Deputy Inspector and had threatened to "kick him out." Previous to the institution of the case in the Magistrate's Court the missionary had been invited to offer an apology to the party he had so spitefully used, but instead of taking advantage of this offer, the missionary, it is stated, addressed a most offensive letter to the Deputy Inspector. The complainant forwarded this letter to his superior officer, the Inspector-General of Education; this officer decided that the missionary should be prosecuted. Accordingly legal advice was taken, the complaint was filed and the Deputy Commissioner issued the necessary summons against the accused. When the missionary appeared in Court the Deputy Commissioner is stated to have expressed his unwillingness to try the case and his intention to apply for order to have it transferred. This was not granted by the Commissioner, and to give the accused, at his request, the benefit of a European jury it was decided to transfer the case to the Court of the Deputy Commissioner, Jabalpur, and the complainant and his counsel were apprised of the fact. An application was then made to the Deputy Commissioner, Jabalpur, asking for information as to the date fixed for hearing, in order that the complainant might have time to instruct counsel at that station. After all the expense and annoyance this gentleman has been put to, he was peremptorily instructed to withdraw the complaint at once and was informed that this order emanated personally from the Chief Commissioner.

Remarks on the decision of Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, in the Poona Vaibhav defamation case.

19. The Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 17th November, observes:—After carefully going through the proceedings of the Poona Vaibhav defamation case, we think that Mr. Plunkett, City Magistrate, Poona, has not taken a correct view of it, and exhort our patriotic defenders of religion to assist the editor of the Vaibhav in filing an appeal against the decision of the Magistrate, who, although many men are opposed to the opinion, has held that the party at St. Mary's Convent was of a private nature. Mr. Plunkett is, no doubt, a very able and experienced officer, but it is usual in such cases for European officers to lean towards the reformers, and his remark, that the accused must suffer for his having refused to settle the case out of court when so advised, is sufficient to show his feelings in the case.

The Surat Local Show of Arts and Crafts and Mr. Lely, the Collector of Surat.

20. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—The Surat Local Show of Arts and Crafts that was opened this week by Mr. Lely is a striking proof of what a sympathetic and energetic Collector can do to improve the social relations between Hindus, Mahomedans and Englishmen by inducing them all to co-operate with himself in a useful work in a spirit of earnestness and harmony. Mr. Lely mentioned the names of several worthy gentlemen who have worked hard in the organization of the show; but it goes without saying that but for his sympathy and support there would have been no exhibition of any kind, and we commend his laudable example to the notice of officers in other districts. Surat has an historic fame for the excellence of its silks and carving, and the fact that nearly 7,316 exhibits of various degrees of skill and taste could be collected within a comparatively short time encourages a hope that despite the rapid decay of indigenous arts and industries that is being accelerated by the silent but sure industrial revolution which set in with the closer contact of the West with the East, much can still be done by organized efforts to preserve all that is good and excellent in the arts and crafts of this country. The show will itself be a valuable object-lesson to the artisan and industrial classes of the Surat and neighbouring districts, and it is to be hoped some special facilities will be provided to induce them to visit the show and inspect the exhibits. The exhibition conveys one important lesson among others, and that is that many exhibits which would have appeared to the best advantage are marred by the use of aniline dyes. It is to be regretted that the cheapness of German dyes and coal-tar colours has introduced them in large quantities in this country. But those who value native colours for their harmonious and admirable quality should be the first to discourage the use of the cheaper importations. We hope that this instructive fact, which the show has prominently brought to popular notice, will not be forgotten, and that Mr. Lely will some day be called upon to assist in the organization of not merely a local show but a provincial exhibition along with his zealous co-workers who contributed to the success of the interesting experiment tried at Surat.

Approval of the extension of service granted to Mr. Cooper, Chief Presidency Magistrate, Bombay.

21. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—We are extremely pleased to hear on very good authority that Mr. Cooper, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, has been allowed another extension of service for one year. This action of the Government is much to be commended. In fact, the longer Bombay is allowed to have the benefit of his magisterial experience of years, the greater the good to the public. Mr. Cooper is hale and hearty and capable of rendering good service for many a year to come. A frequent change in the Chief Magistracy is undesirable, especially when a Magistrate of the ability, knowledge, judicial calmness and popularity of Mr. Cooper is at the head. After the agitation regarding the new would-be incumbent six months ago, it is indeed some relief to hear that the city is assured of Mr. Cooper's distinguished service for another year. This is as it should be. We congratulate Mr. Cooper on his well-earned extension and we congratulate the Government on its wise step. Personally we would wish that he might still have the same useful and active career for some years. Bombay will keenly miss him when he no longer graces the Chief Magisterial chair. Meanwhile we wish Mr. Cooper further success in his already admirable and useful career as our popular and worthy Chief Magistrate.

Suggestion to Government for the improvement of the morale of the people of India.

22. The Indu Prakash (14), in its issue of the 16th November, makes a suggestion to Government to improve the morale of the people of India in the following words:—The Government, it seems, wants its subjects to be very religious and moral; but as religion and morals go hand in hand, and as the Government does not want to interfere in religious matters, it has found it very difficult to deal with morality alone. In dealing with the morals of the people the Government is following a very curious and faulty course. It has prohibited Government officers from taking part in the proceedings of the Indian National Congress on pain of incurring the displeasure of Government, but it has nowhere ruled that a public officer should be punished for openly leading an immoral life. If complaints are made against public officers for their immoral conduct in private, the answer invariably received is that Government have nothing to do with the private conduct of their officers as long as they perform their public duties honestly. But private conduct is very closely connected with conduct in public affairs. An officer who is not a virtuous man in private life cannot be a good public officer. Public officers set either a good or a bad example, according to their behaviour, to their inferiors and to the people at large. There is only one way of improving the morale of the people of India, and that is by an enactment laying severe restrictions on the private characters of public officers.

23. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—During the last week two police constables were severely beaten by certain ruffians in one of the remote streets of Náráyan Peth, Poona. The incident is to be regretted the more, because according to popular report the poor unfortunate victims had not even a stick by them to defend themselves with. The police strength of the city is very meagre and they have very heavy calls of duty upon them. Look to any corner of the department, the call for reform is very urgent. Crimes are on the increase, while police strength, police vigilance and police detective abilities are on the decrease. We do not know whom to hold responsible for this state of things. The incident has spread quite a scare and people are afraid to walk through the streets by night. If a police map of the city were drawn, it would show at a glance that a budmash can enter the city at one end and go out of it by another without a policeman to accost him. Had there been a sufficient number of policemen their distribution were easy, but no officer can create men to guard turnings. Government must give him the staff.

Necessity for increasing the strength of the police in Poona.

24. The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 17th November, observes that though, since the struggle which took place recently between some police constables and a party of thieves in Náráyan Peth at Poona, the local police have been supplied with swords, the numerous thefts by house-breaking and assaults, which have become, as it were, the order of the day at Poona, cannot be put a stop to, since the town is guarded but by an inadequate police force and exposed on the sides of Parvati, Ambil Odha and Bhámburda to unrestrained criminal incursions, and that the truth of the above statement will become evident to Government if they call for a return of thefts which have been committed for some time past and which have remained untraced without any fault on the part of the police. On account of this state of things a panic, says the paper, has been created at Poona and people living in solitary and out-of-the-way quarters are much alarmed and will have to take serious steps if the present state of insecurity continues unremedied.

Frequency of thefts at Poona and the consequent uneasiness of the residents.

Part II.—Legislation.

25. The Surya Prakash (92), in its issue of the 14th November, approves of the proposed Bill to prohibit the practice of inoculation and to make the vaccination of children in certain portions of the Bombay Presidency compulsory, says that it is well framed, and that if proper steps be taken to make its scope and object clearly known to the ignorant masses and such changes as are needed to meet their wants are made therein it will be a real boon. The paper suggests that the Bill should be translated into the different vernaculars of the presidency.

A Bill to make vaccination of children in certain portions of the Bombay Presidency compulsory, approved.

Part III.—Municipalities.

26. The Aftab Sind (158), in its issue of the 4th November, says:—The proposal to levy a house-tax has caused a great agitation in all large towns of the province of Sind. The inhabitants of these towns look upon this tax in the same light as a Russian invasion. They consider it a sudden calamity or a catastrophe from heaven. In our opinion they are right in their suppositions. There is no doubt that the people of Sind are in straitened circumstances. No sooner do they make an attempt to effect reforms or improvements than they are suddenly overburdened with one or other incumbrance. Some people, who by reason of holding appointments under Government or who being desirous of appearing as gentlemen in society have made an external display in the shape of elegant houses or dresses, are at once caught by the throat, and the result is that the poor are also subjected to the same hard treatment as the rich. Great credit is due to the municipal commissioners of Hyderabad, who have illustrated by example what their duties and rights are and who have shown that the honour of representing the interests of the people on the municipal board does not consist Disapproval of the proposal to levy a house-tax in all large towns in Sind, and approval of the conduct of the municipal commissioners at Hyderabad, Sind, in the matter.

in being designated Ráo Bahádur or Khán Sáheb or in sitting in chairs and saying 'yes' to every proposal that may be brought forward. Although their chairman was entirely against them in this matter, and was moreover a powerful officer of Government, they did not flinch from speaking the truth. They convened meetings of voters, asked their opinions and maintained their views. This is exactly the course to follow and these are the functions of municipal commissioners which they are in duty bound to discharge. We hope that they will adhere to their opinions and carry the point. We also hope that they will zealously stand by the side of the poor, because it is to them that they owe their honourable position of municipal commissioners. We trust that the rulers will take their cogent grounds into consideration and will not try to enforce the tax upon them.

Disapproval of the appointment of a European Government officer, Mr. Plunkett, as President of the Sholápur Municipality.

27. A correspondent of the Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 19th November, disapproves of the appointment of a European official in the person of Mr. Plunkett, Huzur Deputy Collector, as President of the Sholápur Municipality, and says that though he has nothing to say against Mr. Plunkett personally, the town should have had better treatment at the hands of the Collector and Government, as they could have found a non-official member of the municipality quite competent to hold the office of President and thereby practically recognised the right of the municipality to elect their own President conferred on them when they were invested with powers of local self-government. The correspondent advises the People's Association to take early steps to make a petition to Government in this matter.

Part IV.—Native States.

His Excellency Lord Lansdowne praised for restoring His Highness the Mahárája of Kashmere to power.

28. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 16th November, writes :—The expectation that His Excellency the Viceroy's visit to Kashmere would result in some happy turn of events for His Highness the Mahárája has been at least in part fulfilled. His Excellency's very first speech in Kashmere was marked by studious consideration and politeness, and his conduct throughout has been markedly deferential. There have been profuse professions of regard and attachment, and altogether the treatment has been remarkably kind and courteous. The finale of the whole thing has been happy too. There has not been, indeed, a complete reinstatement. The Council of Administration is to be maintained. The Mahárája, however, becomes its President. In the case of a difference between His Highness and the other members of the Council, the Resident's opinion is to prevail, and the Resident is, in fact, to be the general referee on all important matters. Thus the Mahárája, who has been only titular for the last two years, becomes a de facto ruler again, although not so absolute as before. The two years' tribulation which His Highness has passed through has produced, it would seem, a beneficial effect on his character. The Mahárája has voluntarily agreed to effect retrenchments in his personal expenditure, and has expressed appreciation of the reforms introduced by the Council during the inter-regnum. Let us hope the lessons of adversity and humiliation will be deep and lasting. It is impossible to praise too highly the generosity of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne in this matter. The abdication of the Mahárája, whether voluntary or not, had given rise to various suspicions and reports regarding the intentions of the Government towards Kashmere. Annexation was freely talked of. The various strategic and other advantages were believed to afford a tempting bait to the Government, and Kashmere, like Burma, was supposed to be doomed. The formation of the local Council of Administration dissipated those fears, and the restoration of the Mahárája to power last week gave conclusive proof that Lord Lansdowne's intervention in Kashmere had no selfish taint, that it was a benevolent interference actuated by a desire to rescue the country from misgovernment, and meant to be continued only so long as the interests of the country might require and no further. There were obviously no sinister objects entertained, and the entirely voluntary restoration at the present time puts the purity of the motives beyond a doubt. All honour, therefore, to Lord Lansdowne for the grace he has shown in the Kashmere case.

29. Referring to the arrangements lately made for the administration of Kashmere, the Shubh Suchak (68), in its issue of the 13th November, says:—The Mahárája, who was formerly independent and whose power was unbounded, has now to refer to the Resident for final decision, questions in which there is difference of opinion between him and his Council, and has to obtain previous sanction of the British Government in every important matter. This is not restoring him to power, but is slighting him in its name. It was better that he was without any power; for, we think, it was more honourable than his present position. This is how wisdom has to go to the wall before authority.

Remarks on the arrangements lately made for the administration of Kashmere.

30. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—The great Shiva of Simla has delivered himself from the cool and serene plateau of Srinagar. God-like has he unburthened himself on the sublunary affairs of the demi-god of Kashmere. The mundane population of India living in the plains has heaved a deep sigh of relief. They are comforted to know that the oracular pronouncement of that august and awe-inspiring deity was unaccompanied by thunderbolt and lightning. There was no explosion of the celestial wrath—none of the fire and fury which, like the dark shadows, presage portentous occurrences. No; the heaven of Srinagar presented a serene and sedate aspect. Smilingly and gently did the modern British Avatár of Creator and Destroyer assure his protége and his people that Kashmere was yet an entity. It was not despoiled. It was a mistake on the part of those who thought so. It may be that his ominous utterances of two years ago were a little equivocal. But oracles are nothing if not ambiguous. The ambiguity is now dispelled. Kashmere is still Indian and not British. On the manner in which the Mahárája may exercise the powers now vested in him will depend his complete restoration later on. This, in reality, is the sum and substance of the assurance given by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to the Mahárája. Opinions will differ on the importance to be attached to the Viceregal declaration. But it is, no doubt, a modification from the stern policy adopted two years ago. The assurance is the certain result of the adverse, but not unjust, criticism on the action of the Imperial Government in its relations with the affairs of Kashmere. The present pronouncement may be taken as the result of independent public agitation and a moral triumph of justice, which is as creditable to the British as it is satisfactory to the Ráj. The Viceregal declaration, however, is sufficiently hedged in. The Mahárája, if he is a wise man, will try to bear that in mind. He is no doubt made President of the Regency, but he is informed that no important step should be taken without first consulting the Resident. Viewed from all aspects, and from the experience of the past history and traditions of the Foreign Office, we are sceptic enough as to the Viceregal assurances. They may mean anything or nothing. The paramount power is the sole interpreter of its own treaties, rights and assurances. Let us hope, however, that our scepticism may prove unfounded and that in another two years or more the Mahárája may be fully restored to power. Our only faith is in the attitude which the present Resident may adopt towards the Mahárája. Colonel Prideaux is known to us to be an officer of the highest integrity and wise caution. He is a model of courtesy and possesses many virtues which make us admire the genuine Englishman. If he only take a leaf from the book of Sir Dennis Fitz-Patrick and interfere the least, allowing the Regency to work out its own reforms on the lines now chalked out for it, we are sure he will earn not only the praise of his Government but of the people of Kashmere also. It would be the only way to lead the Kashmere administration from good to better, and we devoutly trust it may be the good fortune of Colonel Prideaux to earn the praise which has been deservedly earned by the late Resident of Hyderabad.

31. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 15th November, writes:—Indeed, the prediction of the Calcutta Statesman in respect to the restoration of Mahárája Pratáp Sing that the "State will be virtually ruled for, if not by, the British Government" has been literally fulfilled, and it will not elevate the so-called strong British sense of justice in the estimation of Native Chiefs. Under the new arrangement the Mahárája is to be only the President of the Council, the British Resident being the final referee in matters of difference between the members of the Council. Thus for all practical purposes the Mahárája is no better than a member of the Council who has no independent powers of action. Can it be called restoration, then? we ask. In view of Russian neighbourhood the strict supervision, nay, even the protection of our borders, may be absolutely necessary, but that is already achieved by the fortification of Gilgit and of other places that guard every entrance to Kashmere. All the Kashmere frontiers being thus in the hands of the British Government, to degrade the Mahárája from the position of an independent prince to that of a British executive is a piece of policy that will not secure for Government the thanks either of the people of India or of the Native States. We expected quite a different treatment in this matter from Lord Lansdowne, but the present arrangement may be allowed a trial. If it be intended only as a step towards a complete restoration of the powers at no distant date, all right and good. The foolish question of a re-purchase of Kashmere apart, the guarantees given to Native States in Her Majesty's Proclamation of 1858 ought not to be lightly treated. These guarantees form the fundamental basis of British Government in India and ought to be respected by all.

32. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 15th November, observes:—The dethronement of the unfortunate Mahárája Pratáp Sing of Kashmere about two years and a half ago caused much irritation of feeling and excited much sympathy even in England, because he was unjustly treated in that affair. It seems that the main object of Government in dethroning him was to strengthen the frontiers on that side at the expense of the State, and now that this object has been fulfilled and that perhaps pressure has been put on him from England, His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has only partially wiped off the stigma attaching to his administration in respect of Kashmere affairs in restoring him to some of his powers. [The Svadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 18th November, expresses similar sentiments and adds that the partial restoration of the Mahárája is nothing when compared to the injustice done to him, but Lord Lansdowne deserves thanks even for this small act of kindness, because the charges laid against the Mahárája were so serious that he would perhaps have met with the fate of the late Mahárája of Manipur or the late Gáikwád of Baroda at the hands of another Governor-General. Writing on the same subject, the Gujarát Mitrá (86), in its issue of the 15th November, praises His Excellency the Viceroy on the principle that something is better than nothing, says that this step has been taken for the purpose of restoring the confidence amongst the people, who, since the annexation of Burma, have been suspicious about the policy of Government, and fears that Russia will perhaps take the same view.].

Disapproval of the proposed expenditure of one lakh of rupees by His Highness the Mahárája Holkar on the reception of His Excellency the Viceroy.

33. The Nagar Samáchár (53), in its issue of the 14th November, disapproves of the proposed expenditure of one lakh of rupees by His Highness the Mahárája Holkar on the reception of His Excellency the Viceroy at the time of his approaching visit, regrets that there should be no one to advise His Highness to spend the amount in advancing money without interest to people who are desirous of starting new industries in this country but cannot do so for want of funds, and says that it does not understand how the British Government has allowed His Highness to spend such a large sum on the reception.

Conduct of Major Vincent, Administrator of the Rampur State, during the recent disturbance in the Rampur jail and a suggestion to Government in the matter.

34. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 19th November, writes:—The Advocate of Lucknow is disposed to be very severe to Major Vincent, Administrator of the Rampur State in Rohilkhand. The recent outbreak in the Rampur jail was, it is reported, caused by the religious prejudices of the Mahomedan prisoners being insulted. Contrary to the custom of this Mahomedan State, the prisoners were ordered to wear jail dress and allow their beards to be shaved. They formed a conspiracy and attacked the house of the Major, depriving his orderlies of their knives and swords. The Major was within an inch of losing his life if a nobleman had not promised freedom from molestation to the prisoners on condition that they gave away their knives and swords. But the word was not kept. Five of them were shot down without any trial whatsoever. Their corpses were buried in a common ditch although their relatives wished to get possession of them. The bodies had previously been dragged through the jail compound. Does not this brutality overtop the cruelties of Shámráo Laud at Cambay? If what the Advocate says be correct, has not the British officer shamed his Government by such atrocities? If the fault is of the Major and of no other, will not Sir Auckland Colvin recall him? No, to maintain the prestige of the British Government in the Rohilla State the Major will be supported through thick and thin and all his deeds so coloured that they will look justifiable. Prestige! that terrific child of brute force! When will it be in conformity with reason?

Approval of the appointment of Colonel Mackenzie as Commissioner of Berár.

The Vaidarbh (2), in its issue of the 14th November, writes :—The appointment of Colonel Mackenzie as Commissioner of Berár must give universal satisfaction. Colonel Mackenzie was regarded not only in Berár, but by the Government of India, as one of the most capable district officers. He brought not mere intelligence and energy to his work, but always felt and exhibited an amount of interest in the people in his charge and sympathy for them, which quite won their hearts. The work of the Judicial Commissioner could not be quite to the taste of one so disposed. Judicial etiquette would hardly admit of his allowing many people to see him, enquiring into their private affairs and trying to settle their disputes amicably. It also confined him to the crowded court-room, the desk and the study. The Commissioner's work he will find more congenial. Being the oldest officer in the province his opinions carry great weight. It is the general hope that with the sympathetic qualities which he possesses, Colonel Mackenzie will render his administration of the province not only successful, but productive of lasting benefit to the people.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ as u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Akbar, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ā.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Abolition of Provincial Governments and direct government by the Viceroy over all India recommended.

1. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 25th November, in recommending that all Provincial Governments should be done away with and that the whole of India should be governed by the Viceroy direct, writes:—When local Governors, Commanders-in-Chief, and Councils were first appointed all over India, the provinces were far apart from the real governing centre. Local satraps had power and exercised it, and sometimes began wars and conducted military operations. Those times have passed away, distance has been immensely reduced and the reins of the Indian Government can now as well be held in the hands of the Viceroy as the reins of the British Government are held by Lord Salisbury. All the personal arguments that were previously used in favour of splitting up India into numerous satrapies turn pale before the one argument of complete unity we have now advanced. To attain this national aim no financial arguments, no race, religious or language arguments, should be allowed to sway the decision to make unity the basis of our future policy. Three kinds of bank notes, five or ten law codes, and fifteen kinds of government cannot be good for one nation, the subjects of one Queen. If we could fight their separate wars under three separate Governments and make three kinds of treaties, we might ask for three or more Governments. But we cannot disunite in this manner. Therefore the Government, and the whole Government, must be one. We say again, the numerous petty Governments in India were established in a by-gone age, and suited that backward age in a kind of way. They are wholly unsuited for the India of to-day. By splitting up the Government into small-sized lucifer matches we lose the strength which unity and amalgamation would give, and we waste in small details of government large and solid pecuniary benefits.

Remarks on the rumoured intention of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to resign.

2. The Bombay Samáchár (97), in its issue of the 24th November, while discussing the probability of His Excellency the Viceroy resigning office in the near future, says:—The resignation of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne depends wholly on the issue of the forthcoming general elections in England. His Excellency will surely resign if there is a probability of the success of the Liberals. His Excellency formerly belonged to the Gladstonian Liberal party. A few members of this party have joined the Conservatives and are known by the name of Unionists, to which party Lord Salisbury belongs. The resignation of Lord Lansdowne before the general elections will be ever gratefully remembered by the Anglo-Indians here, as it will enable Lord Salisbury to appoint a new Conservative Viceroy over India. It is reported that Lord Stanley, the Governor of Canada, is also to resign about this time. This additional patronage will make the party of Lord Salisbury stronger than ever, and the Premier will gratefully remember this condescension on the part of his noble adherents.

Approval of the appointment of the Honourable G. N. Curzon as Under Secretary of State for India.

3. The Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—The Honourable G. N. Curzon, member for Southport, succeeds Sir John Gorst as Under Secretary of State for India. Our old friend, Mr. J. M. Maclean, was in the running for the post. He is just the man who would have suited the India Office with his prejudices against the natives of India and his devotion to Anglo-Indian interests. Mr. Maclean came out to Bombay originally as an adventurer in the field of journalism, and having retired from this city with a fortune he has been enabled by his ability and pluck to fight his way up to Parliament. He now wishes to soar higher. His "many friends in India" may regret his failure, but his appointment would have given no satisfaction to the natives of India who are most concerned in it. If the choice lay between Mr. Curzon and Mr. Maclean, Mr. Curzon would be preferred. If the young politician's performance proves equal to his promise, there will be no reason to be dissatisfied with him. He has travelled through India and has written a sober and reliable book on the Central Asian question. He has also made himself a sort of authority on the affairs of Persia in their relation to England and Russia. On imperial questions, such as the defence of India and the advance of Russia, his opinion and advice will, we believe, be found useful by Government. He has proved himself capable of taking a clear and intelligent grasp of political problems of great pith and moment, and he may now usefully apply his mind to the problems of Indian home politics. If he can take of them the sober and judicial view which characterizes his writings relating to Persia and Central Asia, this country will have no reason to be sorry for the appointment.

4. The Jagadhitechchhu (39), in its issue of the 21st November, says that it is exceedingly glad to hear that Mr. Curzon, and not Mr. Maclean, has been appointed Under Secretary of State for India, that India would have had to suffer very much in case Mr. Maclean had been appointed to that post, and that it need not say anything more about Mr. Maclean as the tone of his articles on Indian matters when he was the editor of the Bombay Gazette must be within the memory of many of the readers of that paper. Mr. Curzon, adds the paper, is young and very clever, and considering his youth he has rendered very valuable services to the State and written important letters to the London Times about Russian policy in Central Asia, and therefore it cannot too highly compliment such a man on his appointment as Under Secretary of State for India.

5. The Gujarâti (85), in its issue of the 22nd November, observes:—It is some satisfaction to know that the appointment of the Under Secretary for India has been conferred upon the Honourable Mr. Curzon and not upon Mr. Maclean, who is an avowed enemy of the Natives. The Honourable Mr. Curzon has not given any proof of his feelings towards the Natives, and if in his new office he does some good to this country, we shall be but too glad to give him his due measure of praise. [The Svadesh Bandhu (130), in its issue of the 25th November, expresses similar sentiments.]

6. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—

Disapproval of the appointment of Mr. Curzon as Under Secretary of State for India.

India has no reason to congratulate herself on the nomination of Mr. Curzon as Under Secretary of State in the place of Sir John Gorst, relegated to the treasury. The honourable aristocrat of thirty-two is, no doubt, a clever Oxford man. That is not much of a recommendation for an under-ministerial post in these days. For that matter His Lordship of Hatfield might have had scores of young Oxons or Cantabrians, as clever, or even more clever, than the gentleman on whom Dame Fortune has thus smiled. But, they say, Mr. Curzon is, besides, a much travelled man: in short, that he is one of our "globe-trotters." Now, globe-trotters, especially those who have done their trotting in India in three months or six weeks, are the positive bete noir of Anglo-India. From Messrs. Schwann and Caine downwards they are looked down with a sneer and a scoff. But Anglo-India, so far as we have noticed it, has not on this occasion uttered a word in disparagement of this special qualification. We infer from this that, so long as globe-trotters belong to the tribe of the terrible Tories and the fire-eating Jingoes, there is nothing special to raise objection against. It is only when the traveller is known to belong to the opposite party in politics that globe-trotting in India is considered a positive disqualification for the office! It is the Radical Paget of the imaginative Mr. Kipling who is the red rag to the bull of the Tory Anglo-Indian. It is he who becomes the target for the paper pellets of the free-shooters of vociferous public organs. In short, Anglo-India will tolerate the veriest mediocrity whom the Prime Minister may appoint, provided he belongs to the ancient order of the chaotic Tories or the modern order of the Primrose Dames. The nomination of Mr. Curzon has been received by the Anglo-Indians with a distinct approbation, though here and there we notice a mild growl at the rejection of the cut and thrust member for Oldham. In fact, in certain quarters it has been received with cheers. The cheers are not unintelligible. For, is not Mr. Curzon the writer of a book on Central Asian politics? Has he not twice travelled in India? Did not he cross the Bolan and stand on the heights of the Khojak, espying the city of Kandahar in the near distance? Did not he also peep into the Khyber? Has not he travelled from Tiflis and Tehran to Merv and Bokhara? And do not the Government of India, that is to say, Sir Frederick Roberts and Sir Mortimer Durand, require at this juncture, when the "filibustering" Russians are creating such a confusion in the regions of the Pamir, an Under Secretary who understands the geography and politics of Central Asia? Why, he is just the man for the place. It is no providing of a brainless Dowb or a bottomless nephew from the revenues of India. Rather it is one of those rare instances of the sagacity of the Premier to put the square man in the square hole! So the Simla pyrotechnists and their confrères at Westminster must sing "amen," and hail the Honourable George Curzon, member for Southport and Under Secretary of State for India! So far as to the opinion of Anglo-India. But what about India—the India of the teeming millions—the India which has been made to pay during the last five years an income-tax of 4½ per cent. on salt—the India which since the days of the Penjdeh scare and Upper Burmah annexation has been mulcted to the tune of 45 krors of rupees under the pretext of righting the "scientific frontier" so-called against external aggression? We may say at once that this oppressed India is entirely disappointed with the nomination; for, it can bode no good to her. On the contrary, it is the signal of worse and more portentous events to follow which shall engulf her in greater financial difficulties. It means a reign of greater military activity at both ends—at Westminster and Simla. It means that the foreign policy of the Government of India will henceforth be under the complete thumb of Lord Salisbury. Mr. Curzon, who lacks official experience, must in the very nature of things be a plastic tool in the hands of the Prime Minister. In the case of Sir John Gorst there was at least this safety that his masterful will and intrepid spirit would not permit even the imperious will of the great Salisbury to overawe him and directly interfere in the affairs of India. He was a most useful buffer in that sense. That buffer has been removed, and so far the appointment of Sir John Gorst to the treasury is a distinct loss to this country. India may depend on it that in the military policy of the empire she will now be solely governed by the Simla hierarchy. Mr. Curzon's book on our frontier question and on the question of external defences is simply a paraphrase of Sir Frederick Roberts' minutes and despatches since 1885-86, Sir Charles Dilke was his second edition, and Mr. Curzon is the third replica of the same. But the difference between the experienced, sagacious and broad-minded Sir Charles and the neophyte whom the Premier has just taken under his special wing is great. The imperialistic tendencies of the former have no sympathy for us. But despite the fact there could be no question that India would sooner trust to him than to Mr. Curzon. It is sad to reflect that she will now be ground down in the matter of military expenditure between the upper and nether stones of the two Foreign Offices situated at the ends of the two continents. The rupee has again dwindled down to 1*s.* 4 1/16*d.* So that there is certain to be a larger expenditure on the sterling payments than budgetted for during the current financial year. Whether the democrats will win the elections and carry their supreme will in the new House of Representatives is yet a question. The ups and downs of silver cannot be forecast even for forty-eight hours. But while silver is again thus hanging in the balance, and while the Pamir question remains unsettled, with the cost of the new military railways that are to be taken immediately in hand staring us in the face, it is hopeless to expect that the coming budget will be a satisfactory financial statement, even if railway receipts and ordinary heads of revenue show between them an increase of three krors. With the appointment of Mr. Curzon at this juncture, the coming Indian financial outlook must certainly be predicted to be depressing.

7. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 22nd November, has the following comments on the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Curzon to the Under Secretaryship for India :—Although Mr. Maclean was one of the candidates for this place the Honourable Mr. Curzon has been given preference. The qualifications which have decided Government to choose Mr. Curzon are worthy of attention. The honourable gentleman has visited India once and has expressed his thoughts on Indian matters more than once. If such qualifications make a man fit to be Under Secretary of State for India, very low must be the place which Indian politics occupy in the minds of the English people.—The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 22nd November, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that the new Under Secretary of State for India has a very limited knowledge of Indian affairs and does not excel Mr. Maclean of newspaper celebrity at all in this respect. The latter, though an acknowledged enemy of the advancement of India, has spent several years in this country and possesses much useful information on Indian questions, and would have made a better Under Secretary of State for India. The Honourable Mr. Curzon is famous for his numerous contributions to newspapers and is reported to be a good speaker. Besides these qualifications he was for some time Private Secretary to Lord Salisbury. Perhaps, this last qualification must have weighed much in giving the honourable gentleman preference over Mr. Maclean.

Remarks as to the probable successor to the Commander-in-Chief for India.

8. The Gujarát Mitrá (86), in its issue of the 22nd November, observes :—His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught was thought by some as likely to be the next Commander-in-Chief for India, and this appointment would surely have been very gratifying, because much good would be done by the stay of one of the sons of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress in India, as he would be able to see for himself the treatment given to the Natives by the Anglo-Indians, who, awed by his presence, would probably behave themselves better, and his evidence would be more fruitful of good results than any number of memorials or public demonstrations. But this appointment is not likely to take place owing to the impending danger from Russia, and the name of Sir George White is mentioned in connection with the would-be vacancy. The appointment of Sir George is very rightly objected to, not only by some people in England, but also by His Excellency the Viceroy, on account of his want of experience of this country, and we hope that Her Majesty will, in the interests of India, appoint some able military officer of Indian experience who may be proposed by the Viceroy.

Approval of the appointment of the Honourable Mr. S. Subramania Iyer as an Acting Judge of the Madras High Court and remarks in connection with it.

9. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes :—We congratulate the Honourable Mr. S. Subramania Iyer on his elevation to the bench of the Madras High Court. Mr. Iyer is too well known to require any introduction, and being a man of the people we sincerely thank the Government of Lord Wenlock for their happy choice. In one sense the appointment of Mr. Iyer is no gain to the cause of general activity, first, because he succeeds an Indian, and, secondly, because Mr. Iyer's elevation involves a loss of one of the public working men. Mr. Iyer's appointment, coming so close upon a similar appointment in our own province, suggests a very important question, to which we shall soon have to pay early attention. It may be stated as follows: When educated gentlemen, who by their devotion to public affairs have come to occupy important positions in the public, are taken up into the service, how are the vacancies so created to be filled up? If popular leaders can be induced to barter freedom for complete dependence for purely personal gains, our movements may very soon be endangered. Of course, we know we have not the means wherewith we can compel our own people to adhere to the principle of self-sacrifice if the gentlemen themselves have no sufficient respect for that principle. But we certainly can exercise sufficient discretion in the beginning and so prevent such occurrences in future. The Honourable Mr. Iyer was to be elected President of the Nagpur Congress, but his present elevation would preclude him from joining us. If we remember correctly, Mr. Iyer was once prevented from attending a Congress sitting because he then expected to get the Government Prosecutorship. We are extremely sorry to make this reference, and had it not been for our desire to see public interests well guarded, represented and cared for we should not have alluded to it just now. It is our misfortune that service absorbs our best intelligence and leaves few able advocates for the public cause. But because we do suffer from that misfortune we cannot allow it to grow. One by one our enthusiastic leaders are leaving us and we therefore ought to be wise in time. A few months ago the Amrit Bazar Patrika exposed the fact that organs of public opinion were being bought over by Government, and it now strikes us that this process may be extended and we therefore think that means must be found out by which we can place our useful men above temptation by giving them both money and honour. We need not say that any solution of the difficulty will be most welcome everywhere.

10. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 22nd November, while writing on the same appointment, says:—In making the selection of Diwán Bahádur S. Subramania Iyer, C.I.E., to a seat on the High Court Bench, the Madras Government has shown great skill, for by doing so it has obliged the Indian National Congress to seek out a new President at the eleventh hour. A thing exactly like this happened at the time of the meeting of the Congress in 1889. When gentlemen who could be of great use to their country by remaining independent accept Government service, it will not be far from correct to suppose that the advancement of this country is still a thing of the future, and that there is no unselfish love born for their country in the minds of the people of India as yet.

Remarks on the speech made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne at Gwalior.

11. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 22nd November, observes:—There was very little worth noticing in the several speeches made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne during his recent tour, but the praises bestowed on the Council of the Gwalior State for investing a portion of the surplus moneys in Government securities and the counsel given to the other Native States to follow suit cannot be passed without comment. The advice is selfish and betrays want of discretion on the part of the highest representative of the Queen-Empress in India. On the contrary, one would expect such a functionary to advise the Native Chiefs to use their surplus cash in promoting the cause of education in their States, in constructing public works of utility such as railways, irrigation works, &c., and opening banks for the relief of the agriculturists and advancing them sums at nominal interest instead of hoarding it up in an unproductive way. If the Chiefs, after utilising their money in the manner aforesaid, have still more cash in hand, they ought not certainly to invest it in Government paper, but lay it by, ready for emergencies and contingent expenses. It is commonly said that Government put pressure on Native Chiefs to make them invest their money in Government securities against their will, and if so, very strong protests should be made against it from all sides. [The Svadesh Bandhu (130) of the 25th November expresses similar sentiments.]

12. In alluding probably to the same subject, the Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 24th November, says that from the advice given by His Excellency the Viceroy to Native Chiefs to invest their surplus capital in Government paper, people are not to suppose that Government are afraid of Native Chiefs if the surplus remain in their hands, but it is only for the welfare of the Chiefs and their subjects to make it productive of interest as the rulers do not know how to spend their money on proper objects such as education and arts, and adds that if the Chiefs themselves are dependent on the British rule there is no necessity for their having money with themselves.

Remarks in connection with the limit to which the tours of the Governors of Bombay are generally extended.

13. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—The annual cold weather tours of the heads of Government through the districts are, no doubt, excellent things of their kind, inasmuch as they afford opportunities of personal inspection of the people, listening to their grievances and gratify the people themselves with the attention they receive at the hands of their rulers. There is, however, a tendency for these tours to limit themselves to particular districts to the disappointment of the others; and if business and sport are always equally kept in view they must more or less continue to do so. Thus it happens that, except in times of famine or other dire distress, some parts of the country rarely come in for a turn of the gubernatorial visit. On this side, Gujarát, Káthiáwár, Sind as well as the Southern Maratha Country are sure of a gubernatorial visit once in a lustrum at least. But a district like Ratnágiri, for instance, can hardly reckon on one for a certainty. Such omission is hardly ever intentional, But for all that, it is a subject for legitimate complaint. All parts of the gubernatorial charge have equal claims on the attention of the Governor for the time being, and the usefulness of these annual tours is curtailed if they do not include them all in their programme.

Remarks on the speeches made by His Excellency Lord Harris during his recent tour in Sind.

14. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—We congratulate the people of Sind on their having succeeded in drawing out the Governor to speak on a few very important subjects touching the administration. His Excellency gave the public to understand what steps Government had taken and intended to take to meet the wishes of the province with regard to the working of the several departments under it; and should His Excellency Lord Harris be able to carry through the several schemes he refers to as engaging the attention of his Government, he will have done substantial work. The success of a five years' régime of a Governor depends upon three essential conditions. He must feel, he must speak, and he must act. So far as action is concerned, a Governor is not a master of himself. Several circumstances come in to hasten on or to retard progress and the people are quite prepared to make due allowance for such circumstances. Feeling and expression, however, are matters over which every member of Government has complete control, and it is more from these than from action that the public forms its opinion about the administration of a Governor. Lord Harris has been amongst us for nearly half the tenure of his office, and we must confess that he has not secured much popular sympathy with his feelings or their expression. It must, however, be said to His Excellency's credit that he has done nothing by which he has alienated any sympathies. Judging from his utterances during his prolonged tour this season, it appears quite possible that he will be able to win people's affections. Sir James Fergusson was generous and courteous, his successor Lord Reay was sympathetic in addition to being generous and courteous, and His Excellency Lord Harris is more straightforward and outspoken. If it turns out in the end that he combines sympathy with our aspirations we shall not have much reason to be sorry for having to pass five years under him. During the last two years, we are constrained to say, little respect has been shown to public opinion, less confidence has been placed in its genuineness and no encouragement has been given either to its growth or even to its focussing, so that, we fear, if His Excellency is not pleased to modify his policy the net result of his five years' rule will be almost nothing. The latest instance we can cite of this disregard and discouragement of public opinion is that of police reform. In replying to the address of the Sind Sabha His Excellency told his auditors that his Government had the subject of police reform under their consideration, and that proposals regarding the bettering of pay, the reorganisation and the re-distribution of the force had already been submitted to the Government of India. This is all right so far as it goes, and we are all thankful for what has been done. But we are sorry that much good work has been left out, and it is mostly that which the people have been asking Government to do. We fear the opening of the upper branches of the service to Natives, the abolition of police probationerships, the elevation of Inspectors to the graded posts of Superintendents and the division of the department into protective and detective branches have not found their place in the scheme. We shall be very glad to learn that our fears are ill-grounded, but we have little hope of receiving such assurance. His Lordship, in his usual open manner of addressing, would have said so if these or any of these had found a place in the scheme. The Government of Bengal appointed a commission to ascertain public wishes and everybody expected that a similar enquiry would be instituted here. But nothing like it was done and nothing like it will probably be done. In replying to the address of the Mahomedan Association, His Lordship referred to commissions of enquiry. His Lordship said: "There are people who are inclined to think that a commission is a panacea for every grievance; but I think if you were to study the results of commissions, you would find that, as a rule, the outcome is disproportionate to expectations. Undoubtedly, a vast amount of interesting tradition is unearthed and placed on record, but the practical results of a commission are, as a rule, incommensurate with the labours which they entail." There are many who would feel disposed to subscribe to the outspoken views of His Excellency, but we must say that, from the point of view of the ruled, enquiry by a commission is nevertheless important. In the first place, it gives recognition to the fact of the existence of public opinion; then it encourages a study of important public questions; and lastly, if the commission is a mixed commission, as generally every commission is, it affords an opportunity to Government to associate some of our choicest men with equally good men in the service, and thus helps the people to understand the motives and actions of Government. Government cannot, and generally do not, dispose of schemes of administrative reforms without consulting its officers. They advise Government, and the latter act upon this advice, so that schemes formulated upon such advice are naturally based upon one-sided information only. His Excellency's disinclination to make open enquiries by commissions is therefore likely to be construed into approval of the system of government by officials only—a system that can never be condemned too much. It is the subsequent indifference of Government that reduces the value of the labours of commissions, and if this defect is avoided there is, we believe, nothing to be said against them. In another part of the same reply His Excellency refers to the transformation which Indian society is undergoing on account of the effects of British rule. His Excellency refers to the class of Zamindárs only. But what applies to them applies to all classes. One far-reaching effect of British rule in India has been the tearing asunder of the compact, well-organized and regulated fabric of Indian society, and the gradual substitution in its place of a society that is growing at random—a society without historical traditions, without any bonds of nationality, and, above all, without any elements in it that bring stability to or vitality in the nation. The process might be going on in all parts of the world, and with very good results also. But in this country the results of this slow process of transformation have been dangerous in the extreme—dangerous both to Government and to the well-being of the nation. Those who seek protection against this transformation demand that the officers responsible for the administration of the country should perform their duty, viz., that of increasing the chances of making British rule in India permanent. The reply of His Excellency that they must put up with what they find is, therefore, equivalent to saying that they must not protest against suicide, nor against the dangers to British rule. Evidently His Excellency has not yet studied the problem of social transformation in India. Should he do so, he will surely lend a helping hand to the Zamindárs.

15. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—At Hyderabad His Excellency the Governor advised the municipality to supplement their income by a house-tax rather than by octroi duties. The Governor is anxious to have the house-tax in preference to octroi duties, because the burden of taxation should be taken as much as possible from the shoulders of the poor and laid upon the shoulders of those who can afford to bear it. Here there is a clear begging of the question. The Government assumes that the greater and the costlier the house, the greater the means of its occupant. Nothing can be more fallacious than this. The descendant of a rich family, now reduced to poverty, lives in his ancestral mansion which he has not sold off, and a rich merchant, returned loaded with wealth from abroad, occupies a very humble dwelling. The scale of taxation according to the classification of houses is very illogical in this case. There are diverse races inhabiting every town. There are the biggest of buildings in the narrowest lanes, while on high roads there are only small shops and houses. The municipal advantages enjoyed by them are very disproportionate. Those gentlemen who are on the schedules committee of the Surat Municipality should take all the local conditions into consideration and then broach any scheme they wish to propound. A house-tax on the value of the materials used in a house cannot be surpassed in absurdity by any tax whatsoever.

16. A correspondent, writing to the Phœnix (6) in its issue of the 18th November, says:—We often do things that appear to us very clever, but the public looks upon them entirely from a different point of view. The Darbár recently held at Hyderabad by His Excellency the Governor while on a visit to that place seems to have given much vexation and trouble both to those who arranged it and those who were invited to it. The questions of rank and precedence are nice, and, no doubt, oftentimes difficult to deal with; but any man with an ordinary amount of tact can settle them to the satisfaction of all concerned. The Collector and the Daftardár had to make all the arrangements of this Darbár, and both of these officers seem to have displayed little tact in settling the questions of rank and precedence. To begin with, their Highnesses the Amirs of Hyderabad have much to complain of on this score. In the Darbár held by Sir Charles Pritchard (then Mr.), the late Commissioner in Sind, some mistake had been made in the providing of seats for their Highnesses. This mistake was brought to the notice of Colonel Trevor, who wrote back to say that it was unintentional and that in future care would be taken to avoid all such mistakes. This letter of Colonel Trevor was sent to Mr. Woodburn by way of a reminder in order to prevent the repetition of mistakes, but Mr. Woodburn, instead of attending to it, forwarded it to the Commissioner in Sind. Mr. James, however, lost his temper over it and replied that he understood that the Mirs intended to absent themselves from the Darbár and thereby slight His Excellency, and that he would take care to give them such seats in the Darbár as their conduct deserved. Imagine the folly of this reply! The Mirs, of course, had to submit to this indignity, but I am sure no member of the public would give credit to Mr. James for such impetuous thoughtlessness. The Zamindárs and the Jághirdárs also complained of the precedence which men of inferior rank got over them. The municipal commissioners, whom it has always been customary to seat on the right side of the Governor, were on this occasion seated in one of the far-end corners of the hall. But the crowning piece of what, for want of a better term, may be called want of judgment has yet to be recorded. All those who were invited to the Darbár did not attend; some of necessity remained absent, and the absentees have been called upon by the Collector and the Daftardár to show cause why they should not be deprived of their kursis for having failed to attend the Darbár to which they were invited. Is there any sense in this action? Is there a general intention to heap indignities upon whomsoever you can lay your hands on? If not, what is the meaning of this rigmarole? It is absurd to suppose that any one could have wilfully absented himself. Some may have been unavoidably absent from the town; some may be old, infirm, or too ill to stir out; and yet it is to be taken for granted that their absence was wilful and that it was intended as a slight to His Excellency! I should, on the contrary, suppose that those who attended the Darbár did honour to themselves and those who remained away did not share in that honour. His Excellency did not care two pence who attended the Darbár and who did not, and it is supremely ridiculous to take notice of any person's absence. No one will wonder if any one of the persons called upon to show cause replies that he has plenty of kursis of his own and does not care a fig for the Collector's kursi. Mr. Woodburn is a new man, no doubt; but the Daftardár, who is his right hand, should have more sense about him than he seems to possess. It is his duty to give the best possible advice to the Collector, because consideration and kindness should be a motto of all ruling authorities.

17. Writing on the same subject, the Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 21st November, says:—Ceremonial gatherings bring together a number of lay figures for introduction to a big personage, who takes in them just as much or just as little interest as he would in any other pack of an equal number of dummies. Some people highly prize the privilege of appearing as such figure-heads, and we wish them joy. But it cannot be lost sight of that these gatherings are a perfect nuisance to those who have to arrange them, and to the noble personages who have to accept and acknowledge the introductions. It is coming now to be generally recognised that the bickerings and heart-burnings which these occasions leave behind them are not worth the little good expected of them. But for that very reason it is incumbent on the officials in charge of the ceremony to omit no detail which could add to the general satisfaction. Universal satisfaction it passes the wit of human agents to devise, and the jealousies about precedence cannot always be allayed. But in arranging precedence, precedents are always helpful. No one, for instance, would have complained if Mr. Woodburn had used a little common sense, and elected to allot to the Mirs the seats to the right hand of the Governor because his predecessor had deliberately done so. But Mr. Woodburn has chosen to be original. He has wantonly inflicted an unmerited indignity on chiefs whose interest and intention alike are to testify their loyalty to the suzerain Queen. He has inconsiderately acted as the Mehmands acted on the occasion of the Jubilee. That contretemps happily ended only with the indignant withdrawal of His Highness the Holkar from the Jubilee festivities and an original suggestion from our irate contemporary that he should be birched for his pains; and probably the Mirs will meekly submit to the affront without a remonstrance. They who once ruled the land are now helpless. Their power for good is gone; it is not equally clear that their power for mischief is destroyed. Sind is a frontier province. It is too early yet to forget the panic of an inroad from the Pathans of Las Beyla after the disaster of Maiwand, and Maiwands in the future are by no means so unlikely, considering the lively interchange of international courtesies now proceeding between England and Russia. Even down-trodden worms in the dust can sting; and England's difficulties will be the opportunities of those whom her unbending haughtiness has, in mere wantonness of exuberant strength, insulted. God grant poor India uninterrupted peace for at least half a century! She needs it very badly, Heaven only knows; but our officials have to deal with human nature and passions, and it is not politic to play with them. The Mirs are not the unresisting snipes and ducks of Arabji-vahi whom His Excellency has been butchering with great self-satisfaction. When tact and gentleness are absent in the management of these gatherings, they are apt to be purely mischievous.

Proposed sitting of the Indian National Congress in England ridiculed.

18. Under the heading of "Stray Notes" the Shivaji (67), in its issue of the 20th November, publishes a paragraph in which the Indian National Congressionists are ridiculed for entertaining the idea that if they go to London and there discourse eloquently their grievances the English people will be foolish enough to sympathise with the National Congress and to bring about the ruin of their Indian Empire which they have acquired with so much trouble, and the people of India are advised to give up the thought of travelling over to England and to do what they can in their own country, especially by protecting and patronising indigenous industries. It is also said that the English people are well aware that the people of India are forbearing and will put up with any infliction, and that if they are ready to disregard the prohibition of their religion about going by sea to foreign countries they will soon become Christians, and there is no wisdom in being hasty in giving them new political rights.

A meeting at Poona dissenting from the Indian National Congress.

19. A correspondent writes to the Dnyán Prakásh (13) in its issue of the 26th November, saying that a meeting of about fifty Hindus was lately held at Poona in a Hindu temple under the presidency of Ráo Bahádur Náráyan Bhikáji Joglekar, and that after some speeches in which the speakers condemned the National Congress for siding with Government in passing the Age of Consent Act, it passed a resolution to the effect that a National Congress of the type of the present Congress does not represent public opinion. The correspondent, in giving particulars of the proceedings of the meeting above mentioned, regrets the ignorance betrayed by the leading spirits therein about the real nature, doings and objects of the Indian National Congress, and blames them for their hastiness and obstinacy.—The Sudhárak (19) says that the meeting was attended by about twenty persons, and that they, after blaming the National Congress and Mr. Hume, its General Secretary, for consenting to the Age of Consent Act, passed a resolution that they did not want the Congress.

Mr. Alexander Rogers, ex-Revenue Member of the Bombay Council, and the Land Indebtedness Commission.

20. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 26th November, writes:—A London correspondent of the Bombay Gazette says that Mr. Alexander Rogers, ex-Revenue Member of the Bombay Council, who is spending his retirement over an elaborate treatise on the revenue laws of this presidency, has offered his services in connection with the Land Indebtedness Commission that is to assemble in January. Those who are aware of his views in general and the attitude he took up in 1877 at the time of the debates over the Land Revenue Code, of which he was the father, and the real character of which enactment has been recently exposed by Mr. Seymour

Kaay, M.P., in the House of Commons, and those who remember the numerous unsuccessful debuts the late Honourable Mr. Mandlik had with him in the Council in defence of the time-honoured rights of the people, will not, we dare say, view with satisfaction his nomination as a representative of Bombay on the Commission. Officers with an open and unbiassed mind are not wanting on the active Bombay establishment, and instead of Mr. Rogers one of them can easily be selected. This disposes of one of the two seats allotted to Bombay on the Commission, and it is to be hoped that the Government of Lord Harris will nominate a non-official Native. We would, however, suggest the selection of one entirely unconnected with the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha. This we venture to do, not on account of any ill-feeling towards those connected with that institution, but because it has committed itself in favour of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act. We want a person with an open mind—a person who, holding no settled views, will go to work with the single aim of arriving at the truth upon a careful consideration of the evidence that is placed before him—one who will, in short, be an unbiassed and impartial judge. Such a person it will not be difficult for the Government to find, if it cares to have him.

Disapproval of the treatment of Natives by Anglo-Indians and a suggestion to the people of India to present a memorial to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India.

21. The Broach Mitrá (98), in its issue of the 25th November, exhorts the people of India to present a suitable memorial to Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen-Empress of India regarding the ill-treatment said to be given by some of the Anglo-Indians to the Natives and the kind of justice done to the aggrieved in such cases by the British Courts of justice, and says that the memorial must be so carefully and argumentatively written as to produce a good impression upon Her Majesty and to induce Her Majesty to take prompt measures in the matter. The Mitrá adds that the Natives have every reason to complain, because though the British law makes no distinction between Europeans and Natives, the Anglo-Indians think that they belong to a superior race and do not hesitate to ill-treat the Natives in various ways.

Distinction alleged to be observed in administering criminal law in cases against Natives and Europeans and its result.

22. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 23rd November, writes:—The lax manner in which the criminal law has of late come to be administered in cases of deaths or injuries caused to Natives at the hands of Europeans shows its inevitable result in a surprising frequency of such cases, and the more frequent such cases are, the more painfully patent appears the impossibility of obtaining adequate justice. There is at present not a province which has not its case or two of death or severe bodily injury done to a Native by a European, and in each case the offender gets off scot-free or with a much lighter sentence than would have been imposed on a Native in a similar case. It is very unsatisfactory that a feeling should be abroad that under the British Government there is one law for the white and another for the black. The equality of the law is one of the just boasts of the British Government. But we are bound to say that the result of several recent cases has created in the public mind serious misgivings about this attribute of the Government. There is a feeling of personal insecurity which we have heard expressed by persons in good positions. The privilege of trial by jury which the Ilbert Act bestowed is availed of in each case, and it has been found almost impossible to get a European jury to convict a European offender of any grave offence, especially a capital offence. The failure of the juries to bring in a verdict of guilty even in clear cases puts a premium on the commission of such offences. Where in some cases it happens that a conviction takes place and some sentence is passed, the European public raises a hue and cry, gets up meetings and petitions, and leaves no rest to the Government until some relief is obtained. Recently a case occurred in Bengal which has been spoken of as the Assensole or Raniganj case, in which a poor cultivator lost his life from a gun-shot from the hands of a European shikári who was in search of water-fowl, and the Magistrate convicted the European offender and inflicted the heavy sentence of a fine. The European section of the Raniganj public held meetings of protest, but no attention was given to the fact that a poor Native had been the victim of the game. The case for the defence was that the man was drowned, and that was persisted in by the protesting public in the teeth of the medical evidence showing no marks of drowning and patent marks of a gun-shot.

Remarks in connection with a murder case recently tried by the Chief Justice of the Madras High Court.

23. The Jagadhitechchhu (39), in its issue of the 21st November, refers to the evidence of European witnesses and the Judge's summing up in a murder case recently tried by the Honourable Sir Collin, Chief Judge of the Madras High Court, in which the accused, a European soldier, was sentenced to suffer three years' rigorous imprisonment, and says that if the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley of the Bombay High Court properly consider the proceedings in this as well as in similar other cases he will see that the adverse remarks made by him on Native evidence in the Ahmednagar shooting case were quite mistaken and most ungenerous. The paper requests the Madras Government to prosecute all the witnesses who have perjured in the case in question, and suggests the well-wishers of India to print and distribute freely in England the proceedings in this case in order to show Englishmen how Natives are ill-treated by Europeans in India.

Remarks on the disturbance in the Kurnool District in the Madras Presidency and a suggestion to Government.

24. The Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 24th November, observes :— The recent disturbance in the Kurnool District, in the Madras Presidency, does not reflect credit on the British Government and shows that the people were driven to this measure by extreme poverty. It is apparent that the people of India are so poor that in times of famine they have no other resource but to attack the rich. It is said that the rioters in this instance did not disperse till they were fired at. This is much to be regretted, because Government, which levy various taxes on the people, ought liberally to come to their rescue on such occasions. If no provision is made for the famine-stricken people the disaster may spread throughout the country, to the disadvantage of the rulers and the ruled. If the famine fund had not been used by the Government of Lord Lytton for military purposes, it would surely have been of great service at the present day.

Alleged famine in the Dhárwár District and a suggestion relating thereto.

25. The Rasik Ranjani (141), in its issue of the 19th November, says :— When we read and hear of the appearance of famine in various provinces this year we are very much afflicted, and we have no doubt that the same calamity will befall our province. As there has been no rain throughout the year in the tálukás of Gadag, Ron and Navalgund in the Dhárwár District nothing need be said about the condition of the crops. Thousands of cattle have already fallen a prey to death for want of fodder and the fate of the surviving, many of which have been driven to districts better favoured with rain, is very hard, so that a butcher even does not buy cattle worth hundreds of rupees for eight annas. We have made some suggestions to the District Deputy Collector for making provision for the dying cattle. But they are of no avail, for why should he trouble himself with matters which do not immediately concern the interests of those whose salt he eats? Is it not hard that the interests of the rayats, who are made to pay dearly for the benefit of Government, should not be looked to? Behold the humanity of Government, who have done nothing to rescue cattle falling into the jaws of death in large numbers for want of grass! A similar fate seems to await the people if the Government do not take timely steps. The people have become pale with horror at the sudden rise in the prices of corn. We therefore pray Government to start relief works to enable the poor to keep somehow their body and soul together.

Social and political reform and its chances of advance in India.

26. The Sudhárak or the Reformer (19), in its issue of the 23rd November, while congratulating the advocates of social reform in India on the progress that their cause has made and is making in the country, expresses regret at the impediments which the reform party has to encounter at the hands of those young men of the present generation who, having received Western education and being enlightened in their minds by it, are hypocritical in their conduct and take the lead of the orthodox people and encourage them to oppose reform tooth and nail, and says that though there are obviously many ways in which Indian people are suffering in consequence of their subjugation by the English, it would seem, after mature consideration, that subjugation, whether by the English, the French or any other European nation was certain in the circumstances of mental weakness and bodily infirmity which the Hindus were in before the advent of the English in India, and that the English are better rulers than any other nation and that if India is ever destined to rise from her fallen condition she will do so rather under the civilizing influences of the British rule than under the government of any other people.

A protest against the Age of Consent Act.

27. The Shri Shivdji (67), in its issue of the 20th November, refers to a complaint which was lately made by a man of the Kásar caste at Poona to the District Magistrate against his son-in-law under the Age of Consent Act, and which after trial was found to have been made maliciously and without proper cause, says that the Act in question is a mischievous piece of legislation and provides malicious persons with a powerful instrument of annoyance and torture, as is amply proved by the facts that since the passing of it about five cases have been tried by District Magistrates under it and that all of them have been found to be frivolous and malicious, and exhorts public associations to unite together and memorialise Government praying for the repeal of the Act.

28. In alluding to the same case the Ahmedabad Times (93), in its issue of the 25th November, observes:—The Government of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne was certainly ill-advised in passing the Age of Consent Act, but we must blame its supporters more, because they were not shrewd enough to see through the real object of Government, which was to create a difference of opinion among the Natives and thus to prevent them from uniting in asking for further political rights. The law has been passed only recently and the various prosecutions under it, that have since occurred in different parts of the country, are enough to give an idea of the mischief with which it is fraught, notwithstanding the provision that the legal machinery will be put in motion only on the information of the relatives of the girl, and we fear that if the Act be not soon repealed serious consequences will ensue, and much scope will be given for the satisfaction of private grudge.

A case of heroism shown by certain Native convict women in saving seven lives from drowning considered worthy of a reward from the Royal Humane Society and a request to Government in the matter.

29. The Rdst Goftdr (90), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—It is a great pity that public attention has not been drawn to the heroism of certain Native convict women who by their courage and skill saved from drowning the survivors from the ill-fated Enterprise. The historiette of the cyclone which overtook the Enterprise in view of the haven of Port Blair on the morning of the 2nd November will have an ever-lasting human interest, and will be rescued from oblivion by the memorable deed of heroism which the Anglo-Indian prints, strangely and yet after their kind, have dismissed with a bare mention. That surveying cruiser was hurled on by wind and waves to South Point Reef and wrecked with her whole complement of officers and men, barring seven Natives who were saved from "death's inexorable jaws" by clinging till day-break to that iron-stone rock for dear life. These brave men then breasted the swollen surge and attempted to swim to land. For a time they kept their heads above the "contentious waves," but it was not long before the "lusty strokes" of their arms waxed faint, and not a single soul would have survived to tell the tale, if some convict women, seeing them oppressed with odds by nature and her terrific forces, plunged at once into the waters, without holding any parley even with the natural fears of their sex. The courage as well as the wit of these females (which latter is said by misogynies never to fail the sex at a pinch) "mounted with the occasion," for in the absence of the ordinary means of rescuing the drowned, they planted their feet in the sea, and forming a chain of the hands which their God and the God of the seven unfortunates had given them, brought them ashore in spite of the raging surf and its buffetings. Heroism is much the same everywhere, and must have its substantial rewards and its ungrudging meed of praise without any difference between European and Native, between Manipur and the Andamans.

When Native women—and Native women degraded by crime and brutalised by violence—display such self-sacrifice and such courage of "unshaken root," their hearts cannot be made of anything but the right stuff. The Native press must for its own credit make organised efforts to move the Royal Humane Society in the matter, and to induce Government to lighten the load of these convict women's punishment, if not commute it altogether.

Remarks on the dilatoriness in the disposal of cases in the Sadar Court in Sind.

30. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 21st November, writes:—Among the least unfounded complaints that have been made against the Sadar Court in Sind and its accomplished Judge, Mr. Macpherson, the one most urgently calling for attention is the interminable delay interposed between the arguments of cases and judgments. In the celebrated case of Jarudyse versus Jarudyse, generations appeared to have come and gone without expediting the speed of that snail-paced Court—the Court of Chancery. But the fault did not appear to lie with the bench, so much as with the traditionally consecrated procedure of an institution which was a survival of by-gone days. The Sadar Court in Sind, however, is not encumbered with the same unwieldy apparatus as the Chancery Court, and yet if the present pace of judicial decisions is to be maintained, suitors may reckon on death alone to deliver them from the entanglements of law. It is no use being general and vague; and we propose to substantiate the charge we make by a single telling instance—the case of Aga Sultán Mahomedsháh versus Nur Mahomed Lalun. It is now nearly four years since Mr. Inverarity was brought down by the adherents of the Aga Khan to address arguments to the Sadar Court on behalf of his client. It is more than three years since he closed the argument, and possibly forgot all about the facts of the suit. But yet the Sadar Court Judge cannot make up his mind. His is that kind of subtle cleverness, apparently, which invents arguments for and against litigants which would surprise the litigants themselves, and having started himself on that track, His Honour bends his wits to combat these imaginary points That is excellent mental gymnastics and would have done credit to an initiate in the Schools; but Mr. Macpherson forgets that all the world is not Scotch, and what seems to amuse a Scotchman without limit may not be equally agreeable to the suitors. Perhaps we are doing Mr. Macpherson injustice; perhaps the tardiness is not constitutional; perhaps the wear and tear of our climate has told on him, in which case Mr. Macpherson's duty ought to be clear, though we need not specify it.

A complaint against the conduct of Ráo Sáheb Moro Raghunáth Bivalkar, Second Class Magistrate, Pen, towards one Mr. Trimbak Dáji Shet.

31. One Mr. Trimbak Dáji Shet writes to the Sudhákar (69), in its issue of the 21st November, to say that on the 18th idem, while he was sitting in the verandah of the Second Class Magistrate's Court at Pen in the Kolába District with the intention of witnessing a case which was to come on that day for trial before Ráo Sáheb Moro Raghunáth Bivalkar, a Second Class Magistrate, he was sent for by the latter and ordered to leave the Court and threatened with imprisonment if he dared enter the Court compound again. The courts of justice, including the High Court at Bombay, being open to the public, the Magistrate, adds the correspondent, has acted illegally and high-handedly in asking him to leave his Court, and that having no money to prosecute the Magistrate and get redress of the wrong done to him he has written this letter in order that it may come to the notice of the proper authorities and others may not meet with similar treatment at the hands of the Magistrate.

Opinions of two medical journals on the Rájábái Tower tragedy case and an appeal to the sense of justice of the Bombay Government.

32. Writing on the Lancet and the Rájábái Tower tragedy at Bombay the Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 22nd November, observes:—Having said enough last week on the subject we are loath to say anything more on it. But we once more appeal to the sense of justice and fair-play of the Bombay Government, and especially of His Excellency Lord Harris, to say whether after the declaration of opinion by two such competent medical authorities, they would still refuse to repair the injustice they have done to the family of the deceased and the community at large, and whether in the interests of public safety itself they consider it advisable to allow the Police Surgeon to still occupy the post which he now fills. However unkind and relentless fate may have been to the unfortunate ladies, it cannot be denied that it has been still more unkind and cruel to that surgeon himself. Either he must vindicate his medical reputation or voluntarily retire from the post in which he can no longer command the confidence of an enlightened public. One word more and we have done for the present. What a silence of the grave have our two daily English contemporaries of Bombay maintained on this scathing exposure! Will they not boldly come forward and say their say?

33. The Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—The two leading medical journals of the world, after a careful and scholarly review of the Rájábái Tower tragedy case, emphatically proclaim that outrage—dark and dastardly outrage—and not odious premeditated suicide, was the cause of the death of the two victims of hallowed memory. No doubt, conflicting and perplexing statements and misstatements, gathered and made in the excited times, shrouded the catastrophe and raised a mystery over it, and had a great deal, if not entirely, to do with misleading our Anglo-Indian friends and Government. But now that abler and more qualified minds have cleared away the mysterious and misleading elements, and presented the real issue in its true light, will not—we earnestly ask our Anglo-Indian friends and Government—will they not rectify their grave error of judgment and make a partial reparation, even at this late hour, to the memory of the dear departed—a memory so persistently trodden down, so ruthlessly dragged in the mire? We also ask them to make that 'amende honourable' so characteristic of all English gentlemen, which it is still possible for them to make, tardy though it be, for the grievous wrong they have unwittingly inflicted on a whole community—and that a loyal, tolerant and educated community. Now that the heat of the strife is gone, and not mere legal technicalities but scientific and practical facts are marshalled before them in plain unvarnished language by authorities the most competent in the world to pronounce on them, will not our straightforward Anglo-Indian brethren do their duty?

34. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—

Approval of the retention of Mr. Hamilton as a Presidency Magistrate at Bombay.

Last week it gave us pleasure to inform our readers of the agreeable fact of the further extension of service of Mr. Cooper as Chief Presidency Magistrate, and this week it gives us equal pleasure to observe that the Government has very wisely resolved to allow Mr. Hamilton to retain his seat on the police bench. It would have been a serious mistake had His Worship been relegated to the mofussil. The mofussil would have gained nothing, while Bombay would have distinctly suffered by his transfer. Mr. Hamilton has proved a most efficient and popular Magistrate. He has been discharging his duties without fear or favour, and the way in which he has now and again sternly curbed the energy of overzealous policemen is beyond all praise. Magistrates of his sterling character are a real buffer between the poor and police-ridden folk on one side and the police itself on the other. We again offer our congratulations to the Government for its wise discretion, and we also congratulate Mr. Hamilton on his good fortune.

35. The Jagaddidarsh (38), in its issue of the 22nd November, says that though, properly speaking, Mr. Sorábji Padamji, First Assistant Collector, Ahmednagar, should have received charge of the office of the Collector, Mr. Waddington, when he retired from the service on pension from the 20th instant, Mr. Stewart, Second Assistant Collector, has received it, and asks why such a distinction should have been made.

A question as to why distinction should be made between Natives and Europeans.

Part II.—Legislation.

36. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—

Certain amendments in the Vaccination Bill now before the Bombay Legislative Council suggested.

We do not at present care to rush into the controversy between the advocates and the opponents of vaccination. Government apparently have made up their mind to pass the Vaccination Bill. But it is not too much to expect that they should listen to reasonable suggestions.

Now, we have a few suggestions to make. Section 14 allows the Government to have vaccination "performed with lymph taken from a human being," and empowers vaccinators to take such lymph from vaccinated children "for the performance of other vaccinations." Now, we know that to save expense to Government vaccinators often resort to this practice. It was very common in Bombay and Karáchi for several years, and perhaps is so still. The children of the poor especially are utilised for this purpose, and a great deal of hardship is inflicted on their mothers, who have to go about with the vaccinator or to attend again and again at the vaccine station. The children also suffer severely. We have heard some of them shriek agonisingly when the vaccine is taken from their yet raw wounds. In the name of humanity we beg to suggest that, if it is at all thought necessary to retain the second part of Section 14, it should be laid down that the lymph should not be taken from a vaccinated child for the performance of more than one vaccination. Section 24 provides that if any parent or guardian intentionally omits to produce a child whom he has been summoned to produce by a magistrate on the complaint of a vaccinator, he shall be punished with simple imprisonment for a term which may extend to three months, or with fine which may extend to one thousand rupees, or with both. We think that the sentence should be of fine only, and that the maximum amount should be not more than one hundred rupees. In Section 22 the penalty for inoculation is three months' rigorous or simple imprisonment, or two hundred rupees fine, or both. That offence, if it may be called such, is evidently considered a higher offence, as even rigorous imprisonment may be awarded to punish it. For this reason the amount of the fine in Section 24 should be less, and not five times more than in Section 22. We also think that the imprisonment awardable under Section 22 should be simple, and not rigorous. This is the minimum of concessions to public opinion we have ventured to press upon the attention of Government. Our own demand would go much further. It may be said that these provisions have been in force in Karáchi and Bombay, and have done no harm. But we have no evidence that they have done no harm. The cries of the poor seldom penetrate the legislative chamber, and it is mainly the poor who are affected by these cruel sections. Besides, Karáchi and Bombay are advanced cities, with an influential public press. The new Act will be introduced into less advanced areas, and, if the Government wishes to popularise vaccination, it had better not commence with laying down such stringent penalties.

Disapproval of the Vaccination Act itself.

37. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—We fear the proposed Vaccination Act may prove an engine of oppression in the hands of the Sanitary Department. In a province where education is spreading and people are taking kindly to measures of reform, it is impolitic to force reform by legislation. We know that the Sanitary Department has been urging Government to take up this piece of legislation for several years past, but their prayer has been very wisely let alone. His Excellency Lord Harris would be acting wisely if he dropped the matter altogether, or at least held it in abeyance until the province was prepared for it. The Sanitary Department has not yet been able to make out a case in support of the measure, and until they are in a position to do so it would be unwise to legislate in the matter. From the latest sanitary report it appears that the provinces which have shown best results in the vaccination of infants have not done so by compulsion but by persuasion and administrative improvement. We understand that in the Berárs 78 per cent. of the children born during 1889-90 were protected against small-pox. The Panjáb came next with 64 per cent. and our own province came third. In our own province the percentage of infants protected was so high as 54 and the proportion of persons of all ages protected to the total population was 33 to 35 per thousand. If these results could be achieved without any compulsion the present Bill will only make vaccination unpopular, and progress will be made, if at all, at the cost of public contentment. Official reports bear testimony to the fact that there is little opposition to vaccination. In this province Bombay and Poona are the only two places where animal lymph is used throughout the year; elsewhere human lymph is generally used, so that the first step necessary to protect children against small-pox is to make arrangements for the general supply of animal lymph. People object, and very properly, to allow their children to be vaccinated with lymph from human subjects, and so long as this prejudice lasts this objection cannot be got over. In England itself the work of the anti-vaccination society is being most successfully pushed on, and it is idle to expect that Indian people should shut their eyes and ears to that work. We know the Government of Bombay is at this time specially strong in its personnel, but we also know that the members who constitute it are extremely judicious. The Village Sanitation Act, which was passed a couple of years ago, is lying unattended to, and we have little doubt that the compulsory Vaccination Act also, if passed, would be lying similarly neglected. It does nobody good to have the statute books swollen, but, on the contrary, too many Acts do a good deal of harm to the cause of progress. The Sanitary Department must show some work and the Government is bound to help it in this matter. But we hold that the cheap and ready method of having one or two Acts thrown out of the legislative machinery is in no way indicative of the progress or success of the department. What we want is real work, and this can only be obtained if Government be prepared to spend more money from their own resources. As a matter of fact, we find that Government are not prepared to do it, and so long as sympathy in the form of substantial aid cannot be extended, it is not only useless but positively harmful to keep up appearances of activity by planning, preparing and passing legislative measures of the kind now proposed. We are sorry that the Bill has not attracted sufficient notice, and as vaccination forms part of the duties of self-governing boards we would, while urging the consideration of the measure, suggest the necessity for combined action. Lord Harris has only very recently told us that to make a successful prayer we must be unanimous, or nearly so, in making it. Let us, therefore, make this a test case and try to be unanimous in opposing the measure. It must at the same time be clearly understood that municipalities, if they protest against the measure, must be prepared to incur additional expenditure for providing sufficient animal lymph, for they can then well say to Government that the concession prayed for is not merely factious, but that if sufficient time be allowed and the work of vaccination properly conducted, vaccination will soon become so general as to avoid the necessity of compulsion.

PART III.—Education.

Disapproval of the system of appointing Professors in local colleges as examiners in the University examinations.

38. A correspondent, writing to the Gujarátí (85) in its issue of the 22nd November, says :—I am of opinion, and I lay no claim to originality, as the opinion has been expressed by many abler men before me, that Professors of any of the colleges in this presidency should not be appointed examiners here, but that other educated gentlemen in the presidency or Professors of any of the colleges in other presidencies should be selected as such, for if a Professor of any of the colleges here is appointed an examiner, the students of that college have a decided advantage over others. They know what questions are likely to be asked, what questions are not to be asked, what interpretations, where high authorities do not agree, the examiner likes most, and what method the examiner thinks the students should follow in answering the questions. It is also difficult for conscientious Professors to do their duties as examiners. They are bound as Professors to tell the students what points are important, what questions they should expect in their examinations, in what way they should answer their questions and many other important things, whilst as examiners they are bound not to let the students know the questions they are to get in the examinations. The same men should not also be appointed as examiners so often that students can know beforehand the questions they are to get in their examinations from the nature of their questions asked for many years past.

A suggestion to hold an Educational Conference in the Bombay Presidency similar to that held in Berár.

39. The Vrittasár (79), in its issue of the 23rd November, approves of the Educational Conference annually held by educational officers and school-masters in Berár, says that many advantages would be derived if the Director of Public Instruction, Bombay, held a similar conference in the Bombay Presidency, and requests the Deputy Educational Inspectors to send to the Director through the Educational Inspectors their opinions as regards time, place and programme of business of the conference in order that the scheme may meet with speedy success.

Part IV.—Railways.

Proposed memorial to Government regarding the alleged grievances of the high-caste Hindus travelling on Indian railways.

40. The Rájyabhakta (120), in its issue of the 24th November, is glad to hear that one Pandit Vyatgiri Ganesh Shástri of Benares, residing near Durga Ghát Kapileshwar, has, with a view to sending a memorial to Government praying for the redress of the grievance of high-caste Hindus having to travel by railway in the same compartments with Bhangis and other low-class people, obtained numerous signatures from Rájputana and other parts of Northern India, and says that he is on a visit to Bombay. The paper exhorts the people here to sign the memorial, or, if this be not possible, to communicate to him their sympathy with its object.

Part V.—Municipalities.

Proposed imposition of a house-tax in Hyderabad (Sind) and the conduct of the Collector-President of the local municipality in the matter.

41. The Pirbhat (161), in its issue of the 7th November, says :—We have published the proceedings of the special and general meetings of the Hyderabad Municipality held on the 30th ultimo and the 3rd instant. All the business that was transacted at these meetings excites surprise. The more we think about them, the more unintelligible the matter becomes to us. Very often we wonder whether the municipality is but a mockery and local self-government only child's play, and the municipal commissioners are puppets made by our benevolent Government to be used by subordinate officials as mere toys. From what has taken place at the last two or three meetings of the municipality one can unhesitatingly answer all the above questions in the affirmative. The Collector of the district, who is the President of the municipality, has been from the very beginning informing the municipality that the Commissioner in Sind wishes that the houses in the town should be taxed, and that if the proposal to levy the house-tax be not carried into effect by the municipality Government will be displeased and that for that reason the municipal commissioners should consider well before expressing their opinions. We are at a loss to understand how the Collector could utter such and so many words. Either he seems to have forgotten his position, or it seems that the obligations imposed by law upon the municipal commissioners have escaped his memory, otherwise it is not likely that such a high functionary would ever have used such words to our independent municipal commissioners. Do not these words mean, "Oh municipal commissioners, whether you like it or not, whether it be in accordance with your own views or not, whether your conscience and reason justify it or not, whether it is the opinion of your voters or not, or whether you yourselves think it right or not, you should give your opinions in favour of the tax, because it is only then that Government will be pleased." We are at our wits' ends to understand how such a disagreeable hint came to be given by a gentleman belonging to such a civilised and advanced country as England, the people of which are well-known to be intimately acquainted with their duties and never fail to discharge them irrespective of any consequence. The independent character of the people of England is known all over the world. Seeing that an Englishman does not like independence in others, we are surprised and begin to doubt whether all that we have read in histories or heard from our friends is not untrue. It is far from the dignity of rulers to induce people to respect orders of Government officers and to tread under foot their responsibilities and the dictates of their consciences. Probably our Collector was under the impression that our municipal commissioners were not men blessed with a conscience, that they were incapable of exercising their own judgment and that they would yield to any action that was desired. But the resolute determination of our municipal commissioners must now have convinced him that he was labouring under a misapprehension. Though our people are always ready to please Government officials in all reasonable ways, yet when there is a matter of judgment or where the interests of their voters are at stake they know how to maintain their ground respectfully and fearlessly. Our municipal commissioners have clearly shown themselves worthy of the responsibilities imposed upon them. It is true that in the controversy about the house-tax many unpleasant matters have come to light. But we are exceedingly glad to see that our municipal commissioners possess a great regard for their voters and have their interests so well at heart that they try to help them even at the cost of the good-will of the officials. As the Collector is at present displeased with the conduct of the municipal commissioners it is likely that he will not appreciate the independence of character shown by that body. But we are certain that after the agitation is over he will, on dispassionate consideration, come to the conclusion that the municipal commissioners were bound to do what they have done, and he will no doubt congratulate himself on the fact that he has been given conscientious members on the municipal board. The Collector not only warned the municipal commissioners to be very careful in giving their opinions, but also held out threats to them. He also hinted at the suspension of the municipality. But Mr. Barrow went even a little further. He said that if the municipality would not carry out the proposal, Government would abolish it and take the reins of municipal administration in its own hands and then it was not known what burdens would be imposed upon the people! What does this imply? What is the good of calling meetings or asking the opinions of municipal commissioners? Why did not the Commissioner in Sind write that he had imposed a house-tax, that his orders should be enforced, and that no one should oppose them? To impose any tax without the consent of the municipal commissioners is contrary to the principles enunciated in the municipal code. We know that Mr. Barrow is very popular among the inhabitants of the town. He is a kind-hearted, well-wishing and sympathising officer, and it is difficult to understand how he passed the remarks he did. At the last general meeting the Collector asked the opinion of each member separately. His object in doing so was to see who opposed his proposal. He told every one who expressed his opinion against the imposition of the house-tax that his vote meant that the Collector's proposal should be set aside. Such a persuasive artifice does not become the Collector of a district and President of a District Municipal Board. To forget one's own official position simply to carry out a proposal does not show seriousness of character. We are compelled to say that we are much displeased to see the chief officer of the district behaving with levity, and we hope that all that he said was said in an excited state of mind and referred to those particular occasions only, and that it is not his nature to conduct himself in that manner.

42. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 22nd November, writes:—

Alleged pressure brought by Government on municipalities to abolish or reduce octroi duties, while Government levy the salt-tax.

Several municipalities are being pressed to abolish or reduce octroi duties and to impose the house-tax, on the ground that octroi duties are unfair to the poor and the house-tax will fall on the rich. We are inclined to this view generally. But may we ask Government if the salt-tax is fair to the poor?

Part VI.—Native States.

43. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 22nd November, observes:—The Native States being subsidiary to the British Government, the criminal law which obtains in British territory should apply to the Native States as well, so that there may be one criminal law for the whole country. If an offender who is a British subject cannot escape punishment by obtaining shelter in a Native State, it is very strange that an offender subject to one Native State should find protection and freedom from the clutches of the law in another. Rághav Khavás, in whose hands the Jám of Navánagar was at one time a mere puppet, has been dismissed from the service of the State and is charged under various sections of the Indian Penal Code. A warrant was about to be issued against him, but in order to evade the law he fled from the Navánagar State, and it is indeed very astounding to find that the Thákor of Morvi, who is a K.C.I.E., has given him shelter on account of the Khavás possessing enormous wealth and being a friend of the Thákor. We request Mr. Ollivant, Political Agent, Káthiáwár, to carefully enquire into this matter, which has taken place during his absence, censure the Thákor if necessary, and to ask him to hand over Rághav to the Jám for trial. If Rághav, who is accused of a large number of crimes, be allowed to go scot-free in this manner, other Native States will follow the example of Morvi and crime will be on the increase and unchecked. We bring this matter also to the notice of the Government of His Excellency Lord Harris and recommend an enquiry into it.

Disapproval of the conduct of the Thákor Sáheb of Morvi for harbouring Mr. Rághav Khavás of Navánagar.

Alleged mismanagement of the Táluka Court, Jetpur, in the Soráth Pránt in Káthiáwár.

44. A correspondent of the Rájyadhakta (120), in its issue of the 24th November, while writing about the unsettled state of the judicial machinery at Jetpur in the Soráth Pránt of the Káthiáwár Agency, says that about four Daftardárs of the Táluka Court have resigned one after another without assigning any reason, that the petty chiefs constituting the Court are very irregular in holding their sittings and arbitrary in their conduct towards the litigants, that their Daftardár disposes of work as he chooses by writing out orders and circulating them among the Judges for their approval according to his own convenience, and that there are at present on the register certain cases which have been pending for the last ten years. The correspondent also complains of the absence of a municipality in the town although a handsome sum of about Rs. 25,000 is annually collected from various ábkári and contract taxes, and requests Government to appoint a commission to enquire into the state of affairs above reported.

The house-tax levied in the Mánsa State, in the Mahi Kántha Agency, and its consequences on the schools there.

45. A correspondent of the Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 26th November, says that the inhabitants of the Mánsa State, in the Mahi Kántha Agency, not having obtained any redress from the Bombay Government in the matter of the new tax of an anna a month on every house, have resolved not to send their children to school and that therefore the schools have remained empty for the last few days.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = a in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Avunedaya or the well known Attire, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks alleged to have been made by the Czarewitch on the British rule in India.

1. The Maháráshtra Mitra (49), in its issue of the 26th November, reproduces the following remarks alleged to have been made by the Czarewitch on British rule in India:—The Native Princes and Chiefs in India enjoy no liberty whatever, for they are kept under strict control by political officers appointed by the British Government to advise them. These officers employ various means to compel the Princes to visit England, where they do not get proper respect and honour, though the British Government professes in public documents and assemblies that these Princes are dear to it as if they were its children. Something like this took place when His Highness the Holkar visited England in 1887. The political officers are supported by the local Governments in their designs against the Princes, whose household matters even are interfered with by them. The political officers introduce no reforms, nor do they increase the revenues of the States, but manage to get the lion's share of the State income, the ruler being reduced to beggary and being otherwise very badly treated. The princely incomes enable these officers to vie in splendour with the most powerful Princes and Chiefs. It would be a wonder to expect the latter to be quite contented with their situation, and it is not wise to try their patience any longer at this rate. It is true that the Native Princes and Chiefs are thankful to the British Government for being allowed to retain their respective principalities, but their feelings must be those of a goat tied firmly near a tiger's cage.

A suggestion to Government to keep the people of India contented in order to assure themselves of success in war with Russia.

2. The Ary&vart (22), in its issue of the 28th November, says:—Russia is a very powerful country and the British Parliament will not sanction the raising of large loans to fight with her, for, if the British Government is defeated it will lose India and will have to pay the debt. The Indian Government also cannot raise money for the same purpose by imposing new taxes upon the people, who are already overtaxed and discontented. In order to secure success in a struggle with Russia and permanency to their rule in India, Government should make their administration dear to the Natives by abolishing all the taxes that are now levied.

Obituary notice of Lord Lytton.

3. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—The death of Lord Lytton remains unsung and unregretted in India, on whom his fatal imperialistic policy heaped woes unnumbered. The author of the Second Afghan War and the black Press Act dies unforgiven by this country. The little good he did in some directions may be said to have been long since forgotten. It will now be completely interred with his bones. But the evils which he wrought on this unfortunate country and its law-abiding and contented people are destined never to be effaced. The wounds he inflicted are yet unhealed or only partially healed; while the unhappy memory of the wrongs and injuries committed is as fresh as ever. These rankle in the heart of the people he turned into gall and wormwood. Peace and contentment, which reigned supreme till his advent, soon fled from the land. They have not yet returned, and there is no saying when they may. For, deep have been the seeds of discontent his Government sowed in the soil. They germinate periodically only to intensify the unhappiness and aggravate the original miseries. They are the direful spring of the innumerable evils witnessed in the country these last fourteen years. The heart bleeds and the hands ache to describe even a millionth part of the history of that disastrous Viceroyalty. A dilettante in the art of practical government and a doctrinaire to boot, Lord Lytton allowed himself by some "irony of fate" to be almost wholly guided in his administration by other doctrinaires, more pedantic than himself, but who plumed on their Indian experience, which he did not possess. But their experience was sterile. To the people it was like the Dead Sea Apple—all ashes and bitter to the taste. It was the experience of a proud oligarchy wrapt in its own infallibility, but utterly ignorant of the feelings and innermost thoughts of the people. Nay more. It was extraordinarily unsympathetic—so unsympathetic, indeed, that it recked not while men's bones whitened in millions in one large province in the North and presented an equally ghastly scene in the South, till the groans and shrieks of the dying and the dead aroused the country and its echoes reverberated across sea and land six thousand miles away and melted the hearts of the philanthropists of Mansion House. These forced the hands of the cold-blooded oligarchy and brought measures of relief to allay the horrible pangs of the famine in which the sciolists had till then refused to believe. The selection of Lord Lytton as Viceroy was a political and an inexcusable blunder of the first magnitude on the part of Benjamin Disraeli, as much as his precious "rectification of the haphazard frontier" was another. But India seems to be fated to be the toy of successive Ministries, and so long as party faction and party fury prevail, it would be hopeless to look forward to a change in her political circumstance. In this respect there is not much of a difference between the pharisaism of the Tory and philistinism of the Liberal.

4. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 30th November, expresses sorrow at the death of Lord Lytton in the following manner:—The death of Lord Lytton remains unregretted in India, for the evils which he wrought on this unfortunate country and its law-abiding and contented people are destined never to be effaced. He with his imperialistic policy heaped innumerable woes on the people of India and has sullied the most Christian Government of Her Most Imperial Majesty the Queen-Empress of India with his unpropitious acts. His death will be mourned by his relations and his sympathisers only; for in India the unhappy memory of the injuries and wrongs he committed is as fresh as ever. The death even of an enemy is worth a mournful thought, and only on this ground will the generous heart feel a pang of pain. These generous beings have even felt sorry for the mistake which Lord Lytton committed of losing very unfortunately the opportunity of conferring great benefits on a large portion of mankind which was fortunately offered him. The path of life of those who have got some power over their fellow-beings is always beset with great difficulties. Such persons are obliged to discharge their duties towards the public with great caution, impartiality and generosity. If they do so, then alone they become popular and are honoured by the people; but when such people not only misuse their powers, but abuse them, they become liable to public censure, as has become the life and memory of Lord Lytton. May there come no Lyttons over India in future to rule her!

5. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—

Approval of the appointment of Mr. Subramania Iyer as an Acting Judge of the Madras High Court.

The appointment of Mr. Subramania Iyer to act for Mr. Justice Mutuswami Iyer as Judge of the Madras High Court will be welcomed much outside of the Southern Presidency. We congratulate the Government on this excellent selection. [Several other newspapers of the week also approve of the appointment.]

6. In alluding to the appointment of Mr. S. Iyer as Acting Judge of the Madras High Court, the Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—

Mr. S. Iyer's appointment as an Acting Judge of the Madras High Court and its significance in respect to the attitude of Government towards the Indian National Congress.

No worthier or better choice could have been made, for Mr. Iyer has long since established his reputation at the Madras bar for great legal acumen, marked ability, and an admirably sweet temper. Again, in public affairs, especially those relating to the great problems of Indian administration on which the National Congress has been rivetting the serious attention of the rulers for the last seven years, Mr. Iyer has been known to hold most sound views and express them with a sobriety of language which leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Iyer, in short, possesses all the qualifications, though in a less brilliant degree, which distinguish our own highly esteemed citizen, the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang. We miss in our Madras friend the ripe Sanskrit scholarship of our Bombay Judge; also his unrivalled knowledge of the Hindu law to which the late Chief Justice, Sir Michael Westropp, himself no mean authority on the subject, more than once paid rich tribute. Mr. Iyer also lacks the ringing eloquence of Mr. Telang. But barring these qualifications, he is as much admired and respected in Madras as Mr. Telang is in all India. Thus Mr. Iyer's presidential services are lost to the Congress. But it is a matter of deep satisfaction to observe that the Government, unlike the prejudiced and even malignant Anglo-Indian, is not blind to the sterling merits of our leading Indian gentlemen, even if they be ardent Congressmen. This shows clearly that it is sagacious and liberal-minded enough to utilise the services of such men, whenever the State has need of them. It did not deter by a feather's weight the Government of Bombay from offering Mr. Telang a seat on the High Court bench, albeit his permanent and abiding sympathy with our great "unconventional convention." And it has not deterred the Madras Government from imitating the example of the sister administration by offering Mr. Iyer the vacant Judgeship. Thus the emphatic declaration of Lord Lansdowne last year, that the Government is not inimical to the Congress, derives fresh emphasis from the fact of Mr. Iyer's appointment. It deals a direct blow to that section of Anglo-Indians which is perennially endeavouring to curse that magnificent organization. The fact is that the Government, in this respect, now sees clearly as the noonday sun that the Congress is a power and an influence which will have to be respected and attended to as years roll on. For, what, after all, is its aim and object? This only: the promotion of national interests. And no Government, much less the Government of India, could deny that national interests are identical with the interests of the State. It is, therefore, a satisfaction to know that one important result of the agitation of the Congress is the clear perception of its aim and object by our rulers. Is it possible to conceive that if the Congress were a body of sedition-mongers, as was persistently and maliciously alleged by its enemies, the Government of India would ever think of seeking for Judges from the ranks of its leading men? It has, however, been stated in some quarters that there is a diplomacy on the part of Government; that it endeavours by such means to spirit away, as it were, all the most active workers of the Congress, so that we may see the disruption of that body in a few short years; that is to say, as soon as there are no important leaders left. This is a statement which, on the face of it, is fallacious and needs no attempt on our part to prove its fallacy. The world of India is large enough. As elsewhere, so in this country, the tide and ebb of leading men is certain to have its natural course. The ebb must be followed by a tide, and the tide by an ebb. In this unceasing process new leaders must spring to the surface as old leaders recede, or retire, or die away. It is, therefore, absurd to suppose that the Congress would at any time be found without leaders. The wish may be father to the thought; but, humanly speaking, it is doomed never to be realised. So that on our part we dismiss without another thought the motive of astute diplomacy attributed to the Government.

7. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 29th November, says that some of the newspapers have misrepresented the object of the meeting recently held in the Murlidhar's temple at Poona for recording its dissent from the Indian National Congress, and that they have tried to deride it by ridiculing its proceedings and its promoters, and remarks:—Those who convened the meeting are not opposed to the National Congress movement. They have simply passed a resolution to send a memorial to Government, informing it that the Congress should not be considered as representing the people so long as it did not carry out certain reforms in its mode of work. The Congress has not yet done any good to the people, who are offended by its leaders having supported the Age of Consent Act and allowed the meetings of the Social Conference to be held in its pavilion. We have yet received no return for the large amount of money spent annually in holding the Congress. The leaders of the movement have also grown apathetic, inasmuch as they do not make persistent efforts to draw the attention of Government to the resolutions passed by that body. The Congress is sure to die on account of the apathy of its promoters, including Mr. Hume. To suspend the next year's meeting of the Congress and to hold its gathering in England in 1893 is virtually to bring it to an end so far as India is concerned. The present deplorable state of the Congress has been caused by the Social Conference, and we cannot help saying that we do not want the former so long as the meetings of the latter are allowed to be held in the Congress pavilion or are held even in the city in which the Congress assembles.

8. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 29th November, writes :—In suggesting that the National Congress should pass a resolution expressing regret at the conduct of the Government of India in passing the Age of Consent Act, inasmuch as public opinion was not taken notice of, our suggestion is misunderstood on purpose, and we are represented to discount the political importance of the Congress by asking it to take up a social question. This is the only blind likely to be successful which it is within the power of those who are less friendly to our interest. We are sorry the heat of the controversy has not yet abated to allow our public men to think soberly in the matter. Enthusiasm for social reform has, perhaps, blinded them, and they have themselves declared their incapacity to occupy the responsible position of public leaders. In other provinces, however, very few public leaders suffer from the fault of being unnational social reformers, and we appeal to them to think over the matter and make up their minds to adopt our suggestion. To avoid misunderstanding, we might be permitted to state clearly that we do not want the Congress to discuss the merits of the measure. We do not want the Congress to sit in judgment upon the conduct of those who supported the measure, nor of those who opposed it. We have not the least desire to throw the apple of discord, but we certainly wish that the Government of India should not be allowed to trample public opinion under foot with impunity, without even a word of disapproval from the assembly of the nation. It is a piece of legislation carried in the full teeth of the opposition of the whole empire and ought to serve as a typical case for demanding reform of the Legislative Councils. It is a measure that vividly illustrates the despotic character of the rule over us, and, above all, it is an insult to the Congress itself. Government thereby declares that we may create public opinion as much as we like, we may express it as strongly as possible, but Government will defy it as it likes. We ought to be ashamed to put up with such a national insult. The British committee of the Congress recently declared that instead of taking up merely broad questions of principles for agitation in England, they would rather take up concrete cases illustrative of those principles. If so, where can we find a better case, more glaringly violating one of the first principles, or rather the very principle on which the Congress is based and for which it works ?

A suggestion to bring before the coming Indian National Congress a resolution expressing regret at the conduct of the Government of India in passing the Age of Consent Act.

9. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 3rd December, says :—We have no desire whatever to revive in any form at the Indian National Congress the question of the passing of the Age of Consent Act by Government, since the Congress can well impress on Government the inadvisability of ignoring public opinion which has been done in connection with several important matters besides the Consent Act, without alluding to the latter Act. No advantage would be gained by again rousing the public feelings against the Act. It is true that Government set aside the suggestions of both the parties—the supporters and the opponents of the Act—in passing the measure, still we cannot see much reason to find fault with Government, for in the heat of the controversy both the parties had so much lost their equanimity of temper that Government did well in ignoring the suggestions of both.

10. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 30th November, says that on the 29th idem a crowded meeting of the people of the táluka was convened at the town of Islámpur under the presidency of the local Jághirdár, Mr. Trimbakráo Anandráo Mantri, in a tastefully decorated pavilion specially erected, for the purpose of electing delegates for the forthcoming Congress at Nágpur ; that the meeting was also attended by outsiders from the cities of Sátára, Poona, Kolhápur, &c. ; that several speeches were delivered on the subjects to be brought before the Congress for consideration, such as the forest question, the salt duty and income-tax, the concession of the elective principle, &c. ; and that the proceedings terminated with the customary distribution of gulcupdis and display of fireworks.

A crowded meeting at Islámpur in the Sátára District to elect representatives to the next Congress at Nágpur.

11. The Portuguez Britannico (166), in its issue of the 28th November, writes:—The appointment of a Commission once again to enquire into the question of land indebtedness and the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act is a recognition on the part of Government that as yet little or no success has attended the efforts which have been made to give relief to the rayats and to save them from the unrelenting grip of the money-lender. Much as we wish that a satisfactory solution of the difficulty may be arrived at, we cannot help feeling that the hydra of land indebtedness will never be conquered with the weapons which have hitherto been employed against it, and which, so far as we can see, it is intended to employ against it in the future. We have a very robust faith in the efficacy of legislation for many of the evils which afflict society and oppress the commonwealth, but we cannot believe that legislation of any kind will give any relief worthy of the name to agriculturists, and our experience of the past is opposed to such a belief. We fail to see that there is anything specific in the fact that agriculturists are in debt any more than in the fact of other classes of people being in debt. The law that marks the relative positions of creditors and debtors should therefore, we think, be the same whether it applies to the indebtedness of individuals or of classes or of the nation itself. We do not wish to make light of the question of land indebtedness, nor do we mean that agriculturists do not deserve the consideration and sympathy they are having at the hands of Government. We consider it rather a slur upon the Indian administration that the state of things now prevailing should have been permitted to exist. We desire that the agriculturists should be relieved; but while commending the zeal of the Government to help them, we think that a satisfactory solution of the difficulty cannot be arrived at so long as those who are appointed to enquire into the matter enter upon their task with the idea fixed upon and determined that legislation of some kind is the only remedy for the troubles of the rayat, and, in the circumstance, we cannot but consider that the Commissions appointed from time to time in connection with land indebtedness are an unnecessary waste of public time and money. The effect of legislation so far has been to place in the hands of Civil Judges greater liberty of action when dealing with money-lenders and thus making it more and more difficult for money-lenders to recover their dues. This is, no doubt, relief to agriculturists, but it is so only nominally, because money-lenders, like other business-men, live with the times, and in proportion to the difficulty they experience in recovering their loans they make the terms under which they part with their money more and more stiff. The operation of the Small Causes Courts here and elsewhere need only to be cursorily glanced at to satisfy ourselves that the greater leaning which is now shown to the so-called victims of Márwádis is no protection to the public, or, at all events, to that section of it which is compelled to have dealings with these usurers, and that with all the legal difficulties which hedge him in the Márwádi does as thriving a business as before. Each additional difficulty thrown in the way of the Márwádi resolves itself eventually into a burden on the borrowers; and while dishonest men are enabled to frequently gain by the leniency of the Court to debtors generally, honest men whom circumstances force into the clutches of the usurers have to pay dearly, because they are made to pay for the accommodation they receive and for the dishonesty of the others.

Legislation with a view to relieve the rayats from indebtedness considered quite useless, and the Land Indebtedness Commission considered a waste of time and money.

12. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—The appointment of the Land Indebtedness Commission by the Government of India to examine the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act will not, we are sure, lead to the removal of the evils which the Government is called upon to face every now and then. The principle underlying the Act stands condemned by the favouritism which the law shows to one class of individuals against another. So long as there is no agency which can take the place of the money-lender, it is only creating additional barriers between capital and labour by Acts like these. The greater the insecurity, the greater the interest. The rayat has to resort to his sáwkár when he is pressed for money, whether he has to pay the Government rents, or to buy seed, or to marry his children. The sáwkár will not satisfy his needs if there is a third party who would interfere and say that his demands were unjustifiable. With all the sympathy for the wretched condition of the rayat we are constrained to say that the Government, if it is not prepared to create another agency in the place of the sáwkárs, would do well to abolish the Act. New circumstances create new necessities. If agricultural banks can step into the place of the Márwádis it would be nice to give them a trial. There is much divergence of opinion about the merit of the Act, and therefore the report of the Commission will be very anxiously awaited.

Disapproval of the appointment of the Land Indebtedness Commission, and a suggestion to repeal the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act if Government is not prepared to open agricultural banks.

13. The Rást Goftár (90), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—

Immediate extension of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act to other districts recommended, and the appointment of the Land Indebtedness Commission considered useless.

The appointment of a special Commission by the Government of India to enquire into the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act and examine the soundness of the principle underlying it, is a natural sequel to the complaints recently made to Mr. H. E. M. James by the impoverished land-owners of Sind and referred to in an address presented to His Excellency Lord Harris the other day while on a visit to that province. Since the introduction of the Act in 1879 enquiries have been made not less than four times into the economic results of the Act. We wonder what special reasons have prompted the Government of India to institute a fresh enquiry now after the able and exhaustive one made by Mr. Woodburn so late as 1888. That the Indian rayat does not fail to break down unless he is specially protected by the law is now accepted as a melancholy fact, and we think it the duty of a humane and civilized Government like the British to lose no time in extending the operation of the Act now prevailing in the Deccan to all the agricultural districts in the Empire. That the sáwkár is a power in the mofussil is also a notorious fact, and it is a sheer act of inhumanity to indefinitely wait and watch the land-owner made a constant prey of by the Indian Shylock. We must confess that we have no faith in Commissions, "special" or general, and much less in the one in which Native interests, which are the only interests really concerned, are entirely unrepresented It has now become a fashionable custom with each successive Viceroy to prescribe the nostrum of a commission as a ready-made remedy for all cries and complaints. What good has come out, we ask, of the Finance Commission, the Education Commission, the Civil Service Commission, andhalf-a-dozen other Commissions that were appointed with the avowed object of satisfying Native wants and Native grievances? And are not the ponderous reports lying on some dusty shelves of the India Office to be honeycombed by the ravages of Time? We repeat the Native proverb that a mountain will be dug to drag out a mole.

14. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 30th November, writes:—

Remarks in connection with the appointment of two members by the Bombay Government on the Land Indebtedness Commission.

We are glad that the Government of India has, after all, appointed a Commission to enquire into the indebtedness of agriculturists and its relief, the operation of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, and the desirability of its extension. The Commissioners nominated are men entirely unconnected with Bombay, and will have the advantage of bringing a mind thoroughly fresh to the enquiry. All of them are judicial officers, and, therefore, habituated to weigh evidence. In their hands the enquiry may well be trusted to have an unbiassed course. The Bombay Government is to nominate two Bombay men. The question that naturally suggests itself is, who should be the men? The Sárvajanik Sabha of Poona recommends that both the men should be Natives, one representing the debtors and the other the money-lenders. It will, perhaps, be difficult to find men who will exactly represent such divergent interests. But the names the Sabha suggests, viz., those of Ráo Bahádur Nulkar, the Honourable Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar, Mr. D. E. Watcha and Ráo Bahádur Bhide, are highly eligible. We should like the Bombay men, too, to be as far as possible entirely independent, that is, not having had anything to do with the Act before. Perhaps, one Englishman of the position of a District Judge, Mr. Batty for instance, and one non-official Native gentleman would make a good addition.

15. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 3rd December, writes:—

Remarks in connection with the protest made to Government by the female mill-operatives of Ahmedabad against the curtailment of their hours of work.

A strong protest against the rule of eleven hours' work for female mill-operatives has been sent to Government by the female workmen in the Ahmedabad mills. Less work necessarily must mean less wages, and if owing to a fall in the daily amount of work done the owners substitute male labour in the place of the females, hundreds of the latter must lose their means of subsistence though the masters may in no way be losers. The very presentation of a protest against this Government rule is ample evidence of the fact that the female operatives never liked the present curtailment, and the last Commission of enquiry has had also opined to that effect. And yet there is the curtailment, and how mischievously it works is now being borne testimony to by those concerned in the matter. The retention of the existing rule means the deprivation of bread in so many cases, and we have no doubt that His Excellency the Viceroy will feel induced to remove the grievance. We are glad our contemporary of the Bombay Gazette has raised its voice on behalf of these poor, helpless workers, and it is expected that due consideration will be given to the cause of complaint.

16. The Kaiser-e-Hind (89), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—

Remarks on His Excellency the Viceroy's exhortation to the feudatory Native States to invest their surpluses in Government securities.

The only observation in His Excellency the Viceroy's speech at the Gwalior banquet which needs some notice is Lord Lansdowne's exhortation to the feudatories who have a full and overflowing treasury to invest their surpluses in Government securities. It is, no doubt, well meant. Hoarding silver and gold or coins is an ancient and immemorial practice. It was justified so long as insecurity prevailed in the country. But the empire is now consolidated. The pax Britannica has secured the blessings of security of life and property, so that the feudatories should not be afraid to draw out their hoardings and convert them into profitable investments or divert them to productive channels. It is just possible to conceive that there may be still a lurking suspicion in their mind that hard cash or solid bullion or nuggets of gold are better than paper. But if such be the case, let the princes turn the surpluses to such use as the lending of a part to poor classes of agriculturists or constructing productive public works. We think nothing could so much increase the prosperity of their States and their peoples as a vigorous prosecution of the last. Light feeders and railways are still a crying necessity in many a territory belonging to the feudatories. Let them be constructed and brought into a line with the chain of British Indian railways. Unfortunately here, too, the policy of the Government of India is of a character to throw reasonable doubts. Take the latest instance of the new railway projected by the Mahárája of Mysore. On the one hand, the Government exhorts them to build railways; but, on the other hand, when they begin to do so, a most objectionable interference is caused in their management. The State is not allowed to borrow freely in the market. It is asked to borrow from such syndicates as the Government of India itself may dictate! This is arbitrary enough. But what is worse is this. The syndicate must be guaranteed! Now this is benevolent despotism in the matter of railways with a vengeance. Is it not strange that while the Government of India actually deplores the old system of railways on the guarantee principle, because it has experienced the ruinous costliness of guarantees, it should in the same breath sternly demand of Native States like Mysore that they shall not build railways out of their own surpluses or out of moneys borrowed in the open market, unless such moneys were borrowed from syndicates whose capital and interest would be guaranteed? This is not the kindness of a paternal Government, but the unkindness of a cruel stepmother. How can the princes feel confidence after such arbitrary interference in recommendations of the character suggested by the Viceroy? [The Surya Prakásh (92) of the 28th November expresses similar sentiments.]

17. The Prabhát (161), in its issue of the 21st November, says:—

The tours of Government officers, the object for which they were originally intended, and the alleged mischief now resulting from them.

The object with which the annual tour of officers was originally prescribed was that if they travelled throughout their beat once a year and exercised a direct supervision over the working of their subordinates, the latter would do their work zealously and cautiously, and would not allow it to fall into arrears. It was also expected that, by this means, the superior officers of Government would be enabled to point out to their subordinate táluka establishments their errors and shortcomings and to see that similar mistakes were avoided in the future. It was further supposed that the subjects would rejoice to see that they were not being neglected by the higher officers, that from time to time they visited their villages in order to make themselves acquainted with their condition, and that they were ready to hear their grievances and to redress them. It was also thought that the rulers would be enabled to know much more about their subjects and with that knowledge to determine many questions impartially and satisfactorily. But the lapse of time has frustrated all the real objects of the tour, and associated with it so many mischiefs that one would rather like to see it altogether stopped. The work of every táluka visited by an officer on tour must necessarily suffer. The táluka officials and their subordinates are anxious to procure supplies for the officer and his staff. All day and night they pray that he and his establishment may go away pleased with them. A few days before the advent of the officer, the zamindárs and patels are called upon to collect a certain number of sheep, fowl and goats, and to arrange for a modi (a dealer in flour, ghi, &c.,) selling provisions at the officer's camp. These arrangements entail no pecuniary expense to the táluka officials. They cost them only a few words, while the whole burden falls upon the subjects. But owing to the anxiety to procure supplies which the táluka officials feel the office work of the táluka suffers. Of course, the daily routine business is disposed of, but even that is done hastily and inattentively. Hence the tour, instead of facilitating the despatch of the official business, as was originally intended, hinders it. The object of the tour was to promote the convenience of the people, but now it has become a source of annoyance to them, because it is only in the touring season that they are plundered. Now, judging fairly, we are bound to say that the superior officers of Government are ignorant of the malpractices committed by their official subordinates and private servants. Their butlers and cooks charge them for everything though they themselves receive many articles gratis. Thus the officers labour under a misapprehension that for every article used by them money is actually paid. One may say that the táluka officials purposely try to serve the Sahib's office establishment, because they know that they will be useful to them on many occasions, and it is they who examine their records. But this does not explain the cause of the táluka officials supplying provisions to the Sahib's butler, knowing that he, in his turn, charges his master for every article required for his use. But is it not a fact that if the officers are not duly supplied with the provisions, they get hot and hear the complaints of their butlers and cooks to the effect that they cannot get things even on payment, and that so and so does not help them in getting supplies? The Sahib does not even institute an enquiry to ascertain whether his butler's complaint is true or false. Then the táluka official's misfortune begins. Some Sahibs even go a little further. As soon as they arrive at their camp, they ask their butlers and cooks in the presence of the táluka establishments whether they have received all the articles required by them. Have not the members of the táluka establishment, then, reason to serve the Sahib's butlers and cooks and to fear them?

Comments on a letter alleged to have been written by the Collector of Hyderabad (Sind) to those who were absent from the Darbár held at Hyderabad at the time of the visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to that city.

18. A correspondent, writing from Hyderabad to the Sind Sudhár (163) in its issue of the 21st November, says:—On the 9th November 1891 His Excellency the Governor held a Darbár at Hyderabad. Municipal commissioners and other respectable inhabitants of the place were invited to it. Those who failed to attend it have now been officially addressed by the Collector to show cause at once why they should not be deprived of chairs. Bhai Harising and Mr. Manghanmal, Pleader, who are both municipal commissioners, were absent. The Collector has called upon them to show cause why they should not be made to forfeit their right to sit in chairs at all public gatherings except at meetings of the municipality. We are unable to understand the object of the Collector in writing letters of the above nature. It should be considered whether it is at all likely that any person would absent himself on such rare occasions unless compelled to do so by some important private business. Many Darbárs of the kind have been held before, but no one ever remembers having heard of any such official letter having been issued. Now it remains to be seen how the matter ends.

19. The Prabhát (161), in its issue of the 21st November, says:—His Excellency the Governor visits many places, and Darbárs are held everywhere. But the Darbár held at Hyderabad will be specially remembered. Probably, our Collector has firmly resolved to leave behind him a name, either good or bad. His conduct in connection with the levy of the house-tax has hardly been forgotten by the people, when by his invitations and by his arrangements about the Governor's Darbár he has given them a fresh cause for dissatisfaction. Some were provided with upper and some with lower seats. But as upper and lower seats in these days mean more or less respect, the matter cannot be looked upon as trifling. Not only the commoners but some of the members of the late ruling family of Amirs also were not fairly treated. But if this had been all, we would have kept quiet and viewed it as an oversight. The Collector, not considering the above means as sufficient to perpetuate his name, has invented a new and singular method which will, probably, fulfil his object. Some of the people invited to the Darbár failed to attend it. The Collector has now called upon them to explain why they should not be deprived of their chairs. Every one knows that people are always anxious to make their salaam to the Governor, and, consequently, they never miss such opportunities, if they can possibly help it. It follows, therefore, that these people must have absented themselves owing to sickness or some important business. The Collector should, therefore, have considered for awhile before addressing the absentees. It is said of the Daftardár that he is the Collector's Vazir or his right hand. But Mr. Najum-ud-din has not, in this instance, proved himself as such. Being the Collector's right hand, he should have advised him to do his duty. The Daftardár is not a new man in his office. He must be cognizant of everything. He must also be aware what degree of respect is due to each individual. He cannot be ignorant of the fact that absence from a Darbár is no offence. But it is not known how all this has happened. If the people blame the Collector they cannot exonerate the Daftardár, and we think that they have a reason for not absolving him of blame.

Remarks in connection with the memorial recently presented to His Excellency Lord Harris by the Mahomedans in Sind.

20. The Shri Shiváji (67), in its issue of the 27th November, refers to the memorial recently presented to His Excellency Lord Harris by some Mahomedans in Sind, in which they have prayed for the special favour of giving them Government patronage, and observes:—If Government had been impartial in their conduct no such foolish memorials would have been presented to them.. The Mahomedans are a troublesome race and Government by their conduct show that they are afraid of them, since they allow themselves to be led by Mahomedans. Government may use proper means for the spread of education in that community, but the policy of pleasing Mahomedans at the expense of other people is very bad and suicidal. It is therefore to be hoped that Government will properly consider matters in dealing with the Mahomedans.

Disapproval of the alleged arbitrary conduct of revenue officers while on tour.

21. The Jagadádarsh (38), in its issue of the 29th November, gives the following story and thus comments on the alleged arbitrary conduct of the subordinates of revenue officers on tour:—On the 26th November last, a milk-boy from a village was carrying the usual supply of milk to Ráhuri to be delivered to the local Subordinate Judge, when he was caught by two sepoys from the camp of an Assistant Collector of the district. The sepoys carried the milk to the camp forcibly, emptied the pot of its contents and dismissed the boy without paying him. The boy laid this matter before the Subordinate Judge, who told him to apply to the Mámlatdár. The Mámlatdár having no powers to try cases of highway robbery, dismissed the application with a remark to that effect. The Assistant Collector on being applied to dismissed the boy's complaint, simply telling him to go to the civil court. This case may be taken as typical of the cases happening every day. This is what the people are obliged to suffer at the hands of the revenue officers. The way in which they provide themselves with necessaries while travelling in their districts is censurable. They not only want necessaries, but must be supplied even with luxuries by every one whom they may command. Sometimes the Mámlatdár himself is not an exception to this arrears. It was also expected that, by this means, the superior officers of Government would be enabled to point out to their subordinate táluka establishments their errors and shortcomings and to see that similar mistakes were avoided in the future. It was further supposed that the subjects would rejoice to see that they were not being neglected by the higher officers, that from time to time they visited their villages in order to make themselves acquainted with their condition, and that they were ready to hear their grievances and to redress them. It was also thought that the rulers would be enabled to know much more about their subjects and with that knowledge to determine many questions impartially and satisfactorily. But the lapse of time has frustrated all the real objects of the tour, and associated with it so many mischiefs that one would rather like to see it altogether stopped. The work of every táluka visited by an officer on tour must necessarily suffer. The táluka officials and their subordinates are anxious to procure supplies for the officer and his staff. All day and night they pray that he and his establishment may go away pleased with them. A few days before the advent of the officer, the sainindár and patels are called upon to collect a certain number of sheep, fowl and goats, and to arrange for a modi (a dealer in flour, ghi, &c.,) selling provisions at the officer's camp. These arrangements entail no pecuniary expense to the táluka officials. They cost them only a few words, while the whole burden falls upon the subjects. But owing to the anxiety to procure supplies which the táluka officials feel the office work of the táluka suffers. Of course, the daily routine business is disposed of, but even that is done hastily and inattentively. Hence the tour, instead of facilitating the despatch of the official business, as was originally intended, hinders it. The object of the tour was to promote the convenience of the people, but now it has become a source of annoyance to them, because it is only in the touring season that they are plundered. Now, judging fairly, we are bound to say that the superior officers of Government are ignorant of the malpractices committed by their official subordinates and private servants. Their butlers and cooks charge them for everything though they themselves receive many articles gratis. Thus the officers labour under a misapprehension that for every article used by them money is actually paid. One may say that the táluka officials purposely try to serve the Sahib's office establishment, because they know that they will be useful to them on many occasions, and it is they who examine their records. But this does not explain the cause of the táluka officials supplying provisions to the Sahib's butler, knowing that he, in his turn, charges his master for every article required for his use. But is it not a fact that if the officers are not duly supplied with the provisions, they get hot and hear the complaints of their butlers and cooks to the effect that they cannot get things even on payment, and that so and so does not help them in getting supplies? The Sahib does not even institute an enquiry to ascertain whether his butler's complaint is true or false. Then the táluka official's misfortune begins. Some Sahibs even go a little further. As soon as they arrive at their camp, they ask their butlers and cooks in the presence of the táluka establishments whether they have received all the articles required by them. Have not the members of the táluka establishment, then, reason to serve the Sahib's butlers and cooks and to fear them?

Comments on a letter alleged to have been written by the Collector of Hyderabad (Sind) to those who were absent from the Darbár held at Hyderabad at the time of the visit of His Excellency Lord Harris to that city.

rule. Their chief aim in doing this seems to be to get everything without paying for it. At present, when everything has become dear, such conduct of the officers is likely to produce much discontent.

Remarks in connection with the Honourable Mr. Mackay's speech at St. Andrew's dinner at Calcutta about the duties of Englishmen to India.

22. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 3rd December, gives a small extract from the Honourable Mr. Mackay's speech at St. Andrew's dinner at Calcutta, which, it says, is full of sentiments of love for this country, and observes :—Mr. Mackay tried to impress upon his audience their dutifulness to India for the many good things Englishmen enjoy, whether out here or in England. The question is whether this dutifulness is fully realised. They might remember India as the land that supplies an Englishman and his relatives with so many fat berths, or contributes so much to the competence of so many fortune-seekers, or they might remember India as their pleasure-ground; but is India ever remembered as a country to which they are bound to make a return for all the good things they enjoy? We do not say that all sense of duty is dead; but that the said sense is lukewarm, nay, in many cases almost dead, cannot be denied. Look at the position of the British Colonies; they are not only self-governed, but will allow no British interference. In view of the infantine state of their industries there is protection in them, but we cannot claim as much liberty. Manchester governs us in this matter. The expenditure on the colonial army is borne by England, but though India pays for her own military defence and also contributes towards imperial schemes of defence in Persia, China and even Central Asia, India's sons are denied even the privilege of bearing arms. The Indian tax-payer pays into the treasury krors of rupees, but in its expenditure he has no voice—nay, he must pay more money, if the tax-collector makes a fresh demand. In the matter of legislation the Indian has no representative voice, even if such legislation is to touch his very social status. Thus the contrast is evident, but how many Englishmen (of course, with a very few honourable exceptions) have attempted to improve this condition of things, even partially? We thank Mr. Mackay for his insistance upon the duties of Englishmen to India, but how many Englishmen have remembered and do remember India in the way implied in Mr. Mackay's words?

Remarks against Mr. Macpherson, Judge of the Sadar Court in Sind.

23. A correspondent, writing to the Phœnix (6) in its issue of the 25th November, finds fault with the decisions of Mr. Macpherson, Judge of the Sadar Court in Sind, and concludes as follows :—In short, Mr. Macpherson has been a splendid failure as a Judge of the Sadar Court and has most wonderfully succeeded in giving the greatest dissatisfaction to the public of Sind, who being frightened by his exalted position have been as quiet as lambs. But even to the meekness of Sindhis there is a limit. "The evils of submission," says Macaulay, "are obviously greater than those of resistance. A time comes when fear itself begets a sort of courage and warns others not to presume too far on the liberty of mankind." It, however, must not be forgotten that none of Mr. Macpherson's defects is intentional or known to himself. He is a gentleman of a very good heart and great suavity of manners in private life. His conscientious impartiality is also undoubted. As remarked by you, his weaknesses are constitutional and brought about solely by the wear and tear of service, in which no man could have worked harder or with better intentions. But alas! What have we to do with intentions? It is the net result of one's actions that makes or mars the good of the public. Shrewd people have been suspecting that all the present agitation against the constitution of the Sadar Court is more or less an agitation against Mr. Macpherson's continuance on the bench of that Court. The system is condemned, because if the only Judge provided by it happens to be erratic there is no remedy against the calamity. It is thought that as soon as Sind obtains a satisfactory head to the judicial administration the cry for the reform of the Sadar Court will cease. Therefore Mr. Macpherson will be doing a great favour to the people of Sind if he quietly retired now, and the Government will be doing no less a service to the people by appointing a Judge like Mr. Hosking, for instance. In his notoriously learned judgment in the case of James Grant, Mr. Macpherson told us that he did not enhance the sentence because, among other things, there was no demand for it by the press. Now, besides the many other hints thrown broadcast which Mr. Macpherson may have picked up before this, the press demands that Mr. Macpherson should quit, and, if he is consistent, he should do the bidding without any hesitation. And if the Government cannot provide him with a lucrative berth out of Sind, they can certainly give him pension. But even if that cannot be had, a subscription can be easily started which will be contributed to very cheerfully by a lot of people.

A request to Government in connection with the condition of the famine-stricken in Madras.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—Serious as the condition of the famine-stricken in Madras is, it behoves the Government of that presidency to take time by the forelock and put forth every effort to face an impending calamity. Whatever be the cause of a dead silence with regard to these matters in the Madras papers to hand, it seems that the situation is the most deplorable. That in view of this state of things the Governor of Madras should leave the presidency to enjoy a holiday in Calcutta is an aggravation of the situation that no British constituency would ever tolerate. And that there should be officials and Governors who, in spite of a dreadful visitation in which almost a whole presidency is involved, should make it convenient to enjoy a round of picnics either on the hills or in their presidential palaces, is a matter to be regretted. The reason why the late Duke of Buckingham was so popular in Madras is not far to seek. During the last famine, i.e., in 1877-78, were it not for the Duke's appeal to the British public for pecuniary help in defiance of the Supreme Government's instructions to the contrary, the catastrophe would have been terrible. Be that as it may, the present Supreme Government, in view of the serious nature of the calamity, ought to adopt such measures during this time of pinch as will ward off every danger. Granted that the Native view of the situation, as some may be led to suppose, is a little more exaggerated, surely neither the writers in the Madras Mail nor the Government officials would in any way be interested in bringing popular obloquy on their own superiors. Expenditure on the frontiers may or may not be justifiable, but surely the well-being of a people is of greater value to their Government than the bugbear of a threatened Russian invasion. We have no desire to run down any Government; our only hope is that in the benignity of his heart His Excellency Lord Lansdowne will see his way to adopt adequate measures for the relief of the poor sufferers.

Suggestions to avert the evils of famine in the Sátára District.

25. The Chanddnshu (26), in its issue of the 29th November, says:—The people of several districts are this year on the verge of famine, and the same is the case with the people of Tásgaon, as their crops have almost withered for want of rain. The time for the collection of land assessment is drawing near. The Government should have by this time ascertained through their officers the real condition of the people and taken due measures in that respect. But to our great astonishment the Government do not seem to have done anything to provide for the contingency. We would therefore suggest that relief works should be at once opened, that the collection of land assessment for this year should be postponed to the next year, that special rules should be framed for granting loans to agriculturists and that the sale of the estates of agricultural classes in execution of decrees of civil courts should be put off for one year. We pray, therefore, His Excellency Lord Harris will take timely notice of the matter.

A request to Government to stop the export of corn from the Bijápur District.

26. The Sári Siddheshvar (143), in its issue of the 26th November, while writing on the famine in the Bijápur District, says:—India is allowed to export corn in very large quantities even when she is suffering from a terrible famine: while Russia has taken good care to prohibit the export of food grains on account of the drought that has visited that country. The export of corn has added greatly to the miseries of the famine-stricken people of the Bijápur District. The prices of all kinds of eatables have gone up and consequently the death-rate has risen so high that some villages have been nearly depopulated.

27. The Rámdás (17), in its issue of the 28th November, writes :—In the present famine in the Bijápur District cattle are getting lean and sickly owing to the great dearth of forage. They are offered for sale in the market at Bijápur at unusually low prices. Butchers purchase them on a large scale, and the slaughter-houses are being over-stocked with these unfortunate creatures. We think that the flesh of such animals is unwholesome. There is the probability of a contagious disease breaking out from a supply of bad meat. We therefore hope that the Collector and the Civil Surgeon of the district will, in time, take precautionary measures for the prevention of such a contingency, by putting a stop to the sale of such cattle for the slaughter-house. We also hope that they will pass an order to the effect that butchers, before they slaughter cattle, should have them inspected by the proper authorities.

A request to the District Collector and the Civil Surgeon of Bijápur to prevent the slaughter of emaciated and sickly cattle.

28. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 3rd December, writes :—Our readers, perhaps, have not forgotten Shriman Swámi, and his advocacy of the preservation of horned cattle in this country. To what straits Indian agriculture was reduced during the dire visitation of 1877-78, and how poor and helpless agriculturists had to yoke themselves to their ploughs for want of cattle, is pretty well known now. The famine of 1877-78 is now only a matter of history, but the very same difficulties that put the agriculturist on his mettle then, are likely to stare him again in the face, and both himself and the Government had better do something for the preservation and even the improvement of his cattle. With increasing agriculture and the necessity of cattle for the rations of European soldiers, the prices of the latter have gone up considerably and the poor cultivator often finds it beyond his means to purchase good, healthy cattle for the purpose of agriculture. The beef-eater may laugh at the idea as being out of the pale of practical politics, and ask Government to give no heed to the claims of the agriculturist, but a sensible Government that knows too well the principal source of its revenue, cannot lightly pass over the claims of the husbandman. The Secretary to the Gorakshani Sabha has just sent to Government a representation re-iterating these claims. The improvement of the breed means the extension of grazing grounds, but under the existing forest laws, what is generally known as Gdirds has almost disappeared, and thus the means of subsistence for cattle has been considerably narrowed. We believe he is perfectly justified in his contention that large grants of pasture grounds must be allowed to improve the breed.

A request to Government in connection with the preservation and improvement of the breed of horned cattle.

29. The Gujarátí (85), in its issue of the 29th November, writes :—Government could not have appointed a more worthy and capable gentleman to serve on the Board of Trustees of the Port of Bombay during the absence of Mr. Varjivandás Mádhavdás than Mr. Vijbhukandás Átmárám. He is one of the distinguished partners in the firm of Messrs. Nárandás Rájárám and Company. Mr. Nárandás is well-known for his high character, honesty and probity and his great commercial aptitude; and it is only his modesty and unassuming manners that prevent him from taking part in public affairs. The firm to which these two gentlemen belong is among the three foremost which export cotton and seeds to Europe, and has made a name for itself in the commercial world of Bombay. It is, therefore, gratifying to find that Government have used their discretion on the present occasion to the entire satisfaction of the public. Mr. Vijbhukandás is widely known as a very capable man of high character, and has always actively sympathised with the latter-day social and political movements. It is a source of genuine pleasure to us to find an earnest desire on the part of Mr. Vijbhukandás to devote his talents and energy to public life, and his present appointment will, it is hoped, be a stepping stone to higher honours and distinctions.

Approval of the appointment of Mr. Vijbhukandás Átmárám on the Board of Trustees of the Port of Bombay.

30. The Gujarát Darpan (84), in its issue of the 29th November, disapproves of the intention of the Bombay Government to send for a short time the District Judge of Surat to assist the District Judge of Ahmedabad, says that the arrangement will put the litigants at Surat to great inconvenience, and adds that a number of cases in connection with the Baila Mill which has gone into liquidation have remained undisposed of for the last four years, and that the creditors of the mill are put to much pecuniary loss thereby.

The intention of the Bombay Government to send the District Judge of Surat to Ahmedabad to assist the District Judge there disapproved.

31. The Hitechchhu (87) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 3rd December observes:—The potters at Ahmedabad have discontinued to sell bricks and pottery to people since the last week owing to the order issued by the Collector of that district to levy a fee of Rs. 1,000 per acre of the land from which they remove earth. The potters are entitled to use earth without extra fees in accordance with Rule 71 of the Revenue Code. This strike of the potters has put the residents of that city to great inconvenience. The bricklayers and some labourers have been thrown out of employment. Some of the potters sent in a petition to the Collector in this connection in August last, but the matter has not been finally disposed of as yet. That officer and his assistants are absent from the city at a time like this, when their presence is badly required, while the Talátis are pressing the potters to pay the extra fee. The land from which earth is removed by potters does not become useless for agricultural purposes, because they deposit on it refuse and other matter which in time serves as a good manure, and the Government does not suffer any loss as the potters have to go on paying Government the fixed rate of assessment until they restore the land to its original condition. Owing to their poverty and ignorance the potters have resorted to the extreme step of stopping all sales of pottery. It is reported that the authorities have reduced the fee from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 250 per acre in order to induce them to resume work; but, we fear, the object of the authorities in making this reduction is simply to increase the revenues by illegal and oppressive means. We also recommend the people of Ahmedabad to send a memorial to Government on the subject, as otherwise the prices of earthenware will be considerably enhanced. [The Ahmedabad Times (93), in its issue of the 2nd December, expresses similar sentiments and adds that the local municipality is said to have resolved to serve notices on potters having even small kilns within city limits to remove them outside the town, and that the people believe that the municipality has taken this step in order to compel the potters to purchase lands at heavy prices.]

Potters' strike at Ahmedabad.

32. While severely criticising the conduct of the police with regard to the Antroli robbery case, during the investigation of which the police are alleged to have caused by violence the death of one Subráya Shetti, suspected of having been concerned in the robbery, while he was in their custody, the Kanara Vritt (47), in its issue of the 26th November, observes:—It is impossible to reconcile the statements of the police with the facts discovered by the evidence adduced by the complainant before the Magistrate. The police say that they released the deceased as soon as they found him innocent. It is true that they set him free; but how could they consistently with the law release him without placing him before a Magistrate? The Mámlatdár, who was ordered to report on the case, took great pains to collect sufficient evidence to arrive at the truth, but he found great difficulty in doing so for various reasons, one of which was that the policemen suspected of causing the death were not suspended and that the time allowed to the Mámlatdár for submitting his report was limited. Government should, in the interests of justice, try to find out the persons who caused the death of poor Subráya Shetti.

Remarks in connection with the enquiry of a serious charge against the police of Kanara in the Kánara District.

33. A correspondent, writing to the Prabhát (161), in its issue of the 14th November, says:—The recent alterations in the time table for the working of trains on the Sind-Panjab Railway has inflicted great hardship on the people of the Naushahro division. The post received for that division from the Panjáb side is detained one day at

PART II.—Education.

Alleged irregularities in some of the recent examinations of the Bombay University.

34. The Gujaráti (85), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—This year students are rightly complaining of the stiffness of the Gujaráti passage set for translation in the English paper. The absence of any uniform standard from year to year in drawing up question papers is strikingly illustrated by a cursory comparison of the passage set last year with the one of which the candidates are now bitterly complaining. The Gujaráti passage this year consists of 18 lines and carries 30 marks, while last year 25 marks were assigned for translating 6 lines only. The monstrous disparity in standard becomes more apparent when it is remembered that the passage set at the last Matriculation is more fitted to test the knowledge of students appearing for the higher University examinations. The question, therefore, naturally arises, who is to be held responsible for the consequences of such eccentric vagaries on the part of examiners? The rule generally followed is to ask the Gujaráti examiner to select a suitable passage and give it to the English examiners with a standard translation of the same. It is confidently reported that the Gujaráti examiner had nothing to do with the selection of the passage set for translation and that the one he had selected was ignored for reasons best known to the gentleman who is said to have adopted such a high-handed procedure. We submit that this procedure is highly irregular, and if a student could be found courageous enough to question its validity in a court of law we are inclined to think the examination will have to be quashed. There is also a report that the English paper was not drawn up after due consultation among the several examiners. If this report be correct, we think the Syndicate ought to enquire into the matter. When specific regulations are laid down upon the subject, and if examiners are to disregard them with impunity, it is useless to prescribe any rules or even to hold examinations only to worry and harass innocent students. There are also complaints about the M.A. Examination. Rumour says that the Sanskrit papers were drawn up by one examiner only, and that, too, at the eleventh hour, because his colleague was not in Bombay. If this report be well-founded, we believe it is time for the Syndicate to be up and doing their duty. The public are not quite satisfied with the way in which the affairs of the University are being administered, and the recent instances of irregularity which are now being strongly commented upon both in public as well as in private cannot increase the prestige and popularity of our University. The Syndicate is a body of busy and sufficiently hard-worked gentlemen, and it is now beyond dispute that it is from the very nature of things incapable of supervising the details of administration on account of the multiplicity of duties that devolve upon them. What is required is specialization of functions and division of labour, and we think the only way to improve matters is the appointment of a Board for supervising examiners. The necessity of such an institution is being increasingly felt as years roll on, and it is to be hoped the University Examinations Committee will be able to suggest, and the Senate to carry out, the needed reforms before the next twelve months are over.

Suggested removal of the Poona High School from the city to the camp and the future disposal of the Vishrimbág Palace.

35. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 3rd December, writes:—We understand that a deputation of influential gentlemen of the camp at Poona waited upon Sir Dinshaw Manekji Petit, Bart., on the 29th ultimo and requested him to assist them in erecting a new building for the local Government High School in some central position convenient alike to students from the city and the camp. Sir Dinshaw with his usual generosity promised his assistance, but advised the deputation to ascertain the wishes of Government in the matter. We consider that the proposed removal of the institution from its present habitation is, from a practical point of view, unnecessary, as the percentage of students from the camp is, we believe, very small, and because the parents of such as attend the High School are comparatively well-to-do people. If Government accede to the wishes of the deputation there arises the question as to the future disposal of the Vishrámbág Palace. If the palace is utilized for other than educational purposes, those who contributed towards the restoration of the building have a right to expect a grant from Government, either in excess of or equal to the sum subscribed by the public, either towards the proposed new building or to any other similar public institution.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Remarks in connection with Government interference with local self-government bodies in the matter of taxation.

36. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—Local self-government in Gujarát does not seem to flourish well under new influences. The public has been assured by His Excellency Lord Harris that the house-tax is one of the most harmless of taxes, and that all municipalities should adopt it in place of octroi duties. His Lordship is obviously of opinion that the house-tax does not press so much upon the people as the octroi; but the prevalent belief is that, of the two, the octroi alone is the less oppressive. Perhaps His Excellency thinks that the house-owners do not realise in their turn from their tenants what they actually pay to the municipality in the shape of the house-tax, but such a view, if held, is a mistake. Hitherto our belief has been that the bludgeon clauses even in the District Municipal Act were to be employed only when a municipality failed to carry out requisite works of sanitation, and the preference or otherwise of one kind of taxation over the other was a matter to be entirely left to the discretion of a corporation. But in this, experience is contrary to our wishes; indeed, every kind of taxation in a mofussil municipal unit may require the sanction of the Government, but the point must be conceded that a municipality knows what kind of taxation would suit its circumstances better than outsiders. This side of the question has not, it seems, been taken into account, and certain legal quibbles have been allowed to ride roughshod through the wishes and desires of the people. However, if the execution of Government decrees were to be the measure of the efficiency of municipal government, then one may safely say that all self-government is a mere mockery. We think where a municipality might fail in carrying out requisite sanitary works, there alone the bludgeon clauses should be put into force. The view Government seems to take of the matter is, however, disappointing, and no great hope may be entertained of local self-government in our midst being allowed an untrammelled existence. The object of local self-government was relief to officials from the pressure of official work, but from the sort of existence this tender plant is allowed, it is clear that the view of Lord Ripon did not and does not find much favour with the official world.

The alleged unfavourable attitude of His Excellency Lord Harris towards local self-government.

37. The Kesari (44), in its issue of the 1st December, thinks that the policy of His Excellency Lord Harris is not very favourable to local self-government, as is shown by the conduct of Government towards the Poona Municipality, by the recent appointment of an official President to the Sholápur Municipality, and by the still recent supersession of the Dhandhuka Municipality for one year.

Remarks in connection with the conduct of the Bombay Government towards the Dhandhuka Municipality.

38. The Jám-e-Jamshed (88), in its issue of the 30th November, writes:—There is a great deal to be said in favour of handing over Indian municipalities to Government. The long experience which many towns have had of local self-government is neither cheerful nor satisfactory, and will never be either the one or the other. We therefore take this opportunity to congratulate the people of Dhandhuka, municipal commissioners and all, on getting themselves out of a troublesome position. Let Government manage the municipality by all means and let them work Section 43 of Bombay Act II of 1884. Municipal commissioners have been only buffers for forcing up municipal taxation in too many cases, beyond the reasonable power of the tax-payers to contribute. The Government theory at present is that the poor should be provided with everything free. Hence they are absolved from taxation on food supplies which are consumed in the town, and are expected to receive free water, free conservancy and free medicines. A beautiful theory, indeed, but where are the rich who are to supply all these essentials of life for nothing? The people consist only of different gradations of poverty, and Government are their best municipal rulers. Self-government be blowed! So long as Government retain the power of posing as municipal critics, so long will ridiculous notifications such as that which has been levelled at Dhandhuka be published. But let the order of things be reversed; let Government lay on taxation and perform the executive duties, and let the people who are being municipalized be the critics. Then and then only will we find any really useful municipal government in the country.

Remarks on the supersession of the Dhandhuka Municipality.

39. The same newspaper, while writing on the supersession of the Dhandhuka Municipality by the appointment of an Assistant Collector of Ahmedabad for one year, observes:—Under the supervision of the Assistant Collector the working of the municipal board has been entrusted to the Táluka Mámlatdár; but this officer has various duties to perform and has also to travel all over the táluka at times. It is very doubtful whether the municipal work will give satisfaction at all in these circumstances. By such an arrangement the municipality is not likely to derive any benefits, nor will it learn the lesson which Government want to teach it. In short, it is quite possible that even under the new arrangement the people of Dhandhuka will have ample ground for complaining against the management of the municipality.

40. The Kdsid-e-Mumbai (112), in its issue of the 30th November, approves of the recent Government Resolution regarding the suspension of the Dhandhuka Municipality, saying that many of the municipal commissioners are against the house-tax and the abolition of the octroi duties and have no sympathy for the poor, but they seem to forget that the abolition of the octroi duties will do some good to them. The Kdsid adds that several municipalities in Gujarát have failed to carry out the noble objects of Lord Ripon in conferring the boon of local self-government.

Part IV.—Native States.

Proclamation of Government withdrawing the powers of the Chief of Jat and remarks thereon.

41. The Bodh Sudhdhar (2), in its issue of the 2nd December, says that the wording of the proclamation published by Government withdrawing powers of administration from the Chief of Jat is ambiguous, and conveys a meaning that the Chief has also lost proprietary right in the State, that at last the public will have to submit quietly to the opinion of Government taking the wording in this latter sense, that the Chief will never receive back either his powers or his State during his lifetime, and that therefore all those interested in the welfare of the State should get the ambiguity cleared by the Government. The paper further advises the Chief not to attempt to regain his lost status and waste funds, but to appoint an heir to the State.

Remarks in connection with the festivities held at Indore in honour of His Excellency the Viceroy.

1. The Varhád (Berár) Samáchár (3), in its issue of the 30th November, refers to the recent festivities held at Indore in honour of His Excellency the Viceroy, and remarks :—As a representative of Her Majesty the Queen no guest of our Native Princes is higher in rank than His Excellency the Viceroy. The large amount of money spent on his recent reception may secure his permanent good-will towards the State. If it did not lay us open to the charge of disloyalty, we would say that if half of the amount spent at Indore and other Native States on feasts in honour of His Excellency the Viceroy had been spent in giving relief to the famine-stricken people in the Madras Presidency, the Native Princes, the Viceroy and other officers would have earned the blessings of God. But who can say this and act accordingly?

Disapproval of a circular order issued by the Commissioner in Berár about preference to be given to the sons of Government servants in giving employment.

2. The Vaidarbhá (2), in its issue of the 28th November, disapproves of the circular order issued by the Commissioner in Berár that in employing men in Government service preference should be given to the sons of Government servants when the merits of the candidates are found equal, saying that recommendations, which already play a great part in filling up Government posts, will now be given more weight to under this circular, and that the province will not be benefited by it, as it is feared that the qualifications of candidates will hereafter be ignored on the strength of this circular, although the circular itself does not expressly authorize such a course.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

Remarks on some of Lord Cross's recent utterances at Hanley.

1. In noticing the address on India recently delivered by Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, before an assembly at Hanley, the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 11th December, remarks:—The three open declarations in the address are "old as the hills," and have been repeated so often, both inside and outside the House of Commons, that familiarity with these official sentiments causes them now to fall on, and fall off, the public ear, like water on a duck's back. The first declaration is that "justice was the great keystone of the British policy in India." There is a foundation of truth to this statement, and it was meant to be gratifying to the ears of the audience. They liked it, it tickled them, and elevated their moral consciousness. It left them thinking what a lucky find it was for the Government to pick up the front-door great keystone of justice, when the chances were that the back-door keystone of injustice might have been discovered. Lord Cross is himself the depository of this "great keystone" justice; but, perhaps, he would like to leave out a goodly slice of the home charges, the whole of the cotton dues, and a moiety of the expense of the frontier and its defences! Perhaps, Lord Cross will contend that these small matters of account are mere matters of opinion and have nothing to do with justice. Unfortunately, such small accounts as a few millions a year cannot be referred to a professional actuary to ascertain the proper person to bear the burden. The tribunal that decides these matters has a beneficiary interest in the decision; and it is here that the great keystone comes in as the emblem of justice. The people of Hanley were not prepared to put questions to a Secretary of State, and as they were good Englishmen they evinced better manners than ask either pertinent or impertinent questions. Notwithstanding pay and pension and other international financial spots on the sun do not come in to cause two opinions to spring up, there is probably more justice in India than in any other country under foreign rule, excepting, perhaps, Egypt, where cormorants have been driven off and their places supplied by honest men, and the revenue is carefully conserved by a Baring. The second declaration of Lord Cross is that "further aggrandizement was not wished for." This is a sentiment which first found vent about the beginning of the present century. But if any map-reader will secure a map of British India as it existed in 1820 and compare it with the map of 1891, the red line of conquest or annexation will be found to have undergone a most remarkable expansion. There appears to be no such thing as demarcation in a national sense. The present boundary line of British India embraces territory which at the beginning of the century was known only to intrepid travellers. Burmah is the last great annexation. The "aggrandizement" was almost more than Lord Dufferin could swallow. He looked at Burmah and then at France alternately for about six months. He felt then, as Lord Cross feels now, that he wanted no "further aggrandizement," but there was Burmah, a toothsome bone, lying on the ground before a French Poodle and a British Bull, and with a growl and a spring Lord Dufferin walked off with it just to prevent further contention. The most unsafe political prophecy is that which declares that "further aggrandizement" is not wished for. There are Germany, England, France and Portugal busily employed in Africa, with what? Are they declaring themselves surfeited with aggrandizement, or are they all on the political prowl, trying to pick up all they can? The cynics of the European nations have invested these African explorers with the name of "Earth Hungerers," and they do not seem to resent the name. Their intentions are their justification, for, are they not going to open out equatorial Africa and civilize a nation of savages? This is another great keystone of the policy of justice—a very great keystone, we should say. In view of the political fact that British India is much too big to be managed, is Lord Cross perfectly sincere that "further aggrandizement is not wished for"? We are putting a Native Infantry Regiment into Hongkong, but that does not mean that Lord Cross intends to annex that province. He does not wish the aggrandizement, but when Chinese subjects and British bayonets are brought within electric distance, an accidental discharge—purely accidental—may occur. The assurance of Lord Cross that Government wished for no further aggrandizement may be read as indicating that while the British Government will not make voluntary efforts to aggrandize they cannot resist the involuntary, and be compelled to swallow more than they want, as Lord Dufferin did. Lord Dalhousie kept the red ink bottle always ready for use on his desk, and he used it pretty freely to extend the boundary of British India, but it is probable that, like Lord Cross, he devoutly declared that he too wished no further aggrandizement. The third declaration of Lord Cross is that "Government desire to maintain the closest friendship with Native States." This assurance may be accepted. Is there not good reason why this assurance should be given? All the existing States are feudal States, advised, if not watched, by British Residents. The internal policy of all the States is being recast in purely British Indian moulds. Perhaps, this is reasonable and was to be expected. These States are losing their oriental feature and are fast becoming practically British States. They are no longer a weakness to the Empire, while unitedly they are becoming a tower of strength. The sword of every Rája is stamped with fealty to the British throne, and will never be drawn except in defence of the ruler of Hindustán.

Disapproval of the praises sung by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne of Lord Dufferin's Indian administration at the unveiling of the statue of the latter.

2. In noticing the graceful tribute paid by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne to the services of the Marquis of Dufferin at the ceremony of unveiling the statue of the latter at Calcutta, the Hombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 11th December, says:—His Excellency remarked that Lord Dufferin achieved success in strengthening the North-West frontier and in ridding the eastern boundary of the Indian Empire of the danger that overhung it, by the conquest of Burmah, but this statement is not correct. Under the plea of the defence of the North-West frontier the plan of depriving the Mahárája of Kashmere of his authority was formed by Lord Dufferin, and it was very unfortunate that Lord Lansdowne's administration, that had to carry out this plan, had to bear the brunt of popular displeasure. However, of late some scant justice has been done to the Mahárája. Lord Dufferin's other acts for the defence of the frontier have also proved worthless. Credit is given to the late Viceroy for securing the friendship of the Amir of Afghanistan, but Abdul Rahman is said to be displeased with the British Government and to be anxious to enter into a commercial treaty with Russia. Thus Lord Dufferin's policy as regards the Amir has proved abortive, and a similar result has followed the vast expenditure of money upon the frontier defences and the new military posts occupied in the north beyond Kashmere, and, as Lord Lansdowne has observed, the dangers of war and insolvency stare India in the face. The occupation of these posts has had little effect on the Russians, who have made progress in the Pamirs and other countries. The conquest of Burmah has proved a costly affair, without giving substantial benefits in return for the trouble. The French are trying to occupy Siam and it will be difficult to dissuade them from doing so. There is not a single act of Lord Dufferin's administration that could be credited with having conferred substantial benefit on the country. [The Jám-e-Jamshed (86) of the 12th December expresses similar sentiments.]

Suggestions to Government with a view to keep the people of India contented.

3. The A'rydvart (22), in its issue of the 5th December, says that if Government are convinced that the safety of the rulers depends on the rayats' contentment and allegiance, they should cease charging any fees for dispensing justice, and should collect the income-tax from the rich and intelligent classes and exempt all illiterate people from its incidence.

Alleged greed of Europeans for money and their attempts to get it.

4. The Jagaddárak (39), in its issue of the 6th December, observes:—Whenever Europeans discover a new source of money they do not lack the necessary means or devices to come by it. Moreover, they are fully convinced of the inability of the barbarous and rude people of India to see through their designs. They take shelter under the principles of political economy whenever other pleas fail them. But these principles are applied to India alone and not to England, for in the welfare of India they are more interested than the people of India themselves are. The rule that forbids the imposition of import duties on foreign commodities as prejudicial to the principles of free trade and the interests of the country, is held good in the case of India, but not in that of England. What can be at the bottom of all this? What else can it be save their thirst for money? Government preached abolition of transit duties to our Native States, which hesitated at first, but were afterwards made by political authorities to yield to the advice. And when the Native States discovered ere long the mistake which caused them a great loss to their revenues, they thought of reimbursing the loss by establishing municipalities. Our kind Government now advises municipal corporations to levy direct taxes in preference to indirect dues, for example, to levy a house-tax and similar other taxes but not to impose duties upon goods. What is then the motive of Government in inducing municipalities to levy direct taxes only, while indirect taxation prevails in England? None other than to rob us of our money. The Natives are aware of their loss in this matter, which has caused much discontent among them.

Remarks in connection with the circular letter addressed by Mr. Hume to the several standing committees of the Indian National Congress about the ensuing Congress to be held at Nágpur.

5. The Mahrátta (5), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—Mr. Hume in his circular letter about the Nágpur Congress seems to suggest that the Indian business of the Congress in India should be wound up and business should be opened in England. It is suggested that most of the Indian work has been accomplished and what remains to be done is work in England. From the time the idea of closing Indian work was suggested for the first time we have opposed it and we oppose it still. We have held that if a choice lies between giving up Indian work and taking up English work, we would rather postpone the latter than give up the former. The first point requiring our earnest attention is whether the annual sittings of the Congress should now be discontinued. Our opinion on this point is that they should not be discontinued. The next point is whether the Congress, in its contemplated constitution and expressed aims and objects, is a league started for a special purpose and to continue to exist until that purpose is gained. We know that it is no league and cannot and ought not to cease to live at any time. The third point is whether the work of the Congress is in its nature terminable or will it be perpetual? Our reply to this question is that the work is not terminable but perpetual. These being our views about the Congress movement, we very naturally, but respectfully, protest against what Mr. Hume says about the work of the Congress in the circular letter published. We feel sure we shall be only expressing the sense of the whole nation, if we say that the Congress work is only just beginning. The Congress was not an attempt at formulating our demands, nor was it any effort to supply any common platform. Our demands were already formulated; the educated classes had already a common platform. The grand demonstration we made in the Bombay Town-hall before Lord Ripon was our first Congress. It was more voluntary, more representative, more imposing, than any one of our gatherings. Another such gathering or any annual gathering like that is the goal of our ambition. At our Congress we not only want to have the accredited and responsible representatives of the people, but we want Princes and Chiefs and we want the responsible representatives of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress and the English nation. We want the rulers and the ruled through their representatives to talk to each other and settle administrative problems. We want to combine in the assembly the interests of both the governors and the governed. The work of the Congress will be achieved only when we have such a Congress and not before. British rule in India is a marvel of political achievements, and educated India will not feel satisfied until under the British rule it developes India into a nation enjoying the fullest benefits of self-government. In other words, we do hope to find out a constitution for our Government in which our foreign rulers will have as important a share as the people of the land themselves. The Indian National Congress will have its work done when this goal is reached, and not before. We have not the remotest doubt that we are capable of such a developement, and we are, therefore, not prepared to give up our noble work. Difficulties will and must come in, but we must be determined upon overcoming them. The history of political activities distinctly points in this direction, and Mr. Hume's circular letter contains freshest evidence on the point. Until very recently Mr. Hume had to spend full twelve months in getting through the Congress business of the previous year and arranging for the next. We learnt the work under him and in the circular under reference he speaks of our work. What are the difficulties which Mr. Hume anticipates? The first difficulty is that of money, the second difficulty is about his presence, and the third, which he does not refer to but one which he is not unmindful of, is that of keeping the Congress work on loyal and constitutional lines. These are formidable difficulties, but not insurmountable. On the testimony of Mr. Hume himself we have been spending out, on an average, a lakh and half rupees every year. No Congress has failed and no Congress will ever fail for want of funds. We know there is some complaint about these recurring heavy burdens. It is pointed out that if the Congress be located in some central city a good round sum of fifty thousand can be saved in buildings, furniture, sheds, &c. It is also known that the delegates would very gladly bear their feeding charges. Thus there is room to save, and a committee of the Congress can very well suggest how the expenses can be brought down to a minimum. There is then the difficulty of finding out money for the Indian Agency in England. This is a matter separate by itself, and we think it is quite possible to raise a fund out of the interest of which the Indian Agency in England can be decently maintained. Government makes us find out money for costly wars, and inasmuch as our field is as wide as that of Government, there ought to be no difficulty in establishing a Grievance Insurance Fund. The second difficulty is about the personal presence of Mr. Hume. This difficulty ought not to be underrated. But we think it would be to our lasting shame if we gave up the movement because we could not find a worthy successor to Mr. Hume. Are we reduced to such a helpless condition? Has not the whole empire one man to spare? Where are our Bannerjis? Where are our Iyers, Iyengars and our A'cháryas? Where are our Ayodhyánáths, Mehtás and Badrudins, our Deccan Brahmans? Have they all left the land? Have they sold themselves to their private interests? Is the Brahman spirit of self-sacrifice so dead that the Deccan cannot put forth one capacious Brahman patriot to take up the work? No, they are not gone. The Brahman spirit of sacrifice is not dead. We hope that even if other provinces plead helplessness the Deccan at least will not, and men will be found here ready and willing to step into the shoes of our worthy Hume Rishi. The third difficulty is not at all great. In everything we do we have always been loyal, and we have learnt to be constitutional. There is not a single officer of Government or Anglo-Indian organ that has ever been able to stigmatize any of our public movements with disloyalty or unconstitutionalism. None need be afraid of that.

Proposed meeting of the Indian National Congress in England in the year 1893 and remarks thereon.

6. A correspondent, writing to the Bodh Sudhákar (9) in its issue of the 9th December, disapproves of Mr. Digby's suggestion not to hold a meeting of the Congress in India in the year 1892 and to apply the funds collected for it to defrayal of the expenses of the Congress to be held in England in the year 1893, saying that the people of India, unlike other civilized nations, require to be often reminded of their duty, and that if they once lose sight of the Congress agitation in India for the year 1892 it will be very difficult to collect funds from them for the Congress proposed to be held in England in the year 1893, and that therefore the meeting of the Congress for the year 1892 should be held in India; some people already entertain misgivings about the success of the Congress movement on account of the tantalising policy of Government and the increasing public grievances. The correspondent adds that if the movement be persistently carried on for about ten years more the people will begin to appreciate its real worth, and the Government also will on their part not refuse any more to concede their demands.

Alleged apathy of the people of India towards the Indian National Congress, and its cause.

7. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 6th December, says:—Much apathy is exhibited this year throughout India towards the Indian National Congress. It is said that a serpent never fails to seek an opportunity of taking revenge for the injury done to it by a person who accidentally treads upon its tail. If such is the case with a reptile, how will the people be ever pleased with a Government which has inflicted a serious wound on their tender feelings by passing the Age of Consent Act, and with the reformers and the Secretary of the Congress who supported the Government in passing that Act? The dislike for the three individualities will never be removed from the mind of the present generation.

A public meeting held at Poona to elect delegates for the forthcoming Indian National Congress.

8. The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 10th December, says that the large public meeting held recently in Hirábág at Poona under the presidency of Ráo Bahádur Vásudev Bápuji Kánitkar to elect delegates for the ensuing Indian National Congress, conclusively proves that whatever differences of opinion and quarrels may exist among the people of Poona they are perfectly united in political matters affecting the whole of India, that after a long discussion on the circular letter recently addressed by Mr. Hume to different standing committees of the Congress, it was unanimously resolved in the meeting to inform the Congress that its meetings should be held in India every year and not postponed for a few years as desired by Mr. Hume, and that the proceedings of the meeting were brought to a close after electing about 40 delegates for the coming Congress and giving cheers for Her Majesty the Queen. The Dnyán Prakásh thanks Messrs. Tilak, Námjoshi and V. V. Lele, the promoters of the meeting, for the satisfactory manner in which the business of the meeting was conducted.

Advice to people to forget Lord Lytton's many evil deeds, now that he is dead, and remember him for his two meritorious acts.

9. The same newspaper says:—That no one should have mentioned the good acts of Lord Lytton while noticing his death shows how he is remembered by the people in India. Man should, however, be charitable enough to appreciate the merits of his opponent even though he be his worst enemy. Almost the whole of Lord Lytton's administration was full of faults, but still there were one or two good deeds which should never be forgotten. It was he who protested against the reduction in the Civil Service age limit, and he was so outspoken on this point that it took people by surprise. Another meritorious act of his was that he interfered with the authority of the High Court in the case of Fuller, who had committed a murder and was unjustly let off by the High Court with a fine of Rs. 30. Some people blame His Lordship for his having meddled with the authority of a tribunal which is independent of Government, but had he not done so and enhanced the sentence justice would have failed to do its duty. Both these acts are uncommonly good, but they were outweighed by his bad deeds and were therefore naturally forgotten. None should speak evil of the dead, and so let us forget the evil deeds of Lord Lytton and remember him for the abovementioned two good acts.

Remarks in connection with the appointment of Mr. Subramania Iyer as an Acting Judge of the Madras High Court.

10. The Sárí Shivdjí (66), in its issue of the 4th December, says:—Mr. Subramania Iyer can hardly be blamed for preferring the honour of an acting appointment on the Madras High Court bench to that of the President of the ensuing Indian National Congress; for, scarcely one Native gentleman will be found throughout the whole of India who will not care for a reward from Government. Hundreds of well-to-do Natives have until now become enemies to the interests of the people simply for the sake of empty titles from Government. Men like Mr. Iyer will not altogether forget their duty to the people even though they may enter Government service. So long as Government hold out money inducements and succeed in turning away the minds of educated Natives from movements intended for public good, India cannot be expected to make much political progress.

Remarks in connection with the Land Indebtedness Commission appointed by the Government of India.

11. While writing about the Land Indebtedness Commission, the Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 6th December, observes:—We have little faith in the utility of commissions. We have had ample experience of Indian commissions by this time. Not only have they utterly failed in their object, but have generally done more harm than good to the interests concerned. Facts and figures have been collected at a heavy cost of time and money, prejudicial to the best interests. We are grieved to state that it has become a fashionable vice with the Supreme Government to consider, like quacks, the institution of a commission a sovereign and universal remedy for all complaints and ailments. The practical results of past commissions were quite incommensurate with the gigantic labours they entailed. The unsuspecting Mahomedan Association of Karáchi approached His Excellency Lord Harris, on the occasion of his recent visit to that town, with a prayer that a commission might be appointed to enquire into the indebtedness of the landed nobility of Sind and His Excellency himself confessed in his reply the futility of all commissions. He said: "There are people who are inclined to think that a commission is a panacea for every grievance. But I think if you were to study the results of commissions, you would find that as a rule the outcome is disproportionate to the expectations. Undoubtedly, a vast amount of interesting tradition is unearthed and placed on record, but the practical results of commissions are, as a rule, incommensurate with the labours they entail." This was said by His Excellency the Governor of Bombay on the 8th of November last, and on the 20th of the same month the fiat was issued by the Government of India appointing a commission for the very purpose! Commissions have been now too often tried and found wanting. The best thing we can say of one is, in the words His Excellency the Viceroy used at the recent St. Andrew's dinner, neither an "appropriate" nor a "consistent" remedy. It is a most "fanciful" and "orthodox" treatment to which the question can be submitted. It evades a real complaint, and is a sorry makeshift for allaying the public cry. The Government of India is trying an original method of performing the play of Hamlet, omitting the hero of the drama. Such a practice is not novel now; we have grown too familiar with it by this time. The Supreme Government has not thought it fit in its perfect sapience to put even a couple of Native unofficial members on a commission appointed with the proclaimed object of removing Native hardships and Native complaints. The Native public will never have the least confidence in the results of a commission in which Native members are conspicuous by their absence. All such enquiries, though they may result in all the plenitude of figures and facts, must prove abortive. An investigation in which a judicial member was not associated has been declared to have been partial, but we think that one in which the Native element is not sufficiently represented is not only a nullity but a magnificent and extravagant farce. There is, however, some satisfaction to find that experts like Ráo Bahádur Krishnáji Lakshman Nulkar, Mr. Stephen Hammick, and Mr. Lely, the popular Collector of Surat, have been now appointed on the Commission at the recommendation of the Bombay Government. These gentlemen possess a special local knowledge of the agricultural districts, and their advice and help will be of no little value to their colleagues. The prayer of the Poona Sárvajanik Sabha that both the sáwkár and the rayat should be represented on the Commission was, we think, simply absurd. The Commission is called upon to institute the enquiry with an open mind, and the very thing we ought to deplore is that the Commissioners should have any particular pre-notion, inclination or bias.

12. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 7th December, says:—In giving the history of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act the Government of India has given much importance to the minutes of officers who were favourable to it, while it has tried to lessen the importance of the minute written by the Honourable Sir Raymond West, who is not only against it but is for its total abolition. While enquiring into the working of the Act the Commission which has recently been appointed should not fail to take the evidence of Sir Raymond and others of his opinion, and of those sáwkárs and agriculturists who have been either benefited or ruined by its operation. It seems that Government intend to benefit the agriculturists at the expense of the sáwkárs, without in any way allowing their own interests to suffer. Besides, the sympathy which they show for the depressed condition of the agriculturists is not shown by them to people following other avocations.

Disapproval of the constitution of the Land Indebtedness Commission.

13. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—The names of all the members on the Commission which is to enquire into the indebtedness of the agricultural rayat have been published. We cannot say we are satisfied with its constitution. It is not a little surprising that a Commission which is to investigate the present state of the relations between the sáwkárs and their debtors has not amongst its members a sufficient number of experienced representatives of the community most directly concerned. The Honourable Mr. Krishnáji Lakshman Nulkar is undoubtedly an able, cool-headed and independent gentleman, and his presence on the Commission is a guarantee that the views of the people in the Deccan will be duly considered before its report is finally drawn up. We only hope the health of the honourable gentleman will be equal to the demands made upon it by the enquiry. Though we are not very hopeful about the results of the labours of the Commission, we are prepared to wait for the present.

Remarks on the Bombay nominations on the Land Indebtedness Commission.

14. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—The Bombay nominations on the Land Indebtedness Commission are quite unexceptionable. Ráo Bahádur K. L. Nulkar is the very best Native representative that could be put on the Commission. His is precisely the first name that occurs to one's mind when thinking of an eligible representative of Native interests in such popular enquiries. To get two Native members was, we had foretold, impossible; but in the absence of a Native representative of Gujarát Mr. Lely is a very eligible man to choose. He has been connected with Gujarát during nearly the whole of his service, and as a district officer of broad sympathies and independence of character he has had rare opportunities of knowing the true condition of the people. Mr. Hammick, too, is a judicial officer of wide experience. Thus the Bombay nominations combine all the elements requisite to make a good commission, and may be trusted to make the enquiry satisfactory in all respects. The Commission meets at Poona on the 15th instant. The enquiry will thus be soon begun in right earnest, and it is now the duty of the representatives of the people, the friends of the rayats as well as of the sáwkárs, to put the Commissioners in possession of all the facts necessary to arrive at a correct decision. The Sárvajanik Sabha of Poona may be trusted to take the lead in placing before the Commission one set of materials, mainly those relating to the rayats' case. The sáwkárs must likewise make an effort to put their case properly. Thus an organised effort must be made on both sides to marshal forth true evidence and to assist the enquiry in every way. The issue at stake is a large one. The Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act is a measure which is as much abused by its opponents as it is praised by its friends. It is unquestionably an exceptional measure, and has caused much dissatisfaction in some quarters.

15. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—It appears to have been agreed between the Governments of India and Bombay that the Land Indebtedness Commission shall differ from other commissions in its constitution. The members selected by the Bombay Government are also officials. We would have preferred the appointment of non-officials like the Honourable Mr. Javerilál, Ráo Bahádur Behechardás Viháridás and Ráo Bahádur Nulkar. Their presence on the Commission would have ensured for it that measure of public confidence which it should command. Still we can assure our friends in the Deccan that the selection of Messrs. Lely and Hammick from among the Revenue and Judicial branches of the Civil Service is, so far as it goes, a happy one. Both these gentlemen have resided long in our midst, and no officers have been more popular than they. Even the temporary absence of our Collector, who had begun to take a very keen interest in our local affairs, will be much felt. Mr. Hammick has earned a reputation as a very genial, retiring and judicious person. Again, both of these civilians cannot have committed themselves to this or that side of the question, since their service has chiefly been confined to the province of Gujarát. The principal question for the Commission to consider being what departure from the ordinary procedure in Judicial courts is necessary in favour of the rayats, these officials by their training will be of much help to the Commission.

16. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—We heartily congratulate Mr. F. S. P. Lely, the popular and energetic Collector of Surat, on the honour done to him. His Excellency the Governor in Council is pleased to place the services of Messrs. Lely and Hammick at the disposal of the Government of India in the Home Department as members of the Special Commission appointed to enquire into the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act, XVII of 1870. Both the officers are tried servants of Government, possessing an extraordinary knowledge of the matters which will be heard and discussed by the Commission. All the same, we cannot afford to lose the services of Mr. Lely. In him Surat found a sincere and hard-working official friend, and it is with deep regret that the city has to part company with him. But let us hope that after winning laurels by a successful completion of the task confided to him in common with his colleagues, he will ere long be back in our midst to assist us in our intellectual and industrial progress. In the meantime we are fully sanguine that Mr. Weir will fill the office with credit to himself and advantage to the Surat public at large.

17. In alluding to the appointment of the Honourable Mr. Krishnáji Lakshman Nulkar to a seat on the Land Indebtedness Commission, the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 7th December, says:—It is highly gratifying that at last a non-official Native gentleman has been nominated to a seat on this Commission, and for this act of justice the public is much obliged to the Bombay Government. In the case of several recent Commissions the claims of the Natives to be represented on them were continuously ignored by the Supreme Government, and it was feared that similar would be the case in regard to the Land Commission, but this time the Bombay Government has very wisely rescued them from the impending fate. The Native communities would have been better assured of their claims being properly represented if a Gujarátí Hindu, or Mr. Kaji Shábbuddin, or Mr. Dinshá Edalji Váchha had been nominated in addition to Mr. Nulkar.

18. Referring to the same appointment the Dnyán Prakásh (18), in its issue of the 7th December, says:—It would have been better if some other Native gentleman had been appointed on the Commission instead of Ráo Bahádur Nulkar, because experience has shown that owing to overwork or some physical debility he could not properly watch the interests of the rayats when he served as a member of the Forest Commission and the Finance Committee and had to put his signature to their reports below those of his colleagues, without carefully considering the subjects embodied in them.

Apprehensions of an impending scarcity in some of the districts of the Bombay Presidency.

19. The Sudódrak (19), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—Serious apprehensions have now begun to be entertained of an impending scarcity, if not actual famine. Prices of food grains have risen considerably during the last month, and the prospects of the cold weather harvest in the Deccan districts generally are very gloomy. Petty agriculturists in the Bijápur District are reported to have already abandoned their cattle, and left their homes in search of employment elsewhere. The jowári fields in the Sholápur District show no signs of putting forth ears, and threaten to wither away if Jupiter Pluvius does not favour them with a few showers. A similar state is observable in parts of the Ahmednagar and Poona districts as well. In this state of things it is but natural that the people, especially the agriculturists, should lose all heart and cry for mercy. In our opinion, however, it is the duty of Government to take timely precautions against the approaching disaster, and by offering help to the really needy, save them and theirs from death. A gloomy prospect of agriculture necessarily creates a great supply of unskilled labour, which can be utilised on petty works of road repairs or road construction. There are many parts of the Deccan districts which remain yet unopened for communication, and Government can very advantageously seize this opportunity to employ the Kunbis who are or would soon be in a state of destitution, on such works. It can also make extra advances to such as want them for digging wells or making like agricultural improvements. It is absolutely necessary that any means that could be devised for the alleviation of the suffering population should be devised in time. If this be not done, there is every fear of Government having to feed beggars, reduced to mere skeletons and unable to do any kind of work. The last great famine furnishes more than sufficient instances of this. The memory of that famine is painful, and may we be spared anything like that! We wish it may still rain and all fears of famine and scarcity may be dissipated. We understand Government have already set themselves about this serious task, and we trust we shall not require the services of English philanthropists like Mr. Caine to direct the attention of the authorities concerned to any affected areas and their relief. It may also be suggested that our capitalists, small as well as great, will do well, by joint or individual efforts, to start small industries in the threatened districts, thereby securing a double object,—getting cheap labour for their own profit and giving relief to the sufferers from scarcity.

Alleged distress and scarcity prevailing in the Deccan districts and suggestions to His Excellency Lord Harris in the matter.

20. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 10th December, writes:—His Excellency Lord Harris has now completed his winter tour and is now amongst us. We consider this to be, therefore, a fitting opportunity to draw His Lordship's attention to the serious out-look in most of the districts of the Deccan. If His Lordship make proper enquiries, he will learn that a deficient rainfall has been productive of miseries to the people as well as the cattle of these districts. We think that it is the bounden duty of the local Government to take steps to mitigate the inevitable distress before it is too late. It will not do, we take liberty to say, to rely chiefly upon the reports received at head-quarters from the local officials, the rosy colours presented by whom often prove deceptive. The real state of circumstances is given such a colouring that most of the disquieting features are either kept in the background or are misrepresented. The reason of this is not far to seek. It is a general belief that any proposal involving heavy expenditure is not looked upon with favour, and it is not seldom that bold and conscientious officials, laying bare the true condition, are regarded as alarmists. Such being the case, the real source of information is popular opinion as reflected in the press of the Deccan, which, though sometimes erring, is generally trustworthy. Accounts from Poona, Sátára, Sholápur, Ahmednagar and Bijápur show that in several places crops have failed, and that the cattle are dying in large numbers for want of sufficient fodder. In some of the Southern Marátha States, too, the outlook is gloomy enough. The very fact that Government recently went the length of spending Rs. 3,000 on rain-making experiments in Bijápur goes far to show that the rainfall has not been sufficient. It is a pity that the experiments were not successful. Dynamite was used, but it is now said that it was a mistake as gunpowder would have shown better results. It is contended that dynamite produces only a great shock, the effect of which is felt only in the adjacent strata of air, while in the case of gunpowder the effect of the discharge is such that a large column of air is set in tremendous motion to a great distance, thereby producing the requisite changes in the atmosphere. In support of this, the rainfall caused by heavy cannonade in great battles is referred to. We hope Government will give a trial to gunpowder also. The paltry expenditure that will have to be incurred will be amply repaid if the experiments prove successful. It is said that cattle are dying in numbers and that the surviving can be had for the mere asking. Their state is described to be truly heart-rending. Not only this. Their sufferings and the consequent death will tell heavily upon the people in several ways and agriculture will particularly suffer. The cattle, for this reason, require first attention. All this shows that the condition of both the people and the cattle is disquieting. We therefore sincerely trust that Lord Harris will immediately look into the matter and demonstrate to the people that the British Government is really paternal.

Alleged distress in the Sholápur District.

21. A correspondent, writing from Sholápur to the Dnyán Prakásh (13) in its issue of the 7th December, says:—Signs of famine are already visible in this part of the country. In the cattle bazar held here on the last two Tuesdays it was a very pitiful sight to see the agriculturists sorrowfully expressing their desire to part with their starving animals without any consideration, provided the new masters promised to feed them; but none could undertake to do this. They were therefore obliged to sell them to butchers for nominal prices. The owners actually shed tears while handing over their animals, particularly the cow, which they consider sacred, to butchers. Government should do something for the protection of the cattle and earn the gratitude of their poor rayats.

22. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 6th December, says:—People over the Ghâts are generally happy in this season of the year, but this year there is dearth of fodder and scarcity of water and the prices of grain have risen very high. How the people in Kaládgi and Bijápur suffered from famine in 1876, and how Government was blamed for consequent enormous loss of life, is well known. It must be on the records of Government that Sir Richard Temple's administration was most disliked by the people owing to this cause. We therefore request Government to be very careful this time. Government officers in different districts should remember how the Collector of Sholápur and his wife were highly praised during the famine of 1876. Government are freely spending money and raising loans in krors against the will of the people. The people of India have not derived the least benefit from the money spent on Burmah. We have nothing to do with the affairs on the frontier, and yet money is being extorted from us to meet frontier defences. If Government spend money freely to alleviate the miseries of famine the rayats will be convinced that Government care as much for the lives of their subjects as for their own interests, and will highly esteem them. The principles of free trade are sound theoretically, but the policy of prohibiting export of corn from the country will be most beneficial at the present juncture.

Alleged distress and scarcity prevailing on the Ghâts and suggestions to Government in the matter.

23. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—The income-tax is the one impost which touches appreciably the pockets of high-placed Anglo-Indians, and on that account they will hardly allow an opportunity to slip on which they can urge its abolition on Government. At the last St. Andrew's dinner at Calcutta, the chairman, Mr. Mackay, referred to it as an objectionable impost, calling for its repeal at the earliest opportunity. If, however, Government can afford to give up any of its present sources of income, there are many which ought to be remitted before the repeal of that tax is thought of. We are glad His Excellency Lord Lansdowne intimated his view to that effect on the occasion of the Calcutta dinner.

Suggested abolition of the income-tax disapproved

24. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—The objects of the selfish friendship of Manchester have exclaimed "Save us from our friends" sooner than the pseudo-philanthropists imagined. The female operatives of Ahmedabad have addressed a petition to Government praying for exemption from the operation of the eleven hours' rule imposed by the new Factory Act. The Act is to come into operation from the 1st of January. Women employed in cotton factories on hand reeling and other light works work, as a rule, for less than eight hours. But in Ahmedabad they are also employed on steam machinery, and so if the exemption is not granted they will be replaced by males or children working half-time. If the Governor-General, taking their case into consideration, exercised his authority to exempt them, they would be able to surmount the difficulties created by their so-called friends. [The Sudhdrak (19), in its issue of the 7th December, observes that if the Government of India have made the 11 hours' rule for female mill operatives really through any pity for them, they will do well to soon exempt the women from its operation, now that they have memorialized against the rule, saying that they are not over-worked and that they will suffer much from its operation.]

A memorial made to Government by the female mill operatives of Ahmedabad, and remarks in connection with it.

25. The Gujardt Mitrd (84), in its issue of the 6th December, regrets that the consumption of salt in India during last October was less by 133,000 maunds than during the corresponding month in the preceding five years, while it was less by 75,000 maunds in the last September than during the corresponding month in the preceding two years, and observes:—The population is rapidly increasing, causing a great rise in the prices of corn, although some of the waste lands and jungles have been cultivated. It is feared that if the population increases at the present rate it will be difficult within a short time to get even 10 seers of corn for a rupee. Salt is indispensable, not only for the food of man but also of animals and trees, and a reduction in its consumption necessarily increases the death-rate.

Remarks on the consumption of salt during the months of September and October of the current year in India.

26. The Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad, in its issue of the 10th December, observes:—The revised assessment on land in the Daskroi Táluka in the Ahmedabad District has been very oppressive, but Government made a concession in 52 villages only. We are much surprised that a similar concession should not have been made to the remaining villages of the táluka. Moreover, Government have made the concession only temporarily. An example will be sufficient to show the extreme severity of the assessment. About 200 numbers, measuring nearly 300 acres, in the Hodav village of this táluka, which have remained uncultivated for the last three years, have been assessed at about Rs. 1,900, and consequently the cultivators have given up the land. Under these circumstances we request Government to appoint a Commission consisting of the Honourable Mr. Javerilál Umiáshankar, Mr. Sorábji Shápurji Bengáli and some others to enquire into the condition of the landholders of this táluka and of the rayats in Gujarát in general and to ascertain whether the new assessment is oppressive on the cultivators or not.

Remarks on the revised land assessment in the Daskroi Táluka in the Ahmedabad District and a request to Government in the matter.

27. A correspondent of the Guiaráti (83), in its issue of the 6th December, observes:—The potters at Ahmedabad have unanimously resolved not to sell earthen utensils to the people and to buy all those which the potters from the neighbouring villages make, and thus to put the people to great inconvenience. It is said that the potters have taken this extreme step owing to the orders issued by Ráo Sáheb Becharlál Jivanlál, Mámlatdár of the Daskroi Táluka, for levying heavy fees ranging from Rs. 100 to Rs. 1,000 per acre of land used by the potters. The potters are preparing memorials to the Collector and to the Commissioner, N. D., but we request Government to take prompt steps in the matter and redress the grievances of the people without waiting for any representations from either the potters or the people.

Potters' strike at Ahmedabad and remarks thereon.

28. The Samsher Bahádur (118), in its issue of the 4th December, says that the potters of the villages in the neighbourhood of Ahmedabad have joined the potters of that city in the strike, which has put the people to great inconvenience, as they cannot get earthen utensils required for their daily use, and that the difficulty of the people will still more increase as the marriage season among the Hindus has approached, and requests the authorities to persuade the potters to resume work.

29. The Ahmedabad Times (91), in its issue of the 9th December, exhorts the inhabitants of Ahmedabad to take prompt measures against the fees alleged to have been illegally imposed by Government on potters, says that there is no chance of the local authorities cancelling the new orders because they are not put to any inconvenience by the strike of the potters, as they seldom use earthen utensils, fears that the illiterate and poor potters, who have been suffering from starvation for some time past, might accept the proposals of the authorities to pay the reduced fee of Rs. 2/0 per acre of land, and observes that if the authorities are successful in levying small fees they will not fail to gradually increase them, and that the people will have then to pay heavy prices for earthen pots.

30. The Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 11th December, approves of the appointment of A'ga Akbar Sháh, son of the late A'ga Khán, as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year, observing that the appointment has gratified the Mahomedan community in general and the Khojas in particular, the latter of whom belong to the Shia sect and recognize the A'ga Khán as their religious head, and recommending that the shrievalty for 1893 should be conferred on a deserving gentleman from among the Suni Mahomedans of the presidency. [The Akbári Sodagar (93) of the same date also approves of the nomination of A'ga Akbar Sháh.]

Approval of the appointment of A'ga Akbar Sháh as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year.

31. In alluding to some recent cases of forgery before the Court of Criminal Sessions at Ahmednagar, the Jagadábandhu (89), in its issue of the 6th December, proposes an amendment in the existing law of registration to make the presence of both the creditor and the debtor compulsory at the time of registering a document and also to preserve their photographs in the register for the purpose of identification of the parties in future, so that there may be left no ground for fraud, and says that such amendments as these will not be effected unless there be representatives of the people in the Legislative Council.

Remarks in connection with an appeal made by the Bombay Government to the local High Court against the sentence by a Presidency Magistrate on a husband for biting off his wife's nose.

32. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 6th December, says that it does not become the Bombay Government that they should appeal against the sentence of two years' rigorous imprisonment passed by a Presidency Magistrate on a husband for biting off his wife's nose under such circumstances as would lead most people in India to think that the husband had not acted very cruelly in the matter, while they should not deem it necessary to take any notice of the acquittal by the Honourable Mr. Justice Bayley of a European who had committed a murder when there was sufficient evidence to convict him of the offence. The paper remarks that this is a sample of the kind of justice dispensed in India.

Remarks in connection with the powers of two Honorary Magistrates at Násik.

33. A correspondent, writing to the Vártáhar (20) in its issue of the 6th December, says :—Mr. Mir Gayásudin, Honorary Magistrate, Second Class, Násik City, has been invested by Mr. Porteous, the District Magistrate, with power to take cognisance of offences upon police reports. Mr. Tákalkar, who has passed the necessary examination, has been deprived of his power to hold inquests, while Mr. Mir Gayásudin, who has not passed any examination at all, gets additional power. This is rather strange.

Allegations against the Mámlatdár of Indápur shown to be false.

34. A correspondent, writing to the Kalpataru (42) in its issue of the 6th December, says that the allegations made against the Mámlatdár of Indápur, in the Poona District, by another correspondent in its issue of the 25th October were utterly groundless, that the cause of these allegations and other anonymous petitions against the Mámlatdár, who has served Government for the last fourteen or fifteen years in different districts with the reputation of being a just and straightforward officer, may probably be ascribed to a misunderstanding between the Mámlatdár and a local Jághirdár, who on his frequent visits to the Kacheri was advised by the Mámlatdár not to come to the office unless on business, and who took this advice as an insult to himself, and that the Mámlatdár has done nothing in the matter of the municipality without the knowledge of his superior.

The Gokuláshtami pamphlet issued by the Bombay Tract and Book Society and the offence it has given to the Hindus.

35. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 6th December, remarks :—The agitation, which the Bombay people made some time ago about the Gokuláshtami pamphlet issued by some Christians at Bombay in disparagement of the Hindu god Krishna, seems to have subsided without producing any effect. Our people are at present under the disfavour of God and are consequently under a foreign rule, and the pamphlet in question having been issued by converts who are co-religionists of the foreign rulers the Bombay people must have been helpless. We have seen the pamphlet, which contains a sentence about Krishna and Subhadra which enrages the reader so much so that he feels tempted to do something worse than avoid to see the face of the traducing convert. But he is without any remedy, the Government being that of foreigners and Christians. If anybody were to lodge a complaint in any of their courts of justice, the complaint might be declared inadmissible and the complainant might incur the displeasure of Government and its authorities, if he did not meet with anything worse. If a Christian had committed such an offence under a Native ruler he would have undoubtedly come to grief. The Hindus being a mild people quietly bore the insult, but the Mahomedans would never have done so. It is very disgraceful of Native converts to take advantage of the adverse fortune of the Hindus and to slander them with a view to ingratiate themselves with the foreign rulers. They should never dream that though by adopting Christianity they have become Native sáhebs, they will be taken by Englishmen to England along with them. They must spend their life in this country and under our shelter. No Government has been permanent in India, but has had to make room for another, and it is very inconsiderate on the part of the Native converts to abuse any people they please like spoilt children. Have the publishers of the dirty pamphlet in question borne in mind how their grandsons and great-grandsons will have to pay for the fault of their ancestors after a century or two hence?

Alleged inconsistency in some of the texts in the Christian religious works and the immoral character of some divine personages mentioned therein.

36. The Suryodaya (70), in its issue of the 7th December, quotes texts from some religious works of the Christians showing, in the opinion of the paper, inconsistency with each other and immorality on the part of some divine personages, and says that the passages are put forth without any intention either to find fault with or to insult Christianity, but only with a view to prove to the world how vain is the attempt of the Christians to establish the superiority of their own religion to other religions by criticising and commenting upon the lives of persons held in divine respect by the latter, or by pointing out inconsistent and contradictory statements, and also to show that there are similar passages even in their own religious works.

Suggestions to the Wordsworth Memorial Fund Committee.

37. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—What is the Wordsworth Memorial Fund Committee doing? It is now more than a year since the fund was started with a view to perpetuate the memory of the late Principal of the Elphinstone College, who did his utmost to give "nobler loves and nobler cares" to all those whose privilege it was to sit at his feet, and whose broad and deep sympathy with the natives of India was the object of universal praise and admiration on the eve of his retirement. Though the fund has been practically closed since January last, we wonder what has caused such a long and inexplicable delay in finally deciding what form the memorial should take. The subscriptions have, we believe, amounted to Rs. 15,000, and the time has now arrived for the committee to convene a meeting of the subscribers and take their sense as to the best way of keeping the memory of Dr. William Wordsworth green among us. We have known of a good many funds in which the committees in charge of them have eagerly undertaken the work of collecting subscriptions, but have in a short time grown cold over it, let the collections lie idly in some bank, and finally gone to sleep. We are, however, sure no such thing will happen in the case of the fund of which we are now speaking. We hope the committee of the Wordsworth Memorial Fund will not waste a handsome sum over a single life-size oil-painting of the great educationist whose memory they are going to commemorate. We would suggest on our part that from the total amount raised about Rs. 500 be set apart for printing as many smaller copies (24 by 18 inches would be the best) of the portrait as there are subscribers and presenting one of these to each. Thus, instead of consigning a single portrait to some dark and dusty corner of the Elphinstone College, we shall have about 200 copies of Professor Wordsworth's likeness, adorning 200 drawing-rooms and furnishing an excellent object lesson in the compatibility of extreme modesty with sterling merit to the present as well as succeeding generations. It is this advice that has kept the memory of a kindred spirit, the late Dr. Harkness, fresh and green among us, and will continue doing so for some generations to come. The interest of the remainder may, perhaps, best be utilized in founding a Wordsworth Fellowship of Rs. 50 per mensem—to be awarded annually to the student of the Elphinstone College who gains the highest number of marks in history or political economy at the Final B.A. Examination,—subjects which Professor Wordsworth handled in such an able and admirable manner.

Alleged cruelty to dumb animals in some of the localities of Bombay, and a request to the Police Commissioner in the matter.

38. The Rájyabháktá (117), in its issue of the 8th December, complains that some men in Bombay, with a view to extort money from the Shrávaks, take cows, goats, hens and some other animals to such thickly populated localities as Páydhoni, Mándvi and Zaverbág to wound the religious feelings of the Shrávaks by torturing the dumb animals, and says:—The Jains are generally a very merciful people, and are, besides, enjoined by their Shástras to save life from death, and they therefore cannot bear to see the dumb animals cruelly treated in their presence. They therefore buy the tortured animals from their torturers and send them to Pánjrápol (cattle asylum). The evil can be stopped by resorting to Section 503 of the Indian Penal Code, and we hear the residents of Mándvi had once drawn the attention of the Police Commissioner to this matter and that he had issued the necessary orders, but they have not produced any permanent effect on the offenders. In a case which occurred only about four days ago at Mumbádevi, the Jains complained to Mr. Nolan, Police Inspector, who desired them to take legal steps against the offenders; but we think it is the duty of the police to bring to book such offenders, and we request the Police Commissioner to root out the evil by not allowing such men to visit such localities.

39. The Bodh Sudhákar (9), in expressing its approval of the precautions taken by the Superintendent of Police, Sátára, for the prevention of crime within his jurisdiction, suggests that the Superintendent should ascertain how far the thickly spread rumour about the commission of a murder in a village near Medhe in the táluka of Jávli is true, that he should not allow the impression to remain upon the minds of the rustics that they can commit any crime with impunity if they can only avoid detection at the first investigation, and that he should order the Inspectors and Faujdárs to visit at least once in every three months almost all the villages within their respective limits so that they may be able to obtain a clue to information relating to any offence by being acquainted with the circumstances and the people of the locality. The paper also adds that these officers should not be allowed to stay away for a long time from places of their permanent appointment, as this is likely to produce in them indifference to their duties.

A suggestion to the Superintendent of Police, Sátára.

40. The Din Mani (80), in its issue of the 8th December, says that it has heard that the cotton crop extending over several acres of land in the villages of Manubar, Dayádra, Kothi, Karmád and Degám in the Broach District was destroyed by persons of bad character, but in no case does the police seem to have traced the offenders and brought them to book, and requests the Police Superintendent, Broach, to take prompt steps in the matter.

41. The Samsher Bahádur (118), in its issue of the 4th December, exhorts the inhabitants of Ahmedabad, particularly the Hindus, to send a memorial to the Supreme Government to discontinue the practice of poisoning stray dogs now in force in that city, and hopes that the prayer will meet with a favourable response from His Excellency the Viceroy, as it is said that His Excellency has recently issued orders to the Provincial Governments to prohibit the practice. [The Ahmedabad Times (91), in its issue of the 9th December, expresses similar sentiments, and adds that the order issued by the authorities to poison stray dogs in the city has spread great sorrow among the inhabitants.]

Poisoning of dogs at Ahmedabad disapproved, and an exhortation to the inhabitants of that city to send a memorial to the Supreme Government.

Part II.—Legislation.

42. The Prabhát (156), in its issue of the 28th November, says:—Our readers are probably well aware that at present vaccination is compulsory in the towns of Bombay and Karáchi, while in other places it is optional with the people to get their children vaccinated. Now Sir Charles Pritchard, who was formerly Commissioner in Sind, has introduced a Bill into the Legislative Council of Bombay for enforcing compulsory vaccination in all places. If the Bill is passed, it will apply to all towns of the province. There is no doubt that much good will accrue to the country after the compulsory system is extended to it, and that since the introduction of vaccination the evil effects of small-pox have to a great extent been reduced.

Approval of the Vaccination Bill now before the Bombay Legislative Council.

Satisfaction at the non-acceptance by the Senate of the Bombay University of the proposal made by the Syndicate for making certain changes in the Matriculation Examination.

43. The Bombay Samachár (95) and the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in their issues of the 7th December, express extreme satisfaction at the non-acceptance by the Senate of the Bombay University of the proposal made by the Syndicate for making certain changes in the curriculum and examination for Matriculation, observing that the scheme was defective in its very inception, as was proved by the large number of amendments that were proposed, and express a hope that an appropriate scheme will be hereafter brought forward to improve the Matriculation course, which is far from perfect.

Complaints against the Bombay University and its examinations.

44. The Dnyán Prakásh (13) is dissatisfied with the results of the University examinations of this year, with the rules and regulations made by the University concerning the curriculum of subjects, the period of college course, &c., and with the way in which examiners draw question-papers, and in its issue of the 10th December observes:—The results lately published afford the public ample reason to complain against them. Much inconvenience and loss are caused to the students by frequent changes in the subjects of study. The three years' college course has been extended to four years, and this change is calculated to produce much trouble to those who have studied under the old arrangement. It is under contemplation to permit the old students to pass under the old programme of studies for a year or two. Very liberal, indeed, is this concession! We ask, are the students to blame for the alterations made by the University? Why should they then be asked to submit to new rules even after a year or two? Why should they not be examined always according to the old rules as they have a right to? Our opinion is that there should be an examination according to the old scheme as long as there are candidates who have studied under the old rules. Then, again, the question-papers for the different examinations of this year show much wantonness on the part of the examiners. In the English paper at the Matriculation there was a question in which forty-four words were asked to be parsed and ten words to be traced to their roots. This question had fifteen marks assigned to it. An experienced teacher wrote out an answer to this question and he found that the solution cost him actually 45 minutes. The examiners in history at the same examination seem to have forgotten while drawing out the paper that they were examining candidates, not for B.A. but for the Matriculation, who read history from smaller books. Such things are due to the appointment of examiners who are not men of mature judgment and long experience and to there being nobody over them to hold them responsible. God knows when the University will set these things right. From the result of the Previous Examination published yesterday it appears that only 159 passed out of 683 examined. This means that the University approved of one out of every five candidates. This result is, indeed, horrible and it is necessary to find out who is to blame in the matter. Unless it is explained whether the college professors do not teach well, the students do not study or the examiners set very stiff papers, the parents cannot send their children to school without fear. It is absolutely necessary to find out the party responsible for only twenty per cent. of the students declared by the University fit to be admitted into the colleges and trained by the so-called professors at a cost of Rs. 20 at least per head per mensem, being passed and pronounced to be qualified to prosecute studies for the higher examinations. Either the University examination was faulty or the college professors and their pupils slept over their books for five out of the six days of the week. This is a great riddle to the public and it will not be satisfied until it is satisfactorily solved. The results of the First B.A. Examination were similarly horrible. The raising of the percentage to 30 marks, which the University effected all of a sudden and without the knowledge of the public, is said to be the cause of all this. If the Syndicate has authority to effect a change in a practice of long standing without properly estimating its consequences, the authority must be said to be too much, and if the bad results be solely due to this new alteration it is but just that they should be revised. The University has been of late despotic

a very merciful people, and are, besides, enjoined by their Shástras to save life from death, and they therefore cannot bear to see the dumb animals cruelly treated in their presence. They therefore buy the tortured animals from their torturers and send them to Pánjrápol (cattle asylum). The evil can be stopped by resorting to Section 508 of the Indian Penal Code, and we hear the residents of Mándvi had once drawn the attention of the Police Commissioner to this matter and that he had issued the necessary orders, but they have not produced any permanent effect on the offenders. In a case which occurred only about four days ago at Mumbádevi, the Jains complained to Mr. Nolan, Police Inspector, who desired them to take legal steps against the offenders; but we think it is the duty of the police to bring to book such offenders, and we request the Police Commissioner to root out the evil by not allowing such men to visit such localities.

Complaints against the Bombay University and its examinations.

44. The Dnyán Prakásh (13) is dissatisfied with the results of the University examinations of this year, with the rules and regulations made by the University concerning the curriculum of subjects, the period of college course, &c., and with the way in which examiners draw question-papers, and in its issue of the 10th December observes:—The results lately published afford the public ample reason to complain against them. Much inconvenience and loss are caused to the students by frequent changes in the subjects of study. The three years' college course has been extended to four years, and this change is calculated to produce much trouble to those who have studied under the old arrangement. It is under contemplation to permit the old students to pass under the old programme of studies for a year or two. Very liberal, indeed, is this concession! We ask, are the students to blame for the alterations made by the University? Why should they then be asked to submit to new rules even after a year or two? Why should they not be examined always according to the old rules as they have a right to? Our opinion is that there should be an examination according to the old scheme as long as there are candidates who have studied under the old rules. Then, again, the question-papers for the different examinations of this year show much wantonness on the part of the examiners. In the English paper at the Matriculation there was a question in which forty-four words were asked to be parsed and ten words to be traced to their roots. This question had fifteen marks assigned to it. An experienced teacher wrote out an answer to this question and he found that the solution cost him actually 45 minutes. The examiners in history at the same examination seem to have forgotten while drawing out the paper that they were examining candidates, not for B.A. but for the Matriculation, who read history from smaller books. Such things are due to the appointment of examiners who are not men of mature judgment and long experience and to there being nobody over them to hold them responsible. God knows when the University will set these things right. From the result of the Previous Examination published yesterday it appears that only 159 passed out of 683 examined. This means that the University approved of one out of every five candidates. This result is, indeed, horrible and it is necessary to find out who is to blame in the matter. Unless it is explained whether the college professors do not teach well, the students do not study or the examiners set very stiff papers, the parents cannot send their children to school without fear. It is absolutely necessary to find out the party responsible for only twenty per cent. of the students declared by the University fit to be admitted into the colleges and trained by the so-called professors at a cost of Rs. 20 at least per head per mensem, being passed and pronounced to be qualified to prosecute studies for the higher examinations. Either the University examination was faulty or the college professors and their pupils slept over their books for five out of the six days of the week. This is a great riddle to the public and it will not be satisfied until it is satisfactorily solved. The results of the First B.A. Examination were similarly horrible. The raising of the percentage to 30 marks, which the University effected all of a sudden and without the knowledge of the public, is said to be the cause of all this. If the Syndicate has authority to effect a change in a practice of long standing without properly estimating its consequences, the authority must be said to be too much, and if the bad results be solely due to this new alteration it is but just that they should be revised. The University has been of late despotic in its doings, and it behoves Government and the public to attend to this state of things at an early date.

45. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—The question of the standard of pass marks is again raised in the columns of a daily by a correspondent under the nom de plume of "Yashvant Appáji." He says that out of the 466 students for the First B.A. only 149 passed, because the new standard of 30 marks was rigorously enforced, though Professors Oxenham and Dreckmann favoured the old standard, and had the latter been followed about 30 students more, according to the calculation of the correspondent, would have passed. But in giving importance to this question of the standards the correspondent passes over the more important question that under the new rules the plucked students will have to remain at college for three years more for their B.A.,—decidedly a great disadvantage in the case of poor students. It will be remembered, however, that when changes were made in the B A. Examination, a certain period was allowed to plucked students to appear under the old standard. We do not see why the same or similar concession might not be asked for by the students, or why some prominent Fellows of the University should not lay the same before the Senate. We think the rule of two years for the Second B.A. after the First would be a great hardship in the case of the plucked candidates, and inasmuch as a concession was made some years ago, that ought to be a precedent for the Senate to make a similar concession just now. To us the question of the standard pass marks does not seem so material as that of giving a retrospective effect to the two years' rule. The question is of considerable importance to the student world and the professors, and the latter, in sympathy for them, ought to take it up at once. Professor Oxenham and Father Dreckmann are said to sympathise with them, and if they be moved in the matter, their advocacy of the point might convince the Senate of the weight of the alleged difficulties and these might be removed. Such concession would be a great gain and might encourage the plucked students to try their fortunes once more in the hope of taking their B.A. by an additional residence of one year at the college. Will somebody take up the question?

46. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—We have received more than one letter from candidates who have failed in the last First B.A. Examination, which, as matters now stand, is to be the last of its kind. The writers all ask us to request the University authorities to reconsider their resolution of not holding that examination any more, and to take into their favourable consideration a petition signed by more than a hundred students and presented to the Senators three months ago. As it would clearly be a hardship to most of these students to appear for the Intermediate Examination under the new course, it seems to us perfectly equitable and just that they should be allowed at least one chance more. When the old B.A. course was abolished, the unsuccessful candidates were given two chances in 1882 and 1883; the examinations under the Engineering Faculty continue to be held even though the altered course has come into force; and there seems no reason why the University should show special unkindness to the First B.A. men only.

47. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—The University will have shortly to consider the petition from the First B.A. and the Second B.A. candidates to allow an extension of the old rules for at least two years more. The Senate has decided that the new course is to come into force from next year, which inflicts an obvious hardship on those candidates who have qualified themselves for the First B.A. and Second B.A. Examinations under the old standard, but have failed to pass those examinations. It has been usual for the University to allow some grace for an old standard even after a new course comes into operation. The First B.A. candidates under the old rules have passed in Logic and Physics at their Previous Examination. If they have to submit themselves to the First B.A. under the new standard they will have to do Logic and Physics over again. This sort of inequality is inevitable, and must occur at some time in the case of some candidates, but the University might mitigate it by permitting the old rules to be continued for a stated period, say two years. A requisition is, we learn, going to be submitted to the Syndicate for calling an early meeting of the Senate with the view of allowing such an extension. Let us hope the candidates will meet with better success this time.

48. The Kesari (45), in its issue of the 8th December, says:—There is much dissatisfaction with this year's examiners and examinations of the Bombay University. The students who have failed owing to the sudden raising of the standard of pass marks are complaining of the great disadvantage they have been put to on account of the change in the University curriculum. It is said that the Gujarátti piece for translation in the English paper set at this year's Matriculation was selected without consulting the examiner in Gujarátti, and that although there were two examiners in Sanskrit in the M.A. Examination all the questions in that subject were drawn up and the answer papers examined by one examiner alone. The History paper in the entrance examination has also given cause for complaint. That such mismanagement should exist at the seat of learning where there is no lack of considerate and intelligent men, savours of darkness under a lamp. Instead of everyone trying to show his earnest desire for increased knowledge among students by making frequent changes in the curriculum, we are at present sadly in need of men who will see that the affairs of the University are properly managed and justice is done to thousands of poor students. Some time back a committee was appointed to enquire into the system of appointing examiners and the mode of conducting examinations, and it made some suggestions in these matters; but looking to the management of the examinations of this year it seems that the labours of this committee have been of no use.

49. The Prabhát (156), in its issue of the 28th November, says:—The piece set for translation from Sindhi into English at the last Matriculation Examination was an extraordinary one. The examiner has, probably, translated it into Sindhi from an English newspaper. But the translation was so worded as to mislead even grown up persons and must, no doubt, have perplexed boys. Some of the words used in it were not such as are ordinarily used in conversation or writing. If the examiner had only considered for awhile, he could, no doubt, have found easier words. The object of giving a piece for translation is to test the candidate's knowledge of the English language, and not to ascertain whether they know a certain vernacular word or not.

50. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—

Remarks in connection with the election of the Registrar of the Bombay University.

The election of the Registrar of the University takes place on the 12th instant. Dr. Peterson and Dr. Macdonald are the rival candidates. Dr. Peterson was Registrar for nearly 12 years, and during the latter part of his administration he gave cause for such dissatisfaction that the Senate thought it necessary to replace him by Dr. Macdonald. It will be hardly prudent to entrust over again the chief executive power of the University to one who has at one time shown himself incompetent to use it properly. Dr. Macdonald, moreover, has been in office only once. It would be, to say the least, very graceful to renew his term of office once more. In case the Senate wishes to have a change in the office, we would propose Professor Hawthornthwaite as a most eligible man. In any case we would ask the Senators to make their choice without fear or favour, untrammelled by any personal considerations, and with sole regard to eligibility for the work.

PART IV.—Municipalities.

51. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—

His Excellency Lord Harris' recent advice to the Shikárpur Municipality, and the financial condition of the Bombay Municipality.

His Excellency Lord Harris made some very pertinent remarks on the desirability of administering municipal affairs economically in his reply to the address from the Shikárpur Municipality. The address itself did not refer to the unsatisfactory financial condition of the municipality, but His Excellency was well aware of the fact. The Governor accordingly took occasion to offer a kindly hint which may well be laid to heart by municipalities of larger resources and powers and most especially by our own municipality in Bombay. "It is not a sound financial procedure," said His Excellency Lord Harris, "to live beyond the income which you can estimate you will receive in the year, and a course contrary to that must inevitably lead sooner or later to bankruptcy." Will the autocrat of the Bombay Municipality listen to this sound and sage advice? He evidently seems to defy all such safe counsel. And yet if ever there was a municipality that sorely needed it, it was the municipality of Bombay. In the budget estimate now placed by Mr. Acworth before the Standing Committee, he has estimated the income of the municipality for the year 1892-93 at 59½ lakhs of rupees, whereas the estimate of the expenditure he proposes to incur during the year is over 66½ lakhs. If this is not living beyond the estimated income of the year, we do not know what is. The Municipal Commissioner looks to the balance of the previous year to make up this deficit, but such a temporary makeshift cannot serve long. It must inevitably bring the municipality to bankruptcy, and for this reason that whereas the expenditure is of the nature of a recurring charge, which once that it is sanctioned will run from year to year, the balance of funds at credit is only for the particular year—the result more or less of a windfall. Such windfalls do not occur every year. This is the plainest truth that ought to go home to the mind of every responsible person belonging to the municipal executive, but the fact in Bombay is quite the reverse. Here the plainest lessons of experience are scattered to the winds before the extravagant claims of the great spending departments of the municipality.

Remarks on the decision of Government on the prayer of the Bombay Municipality for a re-adjustment of the police charges.

52. In noticing the decision of the Bombay Government on the dispute between the Bombay Municipal Corporation and the Government of Bombay regarding the cost of the city police, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 9th December, says: - It remains to be seen what conclusion the Corporation arrives at in regard to this decision which is now lying before it; but, in the meanwhile, it may be asserted that the Government have not done justice in deciding to fix the State contribution at one-fourth of the annual net charges. The memorandum written by Mr. Lee-Warner on the subject is of a nature similar to that of the documents that have been issued by the Bombay Government for some time past, in which Sir Raymond West and Mr. Lee-Warner gave their own views the importance of an ordinance of His Holiness the Pope, without caring in the least for public opinion. In his attempt to prove that a considerable portion of the police charges should fall on the Corporation, and that its present contribution was far below what it paid previously, Mr. Lee-Warner has had to resort to statistics of antiquated times. In the first place, it is a mistake to assume that the police expenditure should bear a certain proportion to the total income of the municipality. The income from different sources cannot necessarily bear any relation to police expenditure. It cannot therefore be reasonably asserted that a large portion of the income raised for meeting particular wants of the Corporation should be allotted to the police. Again, in 1865 the Supreme Government decided that all police expenses should be charged to municipal corporations; but while other corporations have been exempted from the operation of this order, Bombay alone has been subjected to it. The local dhábári and some other revenues have been appropriated by Government notwithstanding. As pointed out by the Times of India, the Bombay Municipality incurs very heavy expenses for the sanitation of the town, and hence ought to be exempted from the cost of the police, as has been done by the Supreme Government in regard to the town of Calcutta. [The Jám-e-Jamshed (86) and the Akhbáre Soudagar (93) of the 8th December express some of the above sentiments.]

Treatment given to the dead bodies of the Mahomedans in the public hospitals in Bombay and proposed memorial to the Municipal Corporation on the subject.

53. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 6th December, says that a Moulvi has come forward to protest against the practice now in vogue in the Bombay hospitals of dissecting the dead bodies for the benefit of medical students, that the Khojas, Bohras, Memons and other Mahomedans have joined him, who are of opinion that it is inconvenient for them to perform religious ceremonies on the dead after their limbs are cut off, and that a public meeting of the Mahomedans is shortly to be called to adopt a memorial to the Municipal Corporation on the subject.

54. The same newspaper writes:—We congratulate the Dhandhuka Municipality on its having emancipated itself by its dogged persistency from the thraldom of the Government. By all means let the local official raise a house-tax and collect the arrears of dues to his heart's content. Time will be on the side of the municipal commissioners; for, we may very soon witness a change in the attitude of that authority. Local self-government in the mofussil is growing a bye-word of reproach. All over India the game is to beggar his neighbour. The Imperial authorities encroach on the provincial revenues. As these are somewhat starved they try to replenish their coffers by a raid on the local treasuries! It is a merry game all round, but a most objectional one. Peter robs Paul and Paul robs Peter. This is the raison de être of local self-government. Evidently, at this rate, they will soon discredit it and drag the name of poor Lord Ripon in the mire. The omnipotent bureaucracy will chuckle and say "Did we not forecast it? Did we not say the people were not yet advanced for the so-called boon? Now see, here is the result after a fair trial of so many years!" But the rub is there. Has local government got a fair trial? We unhesitatingly deny that it has. Now as to this precious octroi. Is it not a fact that nearly 70 per cent. of all local taxation in the empire is derived from octroi? Is not the Imperial Government aware of the evils, and worse than evils, of direct taxation? Is it not a fact that octroi is levied on articles of local consumption and not on articles of trade? Then, why on earth, this philistine pretence to abolish octroi in the blessed name of trade? A more irrational and illogical excuse was never urged by a civilised Government, which is at its wits' ends how to coerce local bodies to spend on objects the cost of which should come from provincial revenues. So far as local bodies can get blood out of stone the benignant Government is pleased to pat them on the back, stroke their head and give them a good word in the annual administration report; but the moment they refuse the official President or to stain their hands with tyranny, they are set down as perverse, wanting in public spirit, and so forth! If such be the kind of local government our rulers are anxious to establish in the country, then, we say, the sooner all local municipalities give up the ghost and imitate the good example of Dhandhuka the better. The Bombay Government has shown a way which they should not be slow to take advantage of. It is better that this farce should be seen in its naked colours.

The municipal commissioners of Dhandhuka congratulated on the suspension of their municipality and the attitude of Government towards local self-government criticised.

55. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 6th December, writes:—The municipality of Dhandhuka in Gujarát has by an official notification been superseded and friends of local self-government will be sorry to hear of it. They will be sorry, especially because the municipal commissioners cannot be held wholly responsible for the causes which have led to the supersession. Government is bringing great pressure to bear upon the municipalities to give up octroi and to substitute direct taxation for it. Our people are by their instincts opposed to a direct tax, and the opposition to the recovery of house-tax is in many cases almost insurmountable. The Dhandhuka Municipality fell a victim to this Government policy and we sympathise with our friends in that unfortunate town. We think if some of the earnest municipal commissioners there cared to publish their account of the causes that led to their fall, the sympathising public would see if they can in any way help them to regain their privilege.

Remarks in connection with the supersession of the Dhandhuka Municipality by the Bombay Government.

56. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 6th December, disapproves of the recent Government resolution regarding the Dhandhuka Municipality, says that it is wrong to find fault with those commissioners who did not pay the house-tax, because by becoming municipal commissioners they did not lose their rights as rate-payers, and that it was wrong to suspend the whole municipality because a few commissioners did not approve of the levy of the house-tax. The Mitra adds that it is nothing but oppression to levy an unpopular tax like the house-tax, which is unsuited to mofussil towns owing to the poverty of the people, who sometimes cannot pay the annual halálkhor-tax of a rupee and a half and their utensils have to be attached and sold for the recovery of the amount, and requests Government not to solely depend on the reports of their officers in such matters. [The Surya Prakash (90), in its issue of the 5th December, disapproves of the same Government resolution, says that the octroi duties were introduced in the Dhandhuka and other municipalities in the mofussil by Government when there was no local self-government, and that if the same Government now think that direct taxation is better than octroi duties they should impress on the minds of the people the advantages of such taxation and take the leading inhabitants of different towns into their confidence instead of taking such a rash and extreme step as they have done in the present case. The paper adds that the franchise of local self-government was never asked by the inhabitants of Dhandhuka and what was bestowed by Government was very meagre, and that consequently the elected members, who have properly discharged their duties towards their electors, should not be discouraged by the withdrawal of the right.]

Remarks on the municipal election rules for Surat said to be published in the Bombay Government Gazette in September last.

57. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 29th November, writes:—The district municipal election rules, as published in the Government Gazette last September in supersession of all former ones, seem to deprive a large number of voters in Surat of their franchise. Those who have been at present deprived of the franchise in Surat are holders of real property worth less than Rs. 3,000 situated within municipal limits, landholders paying a rent of Rs. 48 on holdings within municipal limits, and school-masters drawing salaries of less than Rs. 15 per mensem. The loss of the last class of voters will be more than compensated by the greater number of Government and other public servants getting the franchise by the salary limit being lowered. Landholders in municipal limits are, at the best, very few in number. The real losers will be property-holders. The number of such voters in Surat was originally estimated at 1,206 when the hack-cart drivers were deprived of their voting powers by the minimum of the municipal tax entitling one to vote being raised in 1885. In the case of Surat this limit of property was further lowered to Rs. 2,000 on the representations of the Praja-Hit-Vardhak Sabha by a resolution issued on 7th May 1889; and so the persons who would lose their voting rights would be many in number. But in the case of each municipality there will be special rules, and those towns that have lost the special concessions may get them again when arrangements for their municipal elections will be made. We hope some representation will be made from the people's side on this matter.

58. The Surya Prakash (90), in its issue of the 28th November, says that it is not fair that respectable property-holders at Surat should be deprived of the right of voting, while hack-cart drivers and others, such as dealers in oil, shoe-makers and others residing in small huts or in hired houses, should be considered eligible to vote if they happen to keep a bullock-cart, and requests the municipal authorities to request Government to postpone the coming election till this anomaly is removed.

Remarks in connection with the Sinnar Municipality in the Násik District.

59. A correspondent, writing from Sinnar in the Násik District to the Indu Prakash (14) in its issue of the 7th December, says that the local municipality is at present in a pitiful condition, inasmuch as while the people are complaining of the municipality not properly looking to their convenience and sanitation for want of funds, it is being hard-pressed by Government with various demands and is in danger of being unfavourably reported upon by Government officers if it hesitate to meet these demands. Under such circumstances it is no wonder, adds the correspondent, that the people should wish to be soon relieved from the position in which they have been placed by the kindness of Lord Ripon who granted the privilege of local self-government.

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ा) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = ə in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Akbar, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

Part I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Mahárdshtra Mitrá (50), in its issue of the 10th December, says that if the British Government wishes that the people of all creeds in India should heartily support it against an invasion of India by the Russians, the Indian Government should allow the people of India full liberty, place implicit confidence in them, appoint Indian Civilians to posts to which Europeans alone are at present appointed, admit the Natives into volunteers corps—in short, it should give them all the rights and concessions enjoyed by Englishmen in England, and remove the causes of their discontent, namely, the income-tax, disrespect shown to Bráhmans, propagation of Christianity, &c.

Advice to the British Government to give the people of India all the rights enjoyed by Englishmen in England.

2. In alluding to a telegram received by a European merchant at Madras informing him of the new 3 per cent. duty levied by the French Government on certain goods imported into France from all Indian ports other than Pondicherry, and of the severe blow thus given to the interests of Anglo-Indian merchants, who are rendered uneasy on account of their inability to compete with the merchants of Pondicherry owing to the heavy duty, the Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 13th December, says:—If the Anglo-Indian merchants consider what is going on under their very noses they will be sorry to find that they themselves have given cause to France for doing what she has done. Does the Tariff Act show that all European continental goods are allowed to be imported into India subject to the same duties as are imposed on English goods? If it be not so, why should the English merchants not expect to be paid in their own coin? England and India are both under the rule of Her Gracious Majesty, and yet can these merchants affirm that the same principles of political economy are applied to both? There is nothing strange, then, if France frames rules suited to the promotion of her own interests.

Commercial policy of the British Government with regard to India as compared to that of France towards its own dependencies.

3. The Kesari (45), in its issue of the 15th December, says:—The French Government has imposed a duty of 2 per cent. on sesamum, ground-nuts and other oil-seeds imported into France from Indian ports except those situated in French possessions in India. It would be well if the British Government were to entertain a similar desire to promote the commerce of their own territories, and depart a little from their policy by which India is being much impoverished in the name of free trade in order to supply cheap food to Englishmen at home.

4. The Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 15th December, says:—The Civil and Military Gazette expresses a desire that His Excellency Lord Lansdowne should be re-appointed for a further term of five years as the Viceroy of India on the expiry of the present term. It is quite natural that the expression of such a desire should proceed from a member of the Anglo-Indian press. But the question is, what has His Lordship done to deserve re-appointment to the Viceregal seat? The answer is that during His Lordship's administration the country has not been benefited to any appreciable extent by the introduction of new reforms, nor have the Natives been granted new concessions for which they have been long praying. Lord Lansdowne did not follow the beneficial policy laid down by Lord Ripon, but, on the other hand, His Excellency imitated the objectionable course adopted by Lord Dufferin. In these circumstances, there is no reason why the salutary rule of making new appointments to the Indian Viceroyalty every fifth year should be departed from in the present case.

Disapproval of the recommendation made by the Civil and Military Gazette for the re-appointment of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne as Indian Viceroy for a further term of five years.

5. A correspondent of the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 14th December, writing from Karáchi says:—For the last fortnight a Russian gentleman, accompanied by a Turkish interpreter, has been on a visit to this place, and has gone round to the different localities worth seeing. The gentleman represents himself to be a merchant on a visit to different countries in order to collect information on commercial matters. He is shortly to start for China viâ Beluchistan.

A Russian gentleman at Karáchi.

Treatment of natives of India in Natal and other parts of South Africa.

6. In noticing the reply of the Bombay Government to the memorial from the Honourable Fazulbhoy Visram and certain other merchants and inhabitants of Bombay relating to the treatment of the natives of India residing in Natal, the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, the Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 17th December, says:—It is highly desirable in the interests of the Indians residing in those countries that the consideration of the subject should be soon brought to a conclusion and a movement made to relieve their complaints. But it is feared that considerable difficulties will be experienced in obtaining due relief to the sufferers. The Transvaal and the Orange Free State, being independent republics, are not likely to submit to the dictates of England. Natal is a dependency of England, but, like the dependencies of Australia, Canada, Cape of Good Hope and others, is likely to pay more attention to its own interests than to those of the mother country. The future of the Indians in South Africa, therefore, looks anything but bright. It is to be much regretted that while India has freely adopted the principle of free trade and allows all nations of the world to come and trade in it, British Indian subjects should fail to obtain a welcome reception even in English dependencies.

7. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 17th December, writes:—The reply which Her Majesty's Colonial Secretary has given to a petition from Bombay protesting against the treatment received by the Indians in South Africa, postpones the final settlement to a further date. After all blood is thicker than water. Once Spain cut the ears of a lying British sailor and this inflamed England into a war with that country, but the distress of many of her Indian subjects does not induce her to exhort even mildly the Boers and the Colonists to treat them well. Do we enjoy the right of British subjects all over the world? But when the Jack Union is unable to protect our countrymen in the very colonies which England calls her own, where else are they to consider themselves safe? We think it is the duty of the Government of India to remonstrate with the Colonial Office in strong terms. The matter does not, we think, require any long consideration. Is India to be the football of whoever wishes to insult her?

Remarks on some of Lord Cross's recent utterances at Hanley.

8. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 18th December, writes:—Lord Cross in England reverberates the opinion recently expressed by Lord Lansdowne in India, that the British Government wish for no further aggrandizement, and that they desire to maintain the closest friendship with Native States. Such repeated assurances ought to convince the veriest bigot of the good faith of Government, unless he is absurd enough to maintain that their solemn pledges are all so many hypocritical lies. Here it is not that we have simply to believe the assurances, because they have been given by honourable men speaking under the responsibility of office. We can believe them with more confidence, because it is the interest of the British power now to consolidate its mighty Indian empire with the good will of the princes and the people, and not to disturb its stability by creating in them anxiety and suspicion. The foreign possessions of Great Britain make up a large slice of the earth. She has gained in India all that her ambition may desire, and it is reasonable to suppose that, so far as this country is concerned, she will not add to her territories from pure earth-hunger. The circumstances which urged Lord Dalhousie to embark on an imperial scheme of aggrandizement no longer exist, and the ruling power is satisfied, because it is satiated. The Government have now to strengthen their position by cultivating the good will of the Chiefs and the commonalty of India and by guarding its frontier effectually against foreign attacks. The greatest force which can win the love and respect of the people is justice, and Lord Cross seems to appreciate the truth of this maxim, as he said in his speech at Hanley, that justice was the great keystone of the British policy in India. The British rule is just, except where race-prejudices or powerful British interests occasion a temporary eclipse of justice. The sacrifice of the Indian import duties on cotton goods to the interested cries of Lancashire was certainly no justice to India. When a European is charged with the murder or maltreatment of a Native, it is not justice that he should be acquitted by a jury of his countrymen, in the face of evidence which would be quite sufficient to secure the conviction of a Native, as witness the Ahmednagar murder case. Nor is it justice that he should suffer less punishment than is warranted by the gravity of his offence. Such injustice does not always take place; but whenever it does, it is most lamentable, not so much because a wrong is done in an individual instance, as because it leaves in the mind of the people an unpleasant feeling which it is not wise or politic to generate. This is the true meaning and significance of what Lord Cross has said, that justice is the great keystone of the British policy in India. Sometimes it becomes the keystone of the very existence of a government.

9. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 14th December, writes:—Lord Cross is reported to have recently made a speech at Hanley in which His Lordship made some notable references to India. His Lordship observed that "justice was the great keystone of the British policy in India." If His Lordship meant by "justice" judicial administration, there is probably some force in the observation, although, we are afraid, that keystone is not unfrequently loose, especially in cases of crimes done against Natives by European offenders; but of justice in the larger sense to India from England, we must confess there are even greater failures. Whenever the interests of the English exchequer come in conflict with the Indian, the latter have almost invariably to go to the wall. Another assurance His Lordship gives is that no further aggrandizement is wished for and that the Government desires to maintain the closest friendship with Native States. This declaration, coinciding with that made by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne at St. Andrew's dinner at Calcutta, must, indeed, be highly reassuring. Let us hope the promise will be well kept. [The Native Opinion (15) and the Gujardt Mitrá (84), in their issues of the 13th December, express similar sentiments.]

10. The Gujarát Darpan (82), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—The keystone of Lord Cross's speech at Hanley seems to be the same as that of the Viceroy's recent speeches. Native States have now a new assurance from the Secretary of State about their safety. The Amir of Afghanistan was given a hint that he should rule his subjects properly and remain a friend of England. Referring to Persia, Lord Cross expressed a hope that no pressure would be exercised affecting the independence of that country. For Siam he hoped that the French would not encroach on it. Read between the lines, these bare points reveal that England is very uneasy about the recent developement in Central and Eastern Asian politics. The daring with which Russia has occupied the Pamirs has evidently startled our rulers, and so they wish that Persia, which they have been wooing since Sir John Malcolm went there, would not fall a prey to the Russian wiles. Lord Lamington, who has sounded the note of the French encroachments in Siam, will be happy now that Lord Cross has recognised his fears. Lord Lansdowne eulogised Lord Dufferin's foreign policy only the other day. The praise is premature. The policy is now only being put to the test. While on the N.-W. Frontier Russia is actively carrying on its machinations, on the Eastern Frontier the French are extending their influence in another sphere. The utility of the frontier fortifications themselves has been questioned by such a staunch friend of Government as Mr. Maclean. Lord Cross's speech reveals one important fact, that the English Cabinet looks on the present Asian developements with alarm.

11. The Gujardt Mitrá (84), in its issue of the 13th December, observes:—The sentiments expressed by Lord Cross about India in his speech at Hanley are, no doubt, quite correct, but it is a well-known fact that the authorities do not observe the principles repeated therein, and attempt to take away or curtail the powers of a Native State whenever an opportunity occurs, as can be seen by the recent treatment of Burmah, Kashmere, and Manipur. As, however, in view of Russian designs on India it is desirable to keep Native Chiefs pleased and contented, Lord Cross says that Government do not wish to annex their territories and are desirous of befriending them; but, as a matter of fact, the Chiefs are in such continual dread of British officials that they pay high respect to even the peons of those officials, for they are afraid that they will be made to suffer heavily if any officer fancies himself to be slighted even in the least. If His Excellency Lord Lansdowne wants to ascertain the truth of this statement, His Excellency should pay a visit to the Native States in Gujarát and ask their rulers in confidence if this is true. Their records will show the disappointing replies received by them to their complaints regarding the conduct of political officers. We advise Native Chiefs to be as loyal to the British Government as they were in 1857, because if another foreign power comes in the place of the British Government it will distrust them and take away from them what little they now enjoy. We may mention in jest, and not in real earnest, that if the Russians were to come and settle on the other side of the Indus, British officers would be more kind to Natives. [The Svadesh Bandhu (125), in its issue of the 16th December, expresses some of the above sentiments, and observes that a despatch ought to be sent by Lord Cross to His Excellency the Viceroy, conveying an assurance to the Native Chiefs that he really desires to carry into effect the sentiments expressed by him.]

12. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 13th December, characterises the Viceroy's speech on the occasion of the recent unveiling of the statue of Lord Dufferin at Calcutta as a very striking instance of the way in which the judgment of history could be perverted, expresses disapproval of Lord Dufferin's foreign as well as home policy, and concludes:—We are constrained to observe in the interests of truth and impartial history that the salient points to which His Excellency Lord Lansdowne referred on the occasion of the ceremony of inaugurating the statue are all one-sided. The dark side of the shield was studiously withheld from the public gaze, and so far the eulogy poured was the eulogy of a private individual, and the opinion expressed was the Viceroy's individual opinion. Native India—we mean that large section of it which does not truckle to officialism and cares not for its favours or its frowns—absolutely refuses to endorse that opinion. It is a pure misstatement of facts and must be accepted with a broad reservation.

13. In alluding to the same speech, the Rájyabhakta (116), in its issue of the 15th December, observes;—The name of Lady Dufferin will, perhaps, be long remembered in India, but the statue of Lord Dufferin will hardly serve to immortalise his name. We cannot echo the sentiments of His Excellency Lord Lansdowne in praise of Lord Dufferin. The names of Ráma, Krishna, Arjun, Vikram, Akbar and Shiváji have still remained green in our memory without any statues of them, and Lord Ripon, too, was universally respected and adored by 25 krors of people in India on account of his popular administration. If Lord Lansdowne cares to achieve similar popularity, he must adopt the policy of Lord Ripon.

14. The Makratta (5), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne performed the interesting ceremony of unveiling the statue of Lord Dufferin at Calcutta, and, as is usual on such occasions, made a long speech pointing out the several good features in our late Viceroy. Comparing what we have received and what we expect to receive from His Lordship's administration with what Lord Dufferin did for us, we are not at all willing to subscribe to what the Viceroy says about his predecessor in office. If Lord Dufferin could avoid a war which would have disturbed the peace of the world, Lord Lansdowne is trying to force it upon us, and in praising Lord Dufferin for avoiding the war the present Viceroy tells the nation what they should say about himself. He was made the Earl of Ava, but Lord Lansdowne certainly need not expect an earldom for his Manipur services. If Lord Dufferin's life is usefully read by His Lordship, we may expect a change for the better in the policy of the present Viceroy. Let us hope the change will come.

15. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—His Excellency Lord Lansdowne turned to good advantage the opportunity presented to him by the Dufferin Memorial Committee, the other day, for speaking to his heart's content on the public measures of Lord Dufferin during his Indian Viceroyalty. Lord Dufferin's Indian career is, as it were, an event of yesterday in the political history of this country. It would, therefore, be too premature to speak either in dubious or in definite terms on his policy in connection with some of the important State problems with which he had endeavoured to grapple. Public opinion on his measures, as on those of all statesmen, is diametrically divided in India. But Lord Lansdowne, in his peculiar situation of unveiling a statue erected to perpetuate his predecessor's memory, had rather a civil function to perform, and it is no wonder that he should have done it in the most courteous and friendly terms. But apart from the disputed points of politics, we must candidly admit that the tribute paid to Lord Dufferin for his "extraordinary perception of human nature" and his "rare gift of appropriate expression in speech and in writing" was eminently deserved.

Remarks on Sir George Greaves' address at the distribution of prizes to the students of the Rájkumár College at Rájkot.

16. In noticing the address delivered by Sir George Greaves, the Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army, at the recent distribution of prizes to the students of the Rájkumár College at Rájkot, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 18th December, says:—The administrative policy hitherto followed by His Excellency Lord Lansdowne has spread fear and dissatisfaction among the people, and to pacify them and restore confidence in them seems now to be the desire of the authorities in England and India, for the addresses recently delivered by the highest authorities appear to be intended to serve that purpose. Lord Lansdowne's speech at St. Andrew's dinner on 30th November last struck a new chord, restoring much confidence among the people, who are certain to be more satisfied at the echoes of it that are being produced all round. His Lordship was the first to assure the Native Princes and Chiefs that the policy of Government was to preserve the Native States intact. Soon after this assurance to the trembling princes, the London Times put forward an effusion fully supporting the sentiments expressed by Lord Lansdowne. A few days afterwards Lord Cross, the Secretary of State for India, took an opportunity to confirm Lord Lansdowne's important observations. The address recently delivered by Sir George Greaves to the students of the Rájkumár College is also on the same lines. It is gratifying that Sir George should have contradicted some of the Anglo-Indian statesmen and public writers, who, forgetting that the high and influential position occupied by England among the European States is due to her possession of India, have been asserting that England can well do without India, and that Englishmen are ruling India for her sole benefit—, by asserting that neither England nor India can do without each other. It is shortsighted statesmen alone who do not see the necessity for treating India better at a time when the other dependencies of England are trying to set themselves up independent of the mother country, for making the Indian subjects prosperous and happy, lessening the burden of their taxation, trusting them more and giving them a larger share in the administration of their own country and thereby strengthening the tie of relationship between England and India, both of which countries are sure to be vastly benefited by such a course. The authorities have begun to enrol certain classes of the Natives as volunteers on the frontier and in certain districts of the empire, and have amplified the plan and arrangements commenced under the administration of Lord Dufferin for utilising the armies of Native States for the imperial service. The advice conveyed at such a time by Sir George Greaves to the Rájkumárs is highly gratifying. The meaning of Sir George's advice is that Government is going to trust the Native Princes more than hitherto, and this has raised a hope in the breasts of the Native populations that they too will be more confided in than before and will be soon favoured with the concession of the right of serving as volunteers in defence of their own country. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's other piece of advice to the Rájkumárs to be always employed in useful work is not less precious. They are sure to consider their employment in the British army as a great boon and honour to themselves, and it is to be hoped that Government will make due conveniences for their entering that army and benefiting themselves and the paramount power as pointed out by Sir George.

17. The Gujarátí (33), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—

Comments on Mr. Lee-Warner's speech on the occasion of the prize distribution ceremony at the Cathedral High School, Bombay.

Mr. Lee-Warner's utterances are nothing, if not controversial. He always loves a good fight and will scarcely miss an opportunity for having a fling at the higher castes. We are sometimes inclined to think that it would have been a distinct gain to one of the great political parties in England if Mr. Lee-Warner, with his superabundant energy, undoubted talents, strong resolution, ready pen and fluent tongue, had stayed at home and become a member of Parliament. He has distinctly in him the germs of a great and powerful partyman. Actual participation in the keen political warfare of his country would have developed some of his best qualities to their fullest extent. Nor is that all. We are sure his delivery would have improved and his voice grown sweeter and more melodious; he would have acquired greater tact and skill in dealing with delicate questions, and also something of that rare gift of high-souled sympathy while associating with his own countrymen—a gift of which Burke has spoken so highly, and without which no administrator can even hope to be ranked among successful statesmen, especially when his lot is cast among alien people. Ninety-nine per cent. of English officials in India somehow or other become conservatives in their political creed, and we are not wrong in our surmise that Mr. Lee-Warner is also a conservative, and has been so from the beginning of his official career, and although it is somewhat hazardous to play the political prophet, we are fairly within the mark in saying that he would have, not by a sudden jump, however, risen to a high position. These thoughts naturally occurred to us after a perusal of the speech, with its abrupt variations in thought, that he delivered this week at the Cathedral High School, Bombay.—Here the paper refers to that part of Mr. Lee-Warner's speech in which he congratulated the children of the Cathedral High School on their being born Englishmen and being free from the trammels of Indian caste system, and observes:—Is Mr. Lee-Warner quite sure that free Englishmen in the very midst of free institutions do not surrender their judgment and conscience to party purposes and to spurious public opinion? Will he say what government by party factions means? What is the historical significance of the existence of two houses of legislature—the House of Commons and the House of Lords? Is it not a political caste system, not to mention the social caste system necessarily involved in such an arrangement? Is there no ruling caste in India of Western Bráhmans, and is it not a fact that members of this heaven-born caste have at times to surrender their judgment and individuality to the caste and caste rules? It is the very law of the existence of every organization, and it is only a question of degrees and not a difference in kind as regards the despotism exercised by any compact body, taken as a whole, over its individual units. The illustration selected by the speaker was certainly an unhappy one, and even objectionable, seeing that it is only calculated to breed supercilious pride in the youths addressed and contempt for the surrounding races. We do not, however, mean to suggest that there is no caste despotism, nor are we prepared to defend it in its objectionable forms. We only contend that the illustration was quite unsuited to the occasion, especially when it is remembered that there are many who are in favour of maintaining the greatest caste system in India, namely, the governing caste and the caste of the ruled. Mr. Lee-Warner is a clever and incisive critic, but not a critic with a comprehensive or far-reaching grasp, nor sufficiently endowed with that power of what in mental science is called power of self-introspection. Bacon was, indeed, a great genius. He criticised many things with an ability that has not been surpassed. But he, too, was a victim of the fallacies of his own creation, and one need not be surprised if Mr. Lee-Warner's armoury of criticism supplies instruments for effective attack on his own infallible utterances. If the concluding portion of his speech were closely scrutinised, one could easily understand the general mental attitude of the speaker towards the surrounding races. Under the circumstances of the occasion it could not be a full reflection. It looks like a subdued reflection, and we are not sure if the children of the school would have been any the worse if those words of advice had not been addressed. It is, however, some consolation that even Mr. Lee-Warner sees some good in the caste-ridden population around, because he was good enough to ask his audience to make the most of the best that they discover in Native character. English history illustrates the triumph of free, and not of slavish instincts, and we hardly think that the instinct of obedience which is so firmly ingrained in our national character deserves to be encouraged further. At the same time it is somewhat significant that the expression "liberty" is so easily converted in India into "obedience" by high-placed Indian officials in their sermons to the rising generation of their own race. While regretting that we are not pleased with the mode in which Mr. Lee-Warner conveyed his words of advice, which a less controversial speaker would have skilfully done in more appropriate and conciliatory words, we must say we agree with him in his views about the introduction of the vernaculars into the University curriculum. He urged most cogent reasons for the recognition of the vernaculars, and we hope their opponents will carefully study Mr. Lee-Warner's observations. If English education is to be fruitful, the ideas and sentiments contained in the literature of the West must be thoroughly digested and assimilated, and the best test of this process is supplied when they are conveyed to the ignorant masses around through the medium of their mother-tongue. The moral and intellectual elevation of the country, as a whole, depends upon the diffusion of right and sound ideas throughout the whole mass of population, and by shutting the gates of the University against the vernaculars of the country one of the best civilizing agencies is criminally thrown away. Mr. Lee-Warner's words on this topic are words of far-seeing wisdom, and the champions of the vernaculars ought to be thankful to him for his able advocacy in their behalf.

Remarks on the composition of the Land Indebtedness Commission.

18. The Mahomedan Herald (4), in its issue of the 11th December, writes:—We are sorry to note that no Mahomedan has been appointed on the Commission recently appointed by the Government of India to enquire into the working of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act. The members of this Commission should have been chosen more from the Native section of the presidency than from the official, who are not likely to know the details as well as the true facts of the case. We shall anxiously watch the proceedings of the Commission.

Remarks in connection with a rumour about the appointment of a commission to enquire into the question of volunteering.

19. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 17th December, writes:—According to some of our Bengal contemporaries, a commission to consider the question of volunteering and admission of Natives thereto is to sit in Calcutta at the instance of Government. This question has engaged considerable attention and been made the subject of an important resolution of the National Congress. Opinions, however, have been expressed in some quarters that even when the said privilege is granted, only a few Natives will benefit by it. But experience appears to us to be a better test than mere surmises, and one may expect a larger number of people out of our vast populations to make use of the privilege when granted. Moreover, our disability to bear arms involves an important principle which, as citizens of an important commonwealth, we cannot allow to stand. But the difficulties are obvious, and though the present Commander-in-Chief of the Madras Army and His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught may have expressed themselves in favour of the grant of the said privilege, Sir Frederick Roberts is said to be decidedly against the movement,—a circumstance not unlikely to weigh much against our people in the consideration of this question by Government. But the very fact that such two high authorities—General Dormer and the Duke of Connaught—should advocate this cause in no indistinct terms, is an advantage of exceedingly great value. It is only a few months since a proposal to found a military college after the name of the Duke was laid before the Government, though, unfortunately, the proposal did not receive its sanction. The supposed unfitness of the Natives as to their physique can no longer be allowed owing to the fact that the Marátha soldier comes from the very people, the exponents of whom ask for the privilege of volunteering.

The Indian National Congress to be shortly held at Nágpur.

20. In noticing the rough draft of resolutions proposed by the reception committee to be submitted to the subjects committee at the coming Indian National Congress to be held at Nágpur, the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 17th December, says:—The great and genuine earnestness with which the work of the coming Congress is being done raises a hope that it will prove as successful as its predecessors. Any person attentively and carefully considering the resolutions proposed to be brought before the Congress could come to no other conclusion than that the labours of the Congress would vastly conduce to the welfare of India and her people, that Government ought to sympathize with the aims and objects of the Congress, and that those who undervalued or despised its work were either ignorant of the true aims and objects of this national movement, or, if they knowingly ignored them, were not the friends of India. It is to be regretted that some persons should be so indiscreet as to oppose the labours of the Congress for no better reason than the worthless one of race distinctions or animosities.

Candidature of Mr. Dádábhái Navroji to enter Parliament, and the Indian National Congress.

21. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 18th December, says :—The resolution to be brought before the coming Indian National Congress to be held at Nágpur in connection with the candidature of Mr. Dádábhái Navroji for Central Finsbury is expected to produce a salutary effect on the electors of that constituency. The proposed resolution, if unanimously passed at the Congress with due cheers, would be a national appeal to the Finsbury electors, who, it is to be hoped, will not fail to give it due weight; and those who have recently paid a visit to England are of opinion that such an appeal will certainly produce a good result. It is very encouraging, indeed, that Lord Ripon should desire that the leaders of the Liberal party would arrange for the better success of Mr. Dádábhái by putting him forward as a candidate for entrance into Parliament from a safer constituency than Central Finsbury.

Remarks in connection with the grain-riots at Kurnool in the Madras Presidency, and the means resorted to for putting down such riots.

22. Referring to the Kurnool riots in the Madras Presidency, the Kálhidwár Times (3), in its issue of the 11th December, writes :—Of late famines in this country have become almost annual occurrences and people are dying of starvation; but no one has a word of sympathy to say in their behalf. It is shameful to fire at a hungry mob, who, to satisfy the pangs of hunger, help themselves with grain when they believe that the authorities have inexcusably neglected their duty. Ten years ago most timely precautions were taken to meet famines. Sir Cecil Beadon was disgraced because of his failure to take steps to meet a famine in Orissa. Lord Northbrook spent several millions in Behar, and Lord Lytton, unpopular as he was, had to promise that he would never permit "a man, woman, or child to die of (starvation)." Grain riots should not be stopped by firing at the innocent mob, but by providing them with food. But the Government of India has not money sufficient to alleviate the misery of the poor and to save their lives; it has only sufficient money for frontier expeditions and for useless extravagances.

Alleged distress and scarcity now existing in several parts of India, and the Famine Relief Fund raised by the Government of India.

23. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 14th December, writes :—Humanly speaking, there is now no doubt that very grave scarcity, bordering on famine, is not far off. The circumstances of the last great famine are repeating themselves, with this difference that the area affected this year is even wider than that affected during that terrible period. Of course, the melancholy lessons taught by that time do not seem to be entirely thrown away, and, consequently, there is discernible in the Government of to-day a greater sense of duty towards those who are now on the border-land of starvation. But there is one point in this connection which we are anxious to emphasize. The people of this country have been, for the last 18 years and more, taxed for famine insurance at the rate of a kror and a half a year; and yet during all this period no more than about 80 or 90 lakhs have been spent in the country by Government on actual famine relief. A sum, therefore, amounting to over 18 krors of rupees, extracted from the people for the sole purpose of preventing loss of life in times of scarcity and famine, has been absorbed by the Government of India in its general revenues, and till now applied to purposes other than those for which it was, with solemn promises and assurances, raised. The Government is now morally bound to spend as much of this sum as may be required to prevent distress and suffering during the present crisis. The money was specially raised for meeting the ravages of famines, and the country has therefore a right to look entirely and exclusively to Government for relief and protection.

Alleged distress and scarcity in the Deccan, and suggestions to His Excellency Lord Harris in the matter.

24. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 17th December, writes:— A few days ago we ventured to draw the attention of the Bombay Government to the serious outlook in the Deccan, and appealed to it for timely relief. The accounts that we have received since then greatly strengthen what we then wrote. Now we are in a position to say that the Government will have to face a famine in that part of the presidency. Our information is to the effect that the crops have failed, that the prices of food grains are rapidly rising, that there is not a sufficient supply of water, that the cattle are greatly suffering for want of fodder and water, that they are dying in numbers, and that those that are yet struggling between life and death are either being abandoned by their owners or are being sold at nominal prices; that in some places the low-caste people are living upon cattle, and that even children are being abandoned by their parents on account of their inability to maintain them. In short, the people are in despair and are eagerly looking for relief from the paternal Government. It is, we are constrained to say, a matter of deep regret, nay, of astonishment, that the Government should have so long failed, as is apparent from the absence of any action on its part, to do its duty in such a crisis to its suffering subjects. We cannot believe that it is in ignorance of their real condition; and if it is really so, we must say that the local officers, who are its eyes, have failed in the discharge of their duties. It is only now that we are hearing of the district officers moving a little. Such is official lethargy! We learn that the Acting Collector of Ahmednagar has recommended the opening up of relief works and that the Acting Commissioner of the Southern Division has suggested the throwing open of the Government pasture lands in the reserved forest numbers for the sustenance of cattle. But much more will have to be done. His Excellency Lord Harris should, we venture to think, abandon for a time the pleasures of the Government House, and, copying the example of Lord Wenlock in the Madras Presidency, run down to the affected districts. His presence there will have an electric effect both upon the district officials and also upon the people. Such a step on His Lordship's part will greatly enhance his reputation as a vigorous administrator. It is, indeed, a misfortune that this year we have tales of famine from so many parts of the country. We have distress in Rajputana, in Madras, in some parts of Bengal, and now in the Deccan. Famines are, in fact, now becoming frequent. This is especially regrettable, because India was fortunate enough in ancient times to escape from them. There is nothing wonderful in this, because her land was so fertile. Even foreigners were struck by this happy circumstance and did not fail to record their impressions to that effect. Then the paper quotes an extract from Megasthenes, Greek ambassador at the court of Chandragupta, an Indian king in ancient history, in which India has been described as a rich country which was seldom visited by famines, and says that the present frequent liability of the country to famines is due to free trade and large exports of grain.

25. The Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 17th December, writes:— News is received of the increasing distress experienced in the Deccan. On account of scarcity of fodder, the rayats of the Bijápur and other Deccan districts are selling their cows for a rupee per head. It is very gratifying news that the Commissioner of the Central Division has requested Government to permit the rayats in his districts to graze their cattle on forest lands reserved under the forest laws. But what about the unfortunate rayats themselves whose distress and misery cannot be less than those of their cattle with which they are parting for little or nothing, which they would never do unless they were themselves reduced to extreme distress. The rayats, therefore, deserve the earliest attention from Government, which should, temporarily at least, lessen the severities of the forest, salt, ábkári and other laws that have been found to work harshly in ordinary times, and should for a time suspend the operation of the principles of free trade by prohibiting the export of wheat and other food grains that are being exported to Europe in extensive quantities..

26. The Kesari (45), in its issue of the 15th December, says:—Itis now almost certain that in Dhárwár, Belgaum, Bijápur, Miraj, Jamkhandi, Sátára, a Sholápur and some other parts of the Deccan famine will make its appearance in fearful form. It is said that in several places in the Karnátik seeds have not been sown at all. Now there is no hope of rain. The little store of grain that was in these districts was carried away by dealers to Madras where famine made its appearance long ago. Prices have already risen very high and there is fear of an enormous increase soon occurring in them. Eighty-six per cent. of the population are agriculturists, who hardly get sufficient food to eat even in days of abundance. There is no doubt, therefore, that living will be a very hard problem with them this year. The miseries of the cattle need not be described. They can better be imagined from the fact that at Dhárwár and Bijápur buffocks worth Rs. 50 or so a head can be had, it is said, for less than annas 4, and that at Bijápur several bullocks have been abandoned by their owners, and five cows were sold for a rupee in the cattle market at Sholápur! The butchers are the only purchasers of cattle. These are all signs of a famine. Government do not seem to have yet taken any steps in this matter. They will now, perhaps, begin relief works, but in addition to these they should give more attention in other directions. Government show their sympathy with agriculturists excepting in money matters. They will issue resolutions, put forth a Relief Act, appoint commissions and do everything except remission of the land tax! It is said that in spite of the alarming condition of the people in the Madras Presidency on account of famine the unrecovered land revenue amounts to Rs. 27½ only. Similar rigour will, it is feared, be now practised on this side. The Governor-General will say with a sigh that there is famine in almost all the Deccan districts, but will never think of remissions. We therefore request Government not to be cruel and exacting like the Márwádi, but to grant remissions wherever needed.

Suggestions to Government for the relief of the famine-stricken people in the Bijápur District.

27. The Rámdás (17), in its issue of the 12th December, writes:—The primary duty of Government under the present circumstances in Bijápur is to look to the necessities of men and cattle. Thousands of bullocks and cows are sold to butchers every day for a few annas each. The butchers are rendering valuable help to famine in the work of destruction. They are purchasing cattle, not for flesh, of whose absence they are well aware, but for hides, horns and bones. This free destruction of cattle will tell very seriously upon the agricultural condition of the district in spite of good and sufficient rain next year. No facilities are given to the people to bring hay or fodder from other districts by lowering or remitting the railway charges. Railways ought to be more liberal in these days. Government should remit the assessment on lands that have yielded no produce. If total remission cannot be granted a partial one should be given, and the rayats should be saved from total ruin. If remission of assessment is believed to inflict a heavy loss, Government should at least be pleased to realise this year's assessment by two or three annual instalments. The rayats have scarcely recovered from the effects of the terrible famine of 1877, and have no means left to hold out and stand on their own legs. They are helplessly thrown by an absence of rain upon the mercy of Government, who, they are confident, will work with heart and soul for their good, will sympathize with them in their miserable condition and will try their utmost to assuage their sufferings as much as possible. About two hundred applications, we hear, have been made to Government for loans, but to no purpose. It is a strange anomaly that the rayats in the neighbouring district of Sholápur are getting loans from Government, while the poor and unfortunate cultivators of this famine-stricken district should be denied that help. We fervently hope that Government will be pleased to advance money to cultivators at this nick of time upon easy terms, and save them from the appalling consequences of a terrible famine. The first and foremost thing the Government is called upon to do is to arrange for a sufficient supply of corn. Exportation of wheat and jowári has left no stock sufficient for the wants of the people of Bijápur, and the prevention of further exportation is highly desirable. Prices should be fixed and should not be allowed to vacillate. A sudden rise in prices creates riots and disturbances, and therefore its prevention is principally desirable. The immediate opening of relief works is of utmost importance. The labouring classes having no work to do, have begun to commit petty thefts, and if relief works are not soon opened the prisons will be over-flooded by convicts. Relief works should be entrusted to pensioners or well-to-do persons of the district, and not to officers of Government drawing large salaries. The sums required for paying salaries to great officers, if saved, can be utilised for making provision for a good number of labourers. The relief works to be introduced should be such as would promote the agricultural prosperity of the district. Digging of tanks and wells and the construction of canals are highly desirable. These suggestions, we sanguinely hope, will be taken into consideration by the local Government and immediate steps for the relief of the famine-stricken people will be taken.

Remarks on the levée recently held in the Bombay Secretariat by His Excellency Lord Harris.

28. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 13th December, speaks of His Excellency Lord Harris' levée at the Secretariat on 9th instant as follows:—The annual State pantomime or "monkey show" came off at the Secretariat on Wednesday last, when over 400 amiabilities, infatuated enough to do pooja to nothing in particular, bowed and were bowed out amidst all the formalities of a Chinese ceremonial. But the Chinese are supposed to be barbarous, so we look with an indulgent eye on the senseless obeisances in which they indulge. But the English are one of the most practical and hard-headed civilised nations of the globe, and withal opposed to senseless ceremonials. Then why on earth do they keep up this meaningless pantomime of what is called a State levée? Are there no "social reformers" to put an end to this monkey show?

Approval of the appointment of A'ga Akbar Sháh as the Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year.

29. The Káseide Mumbai (109), in its issue of the 14th December, approves of the appointment of A'ga Akbar Sháh, uncle of the present A'ga Khán, as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year, says that it will give satisfaction to the Khojás and Moguls, but adds that a Suni Mahomedan or a Bohra gentleman had better claims to this honour since it was once conferred on a Khoja gentleman, namely Mr. Rahimtula Mahomed Sayáni, and requests Government to bear in mind the claims of the Suni Mahomedans and Bohras in future. [The Gujarátí (83) and the Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in their issues of the 13th December, and the Pársi Tíkákár (114), in that of the 15th idem, express their satisfaction at the appointment.]

A complaint against European soldiers and a request to Government in the matter.

30. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 13th December, observes that European soldiers are generally illiterate and wanting in good breeding, and when their regiments are transferred from one place to another they sometimes commit serious crimes in those places where their regiments happen to encamp for a short time, and remarks:—It is said that recently on the march of a certain European regiment from Ahmedabad to Poona a soldier stole a mule from a villager at Umravati and carried it with him to Broach without being detected. On a complaint from the owner the soldier was merely directed by his commanding officer to restore the animal to the owner, but was not at all punished for the offence. There was also another case in which some four soldiers are said to have insulted the Pársi community by entering their Tower of Silence at Párdi in the Surat District after breaking the lock, and when this conduct was reported to the commanding officer the aggrieved parties were simply told that their loss would be recouped, but nothing is known as to what has been done in the matter. Our correspondent from Navsari also complains about the conduct of European soldiers and cites two cases which are being widely talked of there. In one assault is said to have been committed by three soldiers upon a shepherdess and in the other upon a Bohra woman.

Alleged illegal actions of Magistrates and municipalities under the supposed authority of legislation and the people's ignorance.

31. The Madritta (5), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—An interesting case under the Income-tax Act is reported from Madras which ought to throw sufficient light upon a dubious point. Many labour under the wrong impression that there can be no appeal to show that one has been wrongfully assessed. Under this impression many abstain from preferring appeals and encourage income-tax officers to indulge in their vagaries. We know of a case in which a certain gentleman is in the official reports shown as possessed of a source of income from house-rent, whereas he has no house to let. We asked this gentleman to submit an appeal, but he has not done so, because he was told that no appeal could lie on that ground. The Madras case we refer to contains the same issue. The case did go up in appeal and was enquired into. It is quite immaterial to us how it was decided. It is not as regards the income-tax alone that Government officers suppose they can do certain things under the authority of an Act of the legislature, whereas, really speaking, the Act does not contain any provision authorizing the Magistrate to indulge as he wishes. If another instance of magisterial vagaries and people's ignorance were wanted, we might mention that municipalities often refuse permission to build on the ground that the site to be built upon does not belong to him who gives notice. Under the Municipal Act the municipality has nothing whatever to do with the ownership. People quietly submit to such illegal orders and seriously inconvenience themselves. Closely connected with this wanton conduct of municipalities is that of Magistrates who put their spoke in the wheels and ask the municipality to refuse permission on the ground that the site belongs to Government. A weak municipality bows down to the decision of the revenue authorities and refuses permission. The poor applicant weeps over his misfortune and gives up the point in despair. It is in such little matters that tyranny is exercised and people want relief. We want local reformers, perhaps more urgently than national ones. As an illustration of this back-door tyranny we mention the case of the Dhamdheres in Budhwár Peth of the Poona City. This case was decided by the municipality at its last meeting. People who have their houses in the city ought to study the particulars of this case.

A suggestion to the Bombay Government in connection with the appointment of the President of the bench of Honorary Magistrates at Poona.

32. The same newspaper writes :—Some time ago we referred to the subject of preparing the list of the Honorary Magistrates for the Poona City, and especially with respect to the appointment of the President of the bench. We again draw the attention of Government to the subject in the hope that as the time of appointing the President is near at hand, some definite principle may be laid down in conformity with which the choice may be made. It is certainly unjust that Government officers should be allowed to play with the rights and claims of persons who serve Government without remuneration. We do not advocate any special test. Let Government fix upon any, but let it be adhered to firmly so that no one may feel aggrieved by the nomination. Learning, seniority of honorary service, age, and position in the society would each supply a test, and no one need complain if one or two of these be fixed upon. But when the matter is left to the sweet will and pleasure of the district officers it affords scope for favouritism which, we need not say, should be avoided as far as possible in all cases. We hope our suggestion will be taken into consideration in making the next nomination.

33. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 13th December, makes the same suggestion and adds :—The work of preparing the list of Honorary Magistrates in Poona according to their grades has been entrusted to our old City Magistrate, Mr. Plunkett, who does it as he likes, inasmuch as he places a junior Magistrate at the top and puts a senior at the bottom of the list. It is the duty of the District Magistrate to see that justice is done, but he passes on the list, without going into its merit, to Government, who, in their turn, blindly adopt it, and thus there is no redress of an injustice done by Mr. Plunkett. This gentleman having been a Magistrate in Poona for nearly fifteen years past has formed many acquaintances or has otherwise come in close contact with many persons in the city, and so an arrangement which is just in his opinion raises many doubts in the minds of the people. In order to provide against such contingencies Government have ruled that a Government officer should not be kept at one place for more than a certain number of years ; but from Mr. Plunkett being in Poona for the last fifteen years, we surmise this rule is made applicable to Natives alone. If such be the case, we should request Government to make such a declaration once for all for the information of the public.

A criminal prosecution at Ahmednagar for selling an alleged obscene picture and remarks in connection with it.

34. The same newspaper refers to the complaint which is said to have been filed under Section 292 of the Indian Penal Code before a Magistrate at Ahmednagar by a Rev. Mr. Smith against the Ahmednagar agent of the Poona Chitra-shála Press for selling copies of a picture of Yashoda and her child, the Hindu god Krishna, in which the mother is shown to be suckling the child, and remarks :—Section 292 applies to obscene publications and pictures, but we do not see what obscenity could there be in Yashoda's suckling the child. Do the Europeans consider it obscene for a mother to feed her child at the breast? Is it because it is a Hindu picture that it is to be condemned as obscene by Englishmen, who are conquerors, and we are to be punished for it? If the news of the complaint filed at Ahmednagar be true, oppression will have reached its culminating point. It is nearly five thousand years ago that the god Krishna lived, and during this time thousands of copies of this picture have been published, but no Indian ruler or his subjects ever considered it obscene A Christian in Bombay recently gave publicity to such falsehoods about Krishna as would make one's hair stand on their ends, and now the Rev. Mr. Smith files a complaint in connection with the picture of Yashoda and Krishna. This shows there is much similarity between the reign of Aurangzebe, who demolished Hindu temples, and the British rule. Things will not take a serious turn if Government suitably deals in time with those who oppress the Hindus in matters relating to their religion. The picture in question is not obscene in the opinion of the Hindus, who look on it with great reverence. The Hindus consider it obscene that a European husband and wife should walk through the streets arm in arm, still they do not mind it, considering that it is a prevailing custom among Europeans.

35. In alluding to the same prosecution the Chandánshu (26), in its issue of the 13th December, calls the attention of the Rev. Mr. Smith and the trying Magistrate to two statues, one of a female stark naked and the other of a male standing by her side and making, under the influence of passion, a movement of his hand pointing to the parts of her body the mention of which decency forbids, which statues are said to be found in a place of public resort like the Victoria Gardens in Bombay, and which are disgusting and outrageous to the feelings of ladies and gentlemen visiting the locality.

Alleged abominable slave traffic in white girls from the Continent and the Levant, the nuisance resulting from it in Bombay, and remarks in connection therewith.

36. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 13th December, writes :—The abominable slave traffic in white girls from the Continent and the Levant, to which a correspondent of the Bombay Gazette lately drew the attention of the public, is one which needs to be immediately put a stop to by the strong arm of our humane and Christian Government. We have heard of this demoralising trade before, but we never had any conception of its enormity till the perusal of that correspondent's letter. No city can fare well, however wealthy it may be, where such unspeakable traffic, opposed to all sense of freedom and revolting in all its aspects, could be allowed to flourish. The abominations of Sukláji and other streets have now been fully exposed to day-light. They are shocking enough in all conscience, and it is time an indignant protest from the public was made against this peculiar vice, which is daily making rapid strides in Bombay and fast corrupting the morals of its weaker citizens. There is not the least doubt that Bombay is beastly sinful in this respect. To our mind it presents a truthful picture of the cities to which Ruskin has referred in those burning and imperishable words of his—words which will endure so long as the English language exists on the surface of this earth. Bombay is fast earning the infamy of the cities which Ruskin has described in the passage referred to. Is the Government going to sleep over the exposures made by our contemporary's correspondent? Is the police so powerless that it cannot touch the vile traffickers and deport them bag and baggage out of Bombay? Is the Magistracy so blind to the enormities of the rascally gang that it cannot represent matters to its superiors and urge for a speedy reform of the criminal law, if that law be insufficient to seize these monsters of vice who are soon converting Bombay into a huge blazing furnace of sodom? Is Bombay society, European and Native so far depraved that it can sit coolly over the pollution which is even now rotting and raging through the bones and sinews of the people? Where are the English clergy? Cannot the good Lord Bishop initiate a movement in this matter, and call a monster meeting in the Town Hall to express the unanimous voice of the citizens against this growing vice and this abominable traffic, which victimises innocent girls, wrecks their lives, and fattens and battens on their forced incontinence? If the evils of opium moved his heart and agitated his breast, are we to understand that the rank evils of this most ignoble and brutal traffic will less move him? Where are the Purity Societies? Where is the redoubtable Mr. Dyer, who so relentlessly pursued the diabolic dahie of cantonments and brought to bay the imperious and defiant Quarter Master General? Where are the sturdy lieutenants of Mrs. Josephine Butler whose perseverance, energy and earnestness succeeded, with the instrumentality of the House of Commons, in ridding India of a plaguy and pestilential piece of legislation? Where, in brief, is the public spirit of Bombay? If it be not slumbering, it ought to be awake to the imperative duty of overcoming, with its giant hands, this new Python of immorality which is fast converting Bombay into a loathsome sepulchre, white from without, but inwardly full of uncleanliness and festering corruption. See how this hideous and foul class of placeurs prowl about in the evening where society congregate to hear the sweet strains of music or breathe the pure air of heaven. Is the Apollo Bandar safe from these rascals? Is the sacred purity of the ancient Esplanade Bandstand free from their invasion? Do they not infest other respectable quarters where grown-up males and females, youths and girls, married and unmarried, resort? Has nobody marked how vice bedecked in her gayest colours and glittering gegaw- shamelessly flaunts before our very faces, boldly parades on the foot-paths, and unblushingly confronts us, fearless of law or authority? Is there to be no remedy for the prevention of these demoralising exhibitions of the vulgar venuses, dark and white? We repeat that if there be left sufficient moral instinct and spark of purity among our citizens they ought not to rest in slumber a day longer till they have moved the authorities to stamp out the abominable traffic and repress the other evils which refined civilisation and wealth have unfortunately imported here,—evils unspeakable which are fast converting Bombay into a second sodom.

37. In noticing two cases of dacoity, one in the Ahmednagar and the other in the Kánara district, appeals in which were disposed of last week by the Bombay High Court, the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 13th December, says:—In the former case about half a dozen armed dacoits plundered the houses of two or three wealthy Márwádis in the village and carried off property worth upwards of Rs. 6,000 in spite of the villagers, whose number was large but who did not dare oppose the dacoits. This is not the first occurrence of the kind. The cause of this is that while honest and orderly people are prohibited by the Arms Act from possessing any arms of offence or defence, dacoits secure weapons of different kinds without caring in the least for the law, and attack and plunder the peaceful inhabitants. The Kánara case shows that the Thugs have not yet disappeared from the country. Though dacoits and Thugs are punished by courts of justice when convicted, their number does not seem to have lessened.

The number of dacoits and Thugs does not seem to have lessened owing to the stringency of the Arms Act.

38. The Kaira Vartamán (108), in its issue of the 16th December, says that in the Kaira District the cultivators of land suffer heavy losses, and are impoverished by stray cattle, monkeys, &c., destroying standing crops, and recommends Mr. H. R. Cooke, Acting Collector, to issue for a nominal fee licenses to the cultivators in each village to possess arms in order to protect their crops from the devastations of beasts and birds.

A request to Government to issue licenses to keep arms to the cultivators of land in the Kaira District.

Part II.—Education.

39. The Sudhárak (19), in its issue of the 14th December, writes:—As a rule, we have not much sympathy with the criticism to which University examiners are often subjected by unsuccessful candidates and their friends and guardians. There is no gainsaying the fact that now and then some queer freak on the part of a new or eccentric examiner creates a sudden disturbance in the usual nature of question papers and brings to grief a few candidates who might otherwise have done better. But oftener than not, the complaints uttered against this much-abused class have little ground to stand upon, as almost every unsuccessful candidate seems to think that he is, as it were, in duty bound to attribute his failure to anything but his own want of preparation. But we must confess that this year's results have considerably shaken our faith in this theory. That less than one-third the total number of candidates should be able to get through the First B. A. Examination, and less than one-fourth through the P. E., is something truly astonishing. No less than 683 candidates had appeared this year for the Previous Examination of our University, of whom 524 have been asked to knock at the door again. This is nothing if not a regular slaughter, and it is not possible to contemplate the disastrous result with a light heart. The present P. E. course is admittedly lighter than the old one, and there is nothing to show that this year's candidates were creatures of extraordinarily poor brains or that they were neglectful of their studies in an uncommon degree. On the contrary, the addition of a year to the old course justifies the presumption that they must have been, if anything, more assiduous than what P. E. students generally are. At least a hundred deserving students, therefore, it might fairly be concluded, have been wrongfully detained in the Previous class this year, and one may well ask, who is responsible for the loss of money they have incurred and the painful shock their feelings must have sustained,—a shock which, in not a few cases, might throw a blight on entire careers? Perhaps some of the examiners, smarting still under the powerful attacks made on their class during the course of the year by Mr. Mehta and others, have thought fit to "kick wildly and kick in all directions." Be that as it may, we think it is the duty of the Syndicate to enquire into the causes that have made the P. E. result so disastrous. Some latitude might certainly be allowed to individual tastes and individual judgment, but vagaries so harmful ought certainly to be put down with a strong hand and in no half-hearted manner.

A complaint against the Bombay University in connection with examinations.

40. Among other things "An Elphinstonian" complains, in the issue of the Gujarátí (33) of 13th December, about the universal secrecy observed by the Bombay University as follows:—No State records are preserved with greater care than the records of our University. Students are always complaining that their papers are lost, that mistakes are committed in summing up their marks, and that the examiners instead of carefully examining their papers hurriedly pass them over. Let everything be done with open doors in the University. Let it even return the papers of students to them, if they like to have them, with a small fee. Let us have the number of marks each student gets not only in each subject but in each question. We shall then be better able to handle figures. We shall be able to compare the number of marks the students obtain from different examiners, the average number of marks obtained in different languages, the number of students that fail in different subjects, and many other particulars. All the complaints of students will then cease. At present I shall give one instance, though I can cite many to show that there is some truth in the complaints of students. Some two years ago one Mr. Saraiya was declared to have failed in the B.A. Examination. He at once asked to see the number of marks he had obtained in different subjects. The demand was not acceded to. After great difficulty he was able to get his marks, and lo! there was a mistake of one hundred marks committed by a clerk in summing them up. The mistake was brought to the notice of the examiners and he was declared to have passed the examination in the second class. Now, who is to remunerate him for the trouble and anxiety caused by this unlucky mistake? But let that be put aside, and tell us how we can be sure that this was a rare occurrence when students complain of such mistakes every year. Let the University search its important records and tell us how many students have been sacrificed by such mistakes up to date.

Part III.—Municipalities.

Comments on the reply received by the Bombay Municipality from the Supreme Government to their memorial about police charges.

41. The Rást Goftár (38), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—It looks as if the Bombay Municipal Corporation will, after all, have to bear the increased burden of the police charges. The Bombay Government suddenly sprung this charge upon the municipality a few months ago, and the Corporation made an appeal to their conscience on the injustice and inequity of the demand. That body was angry and alarmed at the thought that it was treated as a veritable milch-cow by the Government to be drawn upon and drained dry under one pretence or another. This was, of course, a very exaggerated view of the situation, but a majority of the Councillors felt it strongly and expression was given to that feeling in some burning and impassioned sentiments in their memorial which have now met with a cold-blooded sneer from Mr. Secretary Lee-Warner. The earnest protest of the Corporation has made no impression whatever upon the Bombay Government, and, what is worse, it has failed utterly to evoke the sympathy of the Supreme Government either. In their view of the municipal liability with respect to the payment of the police charge both the Governor in Council and the Governor-General in Council are cordially at one. As too often happens in such cases, the higher authority has echoed and emphasized the opinion of the subordinate power, and between the two, we are afraid, the Corporation will have to find the means anyhow. There is a last ray of hope in an appeal to the Secretary of State, but it would be a wonder if the official mind at home were to think much differently from the official mind in India. And so the Corporation being by far the weakest party, will have to go to the wall, since it will certainly be thrust to the wall if it did not take it of its own unwilling motion. The proposal will involve an additional outlay of Rs. 1,00,000 per annum on the part of the municipality,—an excess which in these days of expenditure overtopping the revenue it will be not an easy thing to meet. Mr. Lee-Warner has made a great point of the fact that in May 1881 the Corporation had, of its own motion, adopted a resolution that Section 133 (b) be amended as follows: "The annual expenses of the police shall be from time to time determined by Government, and three-fourths of the amount so determined shall, on the requirement of Government, be paid out of the municipal funds." We suppose that when they passed this resolution the Corporation did not contemplate such a large increase in the police expenditure as has been now proposed. They went by the figure which stood at the time. They looked only at the present without taking the least thought of future contingencies, and herein we admit they made a serious mistake. But is it for the Government to catch at a tactical blunder to enforce their demand? Would it not better suit their dignity and their power to confine themselves to the broad issues raised by justice and equity? Attempt at a dialectical triumph is as much out of place in such a grave controversy as rhetorical flourishes. One of the strong points in the memorial of the Corporation was that the municipalities of Calcutta and Madras contribute nothing towards their police. It is urged in answer to this that the position of Madras is exceptional, though it is not stated in what respect it is so. We do not know but that its poverty may be the exceptional circumstance. As for Calcutta, it is stated that the city can, "under normal conditions, be legitimately compared with Bombay in this respect, but the normal conditions which would justify such a comparison do not exist at the present time." It is admitted that the Calcutta Municipality was in March 1888 relieved of the charge of Rs. 2,00,000 on account of police, but it is added that this relief was given subject to the condition that the municipality should engage to spend this sum annually on sanitary improvements in the suburban area which has been amalgamated with the town of Calcutta. We have no knowledge here of the conditions under which the consolidation has taken place, and therefore we cannot tell how far the case of Calcutta is different from that of Bombay for instituting a comparison in respect of the police charge. But to obvious reason it appears that sanitary improvements form a necessary and legitimate charge to be incurred by any municipality, and that it is to be presumed that the suburban area will pay a tax just as well as the town of Calcutta for the purpose of supplying means for effecting sanitary improvements. If the Calcutta Municipality has been relieved of the police charge on its engaging to carry out these improvements, the Bombay Municipality might as reasonably be relieved of it in consideration of the vast amount it has spent and is spending on such sanitary works as the underground drainage and the Tansa lake, and of the annual charge it is incurring on the conservancy of the city. For these and other great works it has to provide about Rs. 18,00,000 for debt charges alone. Does not Bombay deserve as well of Government as Calcutta? If the question be considered on the broad grounds of justice and equity, we believe we are not mistaken in adhering to the opinion that the heavy demand made upon the municipality is not justifiable. [The Kaiser-e-Hind (87) and the Gujarátí (83), in their issues of the same date, express similar sentiments.]

42. The Indu Prakash (14), in its issue of the 14th December, writes:—The appeal to Cæsar which the Bombay Municipal Corporation made in the matter of its dispute relating to its liability for the cost of the city police has resulted in, what may fairly be claimed, a victory for the Corporation. The Government of India has decided that "the Corporation should bear the cost of the city police, less any sum not exceeding 25 per cent. of the total cost, and not less than Rs. 90,000 a year, which the Government may think fit to contribute towards it, and less any charges not legally incumbent on the municipality of which the municipality has relieved, or may, in future, relieve the State, e.g., the maintenance of the Queen's Statue and the Victoria Albert Museum." By this decision the Corporation makes a distinct gain in so far as it has got declared and affirmed once for all the liability of the Government to contribute its share of the cost, which the latter was seeking and had already threatened to evade. This arrangement, though more favourable than the proposal of the local Government, is not entirely satisfactory. Now that the court of appeal has given its decision we doubt if it could be altered; but if it is possible to get a review, we should like to have the arrangement modified to a certain extent. In the first place, we should like that the Corporation should accept in exchange for the police charges some equivalent items of State expenditure. We are sorry the offer which was made in 1887 was not accepted. If it is possible to get the offer renewed, an effort should certainly be made to have a transfer of liability. As a matter of principle the municipality should have to pay for those branches of administration over which it can exercise full control. It cannot properly be entrusted with the control of the police. At the same time it has made itself liable to pay a certain amount towards its cost. The municipality, without denying its liability for the amount it has been spending, may ask to spend the same amount upon some works of which it can legitimately claim to have control. If, however, it is no longer open for the municipality to have this choice, and if it must pay its customary quota of police charges, its liability should at least be defined specifically once for all. Let it be settled, as the municipality itself offered, that its share shall be three-fourths and that of the Government one-fourth. The present arrangement of varying limits leaves it open to the local Government to stick to the minimum and leave the major portion of the burden on the municipality. Such an arrangement in a growing city like Bombay can hardly be satisfactory. The Government of India, now that it has intervened, should settle the question finally.

Infectious Diseases Hospitals in Bombay and the local municipality.

43. In noticing the resolution of Government in the General Department dated the 15th instant, on the question of the maintenance of one or more hospitals in Bombay for the reception and treatment of persons suffering from cholera, small-pox and relaxing fever, that is being discussed with the Bombay Municipality, the Bombay Samachar (95) and the Jám-e-Jamshed (86) of the 19th idem observe that no reasons have been given by Government for not treating any longer cases of infectious diseases in general hospitals in which such cases have been received for a long number of years, advise the Corporation to let Government use the bludgeon clause as threatened, if it be so minded, and allow the rate-payers to see that an indispensable necessity exists for being prepared to have the Bombay Municipal Act subjected to amendments in regard to several shortcomings that are to be found in it.

Part IV.—Native States.

Remarks on the administration of the State of Hyderabad (Deccan).

44. The Subodh Patrika (18), in its issue of the 13th December, writes:—His Highness the Nizám's Government has of late been issuing from time to time well-written State papers breathing an enlightened and liberal spirit. The latest document of the kind was His Highness' letter to the Minister, in which he gave reasons (and they were very good ones) for which he threw aside the pride and prejudice of an Oriental ruler and chose to appear as a witness before a commission of enquiry in a case to which he himself was a party. This act of the Nizám procured for His Highness deserved credit and applause from all sides, and, taken together with the State papers mentioned above, would indicate a spirit of broad liberality in the Government of his State. But, after all, the best proof of the reality of such spirit can only be found in the character of the administration and the scrupulous care with which the taxes levied from the subjects are devoted to their welfare. Judged by this standard we are afraid the Hyderabad State will not rank very high among its contemporaries, not to speak of other transactions involving a prodigal use of the public funds. The purchase of the now notorious diamond alone shows little regard for due economy. The Nizám's Regalia is declared by an American connoisseur who had an opportunity of examining it personally to be the most splendid in the world, and certainly there was no special need to add to it Jacob's stone at a cost nearly of half a kror, especially at a time when famine is threatening a good portion of the dominions. For even if the diamond is not purchased and the case be won by the Nizám, the transaction is certain to entail an amount of expense which would have gone some way to relieve or avert the impending distress among his subjects. Then, again, though there is much noise about education, all that is heard of is that one or two institutions exist at head-quarters for the instruction of the higher class Mahomedans and very little seems to be done for the education of the common people or the tax-payers, the bulk of whom are Hindus. We speak under correction and would be glad to know that we are mistaken. A liberal grant is made by the Nizám to the Mahomedan College at Alighar. Recently this grant is stated to have been raised from Rs. 1,000 to Rs. 2,000 per month. But if what a Calcutta paper alleges be true, one is reminded by it of Peter being robbed to pay Paul; for, the allegation is that money for this increased grant to the Alighar institution has been found from deductions made from the salaries of officials, both Mahomedan and Hindu alike. Here again we speak subject to correction, but altogether we must say that the Hyderabad administration has to make much progress before it can be said that it has reached the level indicated by enlightened official manifestoes.

The alleged order of the Thákor of Morvi for the compulsory education of his subjects commented upon.

45. In alluding to the report that an order has been issued by His Highness the Thákor of Morvi for the compulsory education of his subjects, the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 14th December, observes:—The order is said to require that children between the ages of 2½ and 8 are to be sent to schools, and persons found disregarding this order will be punished for disobedience. If such a mandate as this has been actually issued, it is sure to prejudice the interests of the people of Morvi. Compulsory education cannot suit the poverty-stricken condition of the subjects of Morvi, and their circumstances ought to be improved before the people are compelled to adopt the rule of compulsory education. Certainly, what was not considered by the Bombay Government a short time ago to be suitable to the circumstances of the citizens of Poona cannot be held to be fit for the people of Morvi, and the alleged order of the Thákor must be held to be quite premature.

46. The Rájyabhakta (116), in its issue of the 15th December, is glad that His Highness the Thákor of Morvi has recently issued a notification making the education of boys in his State compulsory, says that as education has not yet made sufficient progress in Native States the people therein cannot generally obtain an honest livelihood and have frequent recourse to dishonest means, and that therefore the Thákor, who has introduced several other reforms, must be congratulated upon this order. The paper hopes that other Native Chiefs will follow suit. [The Gujarát Mitra (84) and the Hitechchhu (85) of Ahmedabad also, in their issues of the 13th and 17th December, express gratification at the order issued by the Thákor.]

Notes.—A. The notices from the different Newspapers have been collected in the Report under different heads which are printed in italics.

B. The names of Newspapers are printed in the body of the Report in italics, and the number of the Newspaper in the above list is printed in brackets after the name.

C. The system of spelling vernacular words followed by the Reporter is the same as that adopted in the Official Spelling List of the Bombay Presidency. One peculiar feature of this system is that when the long a (आ or ā) is the last letter of a word, the accent is left out, and the short a (अ = u in gun) is, to prevent confusion, never placed at the end of a word. This rule has been strictly followed, except that when the short a appears to be absolutely necessary to complete the pronunciation of a word, as in Arunodaya or the well known Mitra, it is printed with a mark over it to indicate that it is short, thus—ă.

PART I.—Politics and the Public Administration.

1. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 20th December, reproduces from the India newspaper the following catechism for British electors:—Question.—What is the condition of the Indian people under British rule? Answer.—The great mass of the people are miserably poor, living from hand to mouth upon an insufficient quantity of the coarsest grain. They have no savings, and are hopelessly in debt to the money-lenders. Their condition is, therefore, most precarious, and one bad harvest is sufficient to cause millions to die of starvation. During eighteen years there were sixteen great famines, in which twelve millions died of hunger. In the Madras and Bombay famine alone in 1876-77, five and a half millions died, that is, a number larger than the whole population of Ireland. Question.—What is the cause of this extreme poverty? Answer.—The soil of India is fertile, and the Indian cultivators are very skilful and industrious. With good administration the country would be a garden. The extreme poverty of the Indian people is caused by the errors and extravagance of the Government, which is entirely in the hands of English civil and military officials. The interest of these officials is adverse to peace, economy and reform. They carry on wars of aggression, such as those in Afghanistan and Burmah, and thereby gain distinction and promotion for themselves; they draw salaries far in excess of those paid to any other class of officials in the world; and they overtax the people, making them pay in proportion double the taxation paid in Great Britain. Being foreigners they are ignorant of the needs and wishes of the people. Question.—Does the taxation press heavily upon the poor? Answer.—Yes. For example, there is the tax upon salt, which is a necessary of life to the Indian vegetarian. The Government maintain a monopoly of salt and charge the people twenty times what it costs them. The average income of the Indian people is three half-pence per day. So that they cannot afford to buy enough of this dear salt, and much disease and suffering are the result. In England the average consumption of salt is 50 lbs. per head per annum; in India it is only 10 lbs. Harsh and cruel laws are passed to punish any one who uses any but Government salt. Question.—Have the Indian people no voice in the management of their affairs? Answer.—None at all. One British elector has more direct power over the affairs of India than the two hundred and twenty millions of British Indian citizens all put together. Question.—Do not the Indian people complain? Answer.—Yes, constantly; but they obtain no redress. Their only appeal lies to the India Office in London, and the authorities in the India Office are retired Indian officials,—the very persons against whom the complaints are made. Question.—Do they not petition Parliament? Answer.—Last year eight hundred petitions were presented from India, containing nearly half-a-million signatures. But the majority of members of Parliament are utterly indifferent to Indian affairs, because no votes depend upon them. Question.—Who, then, is responsible for all this wrong-doing and suffering? Answer.—The British elector. Because he alone has the power, and it is his duty to see that justice is done. A combination of effort on the part of the various committees in India which, we take it, will be charged with the work that has to be done there, and of the British committee, if energetically and painstakingly undertaken, cannot fail to make the Indian National Congress session of 1893 in England an epoch in the history of the relations existing between India and the sovereign power which controls India's destinies.

"Poverty and starvation in India: who is responsible?"

2. The Hindustán (106), in its issue of the 20th December, observes:—After several foreign yokes and vicissitudes India was about to gain undisturbed tranquillity and peace under the British Government, which has been so full of blessings to the country, but the disquieting news of Russia's movements in Central Asia and her advance towards this country has unnerved and caused anxiety to the people. India's passing under foreign rule was due to want of unity among the Natives, which has made them impotent. It will, therefore, be a pity if Russia makes an advance upon the country, for the people of India will not be able to assist in resisting it. We, however, would recommend our Native brethren to shake off their lethargy, which has proved India's bane, and to remember that until they drive away disunion from among them, the political regeneration of India will be out of the question. May God infuse into India's people a desire to rise above their present low level, and make the stay of the benign British Government permanent and abiding in India!

Comments on the reply of Government to the petition made on behalf of Indian traders in South Africa.

3. The Rást Goftár (88), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The Bombay Government has stated in reply to the petition made on behalf of Indian traders in South Africa that it is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government. The petition having been made some months ago, the reply is somewhat tardy, and it is also rather disappointing inasmuch as it indicates no period within which the petitioners may expect a final decision from the authorities. The Indian traders in the British colonies in South Africa, and, for the matter of that, in other settlements established by foreign powers in that part of the world, are subjected to gross ill-treatment by the European settlers. They regard the Indians as intruders, who have no business to go there, and reap the fruits of their thrift, industry and enterprise. The money they acquire is so much of the substance of the lands carried away by persons who have no natural right to it. The colonists can tolerate Indian coolies, whose hard work can only go to advance and enrich the Europeans; but they cherish a mortal hatred of Indian merchants, whose work only goes to enrich themselves. Those traders must have some good qualities, along with some bad ones, to be able to beat the natives in their own country and on their own ground. It is attempted to bear the former down with heavy disabilities. They are subjected to galling affronts, and they can often obtain no redress in courts of law for personal insults or injuries suffered from the white man. Yet, like the Jews, they have vitality enough to outlive the insults, injuries and disabilities that are heaped upon them, and to thrive in spite of them all. Their triumph over all these difficulties is most exasperating to the colonists, and their Governments are now contemplating measures for the expulsion, bag and baggage, of these obnoxious aliens from their territories. The Chinese are now forbidden a home in Australia and in America, which is the first among the lands of freedom in the world. These countries have denied themselves the benefit of their cheap labour and their thrifty and industrious habits, in order to protect their own workmen against being undersold by the abstemious and plain-living foreigner. The Jews are laid, for much the same reason, under a cruel ban in Russia, where thousands of their families are rigorously driven from their homes and deprived of the means of subsistence. It is a pitiful commentary on modern civilization that it is unable to stand the competition of persons hailing from distant and less civilized lands, and that it can see no way out of the results of their inconvenient success, but by subjecting them to harsh and unjust disabilities, or by devising measures for their expulsion. Such partial laws are especially unworthy of States which boast of their freedom. They are a shocking reaction against the doctrines of free-trade and international brotherhood, which were so persistently proclaimed by Cobden and Bright.

Candidature of Mr. Dádábhái Navroji to enter Parliament and the attitude of the Liberal party in England in the matter.

4. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The story of Mr. Dádábhái Navroji's uphill struggle at Central Finsbury is, indeed, a painful one. It is the more disappointing because of the attitude of the Liberal party managers, whose methods, we are constrained to say, are the reverse of speeding India's dear and respected representative in England on his mission. The indiscreet language employed by Lord Salisbury in regard to Mr. Dádábhái Navroji and the unsympathetic attitude of his party in general towards the question of Indian reform, have well nigh alienated the sympathy of the people of this country from them. But it is to be deeply regretted that the Liberals, whose professions of good-will and warm sympathy have always led us to look to them as our friends willing to lend us a helping hand, should have acted in Central Finsbury towards India's Grand Old Man in a manner which has occasioned not only bitter disappointment in the hearts of thousands of our countrymen, but also not a little indignation at their attitude, which is scarcely defensible in the light of the promises they made to Mr. Dádábhái when he first entered the political arena. If our Liberal friends think over the present situation calmly they will find that they are repeating the mistake committed by the Conservative Premier even in a more objectionable form, and that they are converting by their action their Indian friends and supporters into unfriendly malcontents. Whether the question is looked at strictly from the party point of view or from the imperial one, we feel it our duty to warn the Liberal party against their present tactics in Central Finsbury. Either Mr. Dádábhái Navroji should be honestly and loyally supported in the constituency which he has been so long wooing under so disadvantageous circumstances, or he should be assured of a seat in some other constituency. India has a claim to ask the Liberals to fulfil their promises as just and righteous Englishmen, and also as upholders of political principles to which their present attitude is entirely opposed. In what great esteem and respect Mr. Dádábhái is held by his countrymen is well evidenced by the resolution which is to be placed before the Nágpur Congress.

5. The same newspaper writes :—We have already expressed our conviction that it is very difficult to procure for the Indian National Congress one hundred delegates of the requisite mental capacity and with the required stock of knowledge of the problems of Indian reform and the means of bearing the heavy expenses of a trip to England. If there is to be a Congress in London it ought to be a real success, otherwise it is no use attempting a feat beyond the capacity of our politicians. Nay, it would be distinctly suicidal to enter upon such an arduous and expensive undertaking. The question of holding the National Congress in India every year also needs serious consideration. If the Congress-ship is destined to founder, it is likely to founder on the financial rock, and it is doubtful if the annual strain of the Congress sessions can be successfully borne by the different provinces for any length of time. A suggestion has been made to fix a permanent home for the Congress at some central place like Jabalpur. From a financial point of view it is undoubtedly a good suggestion. But there are other considerations which demand serious thought. We have always looked upon the Congress movement as an organized constitutional attempt to educate public opinion and put Government in possession of the aims and aspirations of the subject populations. We put the educational value of the movement far higher than its tangible results or financial considerations. But the latter none the less deserve to be taken into account. Supposing a permanent home were erected for the Congress, many of the educational advantages accruing from its migratory character would be lost. There can be no real exchange of thought and feeling between Bengalis, Madrasis, Maráthás, and Panjábis by meeting every year in one and the same pavilion. Much of the charm of novelty and of a change of scene will wholly disappear and no close knowledge of the people of the different provinces will be promoted. Upon this ground we are entirely opposed to the permanent location of the Congress. Is there, then, any solution of the difficulty which will lighten the strain of financial obligations and, at the same time, secure the educational advantages to which we have already referred? We are inclined to think that there should be a triennial Congress, and the interval of three years should every time be utilized for promoting provincial conferences, collecting information and establishing Congress organizations in important district towns. It is generally objected to this proposal that it would kill the Congress. We reply that it is the present system that is calculated to kill the movement outright some day. We strongly maintain that by allowing a period of rest, the province which will be called upon to arrange for the triennial Congress would, out of considerations of mere shame, if for no other, do its best not to stigmatize itself as having proved instrumental in bringing about the final collapse of the movement. Besides, by conserving their resources, Congressmen would be less reluctant than now to put their hands deep into their pockets after an interval of three years. So that it will be seen that even from the financial aspect the project of a triennial Congress ought to commend itself to our countrymen in general. The idea of a yearly Congress looks sufficiently tempting. But many fail to see the lurking danger. The proposal to hold a Congress at a central place is plausible to outward appearance; but if it is carefully examined, it will be found to be wanting in the one element which is conducive to the success of the movement. The only alternative which more or less combines the useful features of both the preceding schemes is that of holding a triennial Congress. From the educational as well as the financial point of view it is the most acceptable, and we commend it to the thoughtful consideration of the Nágpur Congress.

Remarks on an address recently delivered by His Excellency Lord Harris at Bombay.

6. In noticing the address delivered by His Excellency Lord Harris at the opening ceremony in connection with the girls' new dormitory of the American Maráthi Mission at Bombay, the Jám-e-Jamshed (86), in its issue of the 21st December, says:—The American missionaries, while imparting secular education, give more importance to Christian instruction, and have thrown their schools open only to those who are prepared to receive mixed education. Hence the remark made by His Excellency in connection with the new mission dormitory, that Government can far more readily give its help to such institutions than where assistance is required for class or caste purposes, is likely to create a fearful suspicion and misunderstanding among the Native public. The people of India are grateful to Christian missionaries for their sympathy and disinterested efforts to push forward the cause of secular education; but where the question of religious education comes forward, there the Indian officials, and particularly the heads of administrations, will do well to strictly follow the policy of Government as regards non-interference with religious education, in order that no misunderstanding on the subject may arise between the governors and the governed. Of course, no objection whatever could be taken to the greater desire and readiness of Government to give assistance to schools that are attended by all classes of the people than to institutions attended by Hindus, Pársis, or Mahomedans alone; but the institutions conducted by the American missions give religious education, and hence the appropriateness of the remark made by His Excellency is questionable. We trust no invidious distinction was meant by His Excellency when he made the remark above referred to.

Remarks on the address delivered by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Bombay, at the Rájkumár College, Rájkot.

7. The Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The recent frank and manly address of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to the students of the Rájkumár College at Rájkot deserves more than a passing mention. We may revert to it in future. Meanwhile, we cannot help saying that unless Sir George Greaves is prepared, like His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, to put into practice the excellent military sermon he has preached, he will lay himself open to a charge of tantalizing the Rájkumárs of Káthiáwár. But Sir George is too good a soldier and gentleman to give hopes which he will not help to realize to the best of his powers. We trust it may be given to His Excellency to take up the very important proposals made by his predecessor in office, which the higher authorities have not yet been able to negative, however slow they may be to move with the spirit of the times. To us the question of a regular military training for cadets of the princely families in India seems to be more practical than of volunteering en masse.

8. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The speech which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief delivered at Rájkot to the Rájkumárs attending the college, breathes sentiments of which anybody can be proud. Sir George Greaves, in the first place, tells the public—and the public of England ought to take special note of it—that it is simple nonsense to say that England can do without India and India without England. He says that if England and India do keep together, no power on earth can injure us. This is certainly true to the letter. And, if Indian rulers only fortified themselves with the affection of the people, expenditure in scientific frontier schemes would be altogether needless. To those who deprecate the value of Government service we would commend the remarks of Sir George, wherein he refers to the one advantage which service bestows upon the country. The military head of Government in this province sees that a mixed service has very great advantages both to the rulers and to the ruled. If Natives in the service, the Commander-in-Chief observes, rub shoulders with English gentlemen, that will be good for both. We are so bound together in the future of India, says His Excellency, that the more we know of each other, the better. Any social intercourse between the two races depends for its good results upon the relative positions which they occupy. Sir George speaks truth when he says that it is the rubbing of shoulders together which is of real use. We have observed with the greatest regret that the sáhebs do not condescend to receive even our Princes and Chiefs as they do their brothers in service, irrespective of their relative official ranks, in the evening parties and social gatherings that take place now and then in the several large towns of the presidency. Natives are not treated with proper respect. There is not that rubbing of shoulders which does the good. Sir George Greaves would give the Princes their fit positions in the imperial troops. He tells us that he has been in service for forty-one years, and it would be folly to suppose that he does not know that ranks of officers in the army are not yet thrown open to the Natives. We, therefore, presume that something very happy is in store for the sons of Chiefs and noblemen in the immediate future. It may be that the Royal predecessor of Sir George has moved in the matter and induced Government to institute a statutory military service similar to the statutory civil service, the death-knell of which was sounded during the administration of Lord Dufferin. The concluding remarks of Sir George Greaves are indeed spirit-stirring, and if the parents and guardians of the young Rájkumárs at Rájkot only follow the advice of Sir George, they will have done ever-lasting service to the British Empire. Sir George tells the Rájkumárs "Give your fathers and relations and the Government of the country no peace until they have found employment for you." The only employment consistent with their position and the requirements of the State is employment in the higher ranks of the military service, and these can only be obtained after these Kumárs have passed through regular military training in an Indian Sandhurst. Our contemporary of the Times of India makes very useful reference to this movement in commenting upon the speech of Sir George Greaves. Indian Princes and noblemen ought now to come to the front and put life and vigour into the Duke of Connaught Memorial Fund movement. The Committee of the Deccan Sardárs ought to take the advice of the Commander-in-Chief and show courage, nerve and determination as their forefathers did in good old days. The subject is very important, and it is high time, we believe, that it should be placed before the public of England. Cannot the Deccan Sardárs send a deputation to England and move the Secretary of State to induce the Government of India to reconsider their decision?

9. The Indu Prakásh (14), in its issue of the 21st December, writes:—The address delivered to the Princes of the Rájkumár College by Sir George Greaves the other day was remarkable for its outspoken advocacy of the necessity of opening higher military service in India to Native families of high birth and position. "If you ask me what you should do," said he to the Kumárs, "I would say, 'soldier, soldier, every one of you,' and when soldiering in the regular army has disciplined your minds and given you practice in that which you were born to—leading men—go back to your Ráj and your estates, and take your place in the government of men and in the management of your affairs." Sir George Greaves promises the Kumárs that a day will come when they will be given that share in the affairs of this great and glorious India which their birth and position have rendered them eligible for. We do not know if the day will ever come, for we do not know if the policy of distrust and suspicion which obtains at present will ever be replaced by one of trust and confidence. The project of an Indian Sandhurst, although started under the best auspices, fell through, and we know well why. The same questionable policy will also come in the way of Sir George Greaves' promised dream. Those whose political creed is to divide and rule will see nothing but mischief in the aims of Sir George Greaves; and it is quite possible that Sir George will receive a courteous reproof for what are likely to be thought his frightfully outspoken and rather mischievous utterances at Rájkot. [The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 20th December, says that it is much pleased with the address of the Commander-in-Chief, as it is manly, straightforward and free from cunning, and hopes that the Rájkumárs will learn it by heart.]

10. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 20th December, approves of the advice given by Sir George Greaves to the Rájkumárs, says that it is a happy sign of the times that the Government, who have by disarming the Natives made them effeminate and paid no heed to their clamour that they should treat the Natives with due consideration, have perceived their mistake though so late, hopes that Government will now give proper treatment to Native Chiefs and other Natives, and strongly advises the latter not to waver in their deep loyalty to the British Government.

11. The Anglo-Lusitano (159), in its issue of the 17th December, writes :—

The quantity of salt allowed by the Anglo-Portuguese Treaty for local consumption in Portuguese India.

The quantity of salt allowed by the Anglo-Portuguese Treaty for local consumption in Portuguese India is 14 lbs. per head. It is contended on the Portuguese side that this is insufficient and that it should at least be doubled. The British Government might argue that the allowance of 14 lbs. ought to suffice, considering that the consumption in their own territories is much less. It ought to be noted, however, that the percentage for British districts is arrived at by including in the total population large numbers of people who get no cooked food at all, and, consequently, use no salt. In Portuguese India at least 75 per cent. of the population partake of not less than three full meals, and there is no starving population. Moreover, the habits of the Christian population of Portuguese India as regards food are far different from those of the non-Christian population of British India. But there is no need of these arguments when we have the experience of twelve years to prove that the population of Portuguese India find the quantity of salt allowed by the Treaty insufficient for their wants. The British Government cannot be unaware of the fact that there is general discontent among the people of Portuguese India on this subject. The 14 lbs. per head is allowed at cost price free of duty, the people having to buy any extra quantity they require at an enhanced rate. This being so, and the salt industry being in the hands of the English, it is evident that the British Government are taxing foreign subjects on foreign soil.

12. The Mahomedan Herald (4), in its issue of the 18th December, writes :—

Approval of the appointment of A'ga Akbar Sháh as Sheriff of Bombay for the ensuing year.

We have great pleasure in noticing the appointment of His Highness A'ga Akbar Sháh as Sheriff of Bombay for the next year. It is needless to add that the selection made by Government will satisfy all communities, and especially the Khoja community to which the nominee belongs.

13. The Surya Prakásh (90), in its issue of the 19th December, in common with several of its contemporaries, requests Government to be careful in adopting at once measures for the relief of the famine-stricken in the Madras Presidency and other parts of India, and prays the authorities to stop the export of food grains to Europe as a scarcity of food is already felt in the country.

Relief measures recommended for the famine-stricken districts in India.

14. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 20th December, writes :—

Remarks in connection with the distress prevailing in the affected districts of the Bombay Presidency.

We are glad His Excellency Lord Harris has, as we suggested in our last issue, made up his mind to spend a few days in the districts affected by famine. His Excellency will leave Bombay in Christmas and spend a week between Bijápur and Miraj. This is as it should be, since Government seems to be in earnest and means practical work. According to yesterday's Bombay Gazette, "the outlook is disquieting and there is reason to believe that it will be soon necessary to open relief works, &c." This is good news, but Government ought not to stop here. They will do well to publish in the dailies twice a week what Government does in the matter of relief, so that people will know what is being done. At the same time, we may here draw attention to the serious mistake the managers of the last famine relief-works committed. They prescribed full day's work as the test for the day's relief, and the result was appalling. We hope those in charge of relief will profit themselves by past experience and will not devise hard and fast rules and make the life of the famine-stricken still more miserable.

15. The Arunodaya (21), in its issue of the 20th December, says that there are good grounds to believe that the Bombay Government are taking active steps to relieve people from distress, that the people should be highly thankful for this, that though the present Governor of Bombay is given to play he is not forgetful of the miseries suffered by the people from a scarcity of corn, and that if His Excellency Lord Harris did not allow any people to die of starvation he would earn great credit for administrative tact.

16. The Dhárwár Vritt (32), in its issue of the 17th December, says:—His Excellency Lord Harris deserves praise for resolving to start on a tour through Bijápur and other districts which are visited by famine. We request His Excellency to go to affected villages in those tálukas and personally note the state of the crops and the condition of the rayats and their cattle. His Excellency should be prepared to grant remissions of land assessment and to start relief-works. The condition of the crops in the Gadag, Navalgund and Ron tálukas as described in the Bombay Gazette is quite incorrect. The people in these tálukas have abandoned their homes and cattle, not to go on a pilgrimage, but to save their own lives. No doubt some big merchants have some corn in store, but they do not sell it. Such is the state of the people this year and they will not be able to cultivate their lands next year, unless Government give them tayai to buy cattle and seed with. As the people are reduced to a miserable condition it will be the height of cruelty on the part of Government to try to recover from them two instalments of land assessment at one time. His Excellency the Governor should go through all the distressed tálukas, relieve people from their sufferings, and show them that they are not mistaken in considering the British rule as a paternal Government.

17. The Pratod (60), in its issue of the 21st December, praises His Highness the Nizám's Government for taking timely precautions against the impending famine in some of the districts of that State, refers to the refusal of Mr. Crawley-Boevey, Collector of Dhárwár, to grant a remission of land assessment to the people in his district, and says:—The people of the Gadag Táluka in the Dhárwár District are suffering from famine, and yet they are refused remission of assessment by the hard-hearted Collector. It will be better if Government transfer the Collector to some other district. Distress and scarcity prevail also in the Sátára District, but from the conduct of Mr. Candy, the Collector, in regard to forests and the income-tax it is difficult to foretell how he will behave towards the people of his district. Government should take care not to be guided solely by the reports of district officers as they frequently do not represent correctly the condition of the people, and should bear in mind that it is the Government, and not their district officers, who will be blamed for failing to take proper precautions to save the people from starvation.

Remarks in connection with the Land Indebtedness Commission.

18. The Poona Vaibhav (57), in its issue of the 20th December, disapproves of the appointment of the Honourable Ráo Bahádur K. L. Nulkar on the Land Indebtedness Commission, observing that though he is a Native by birth his views are thoroughly anglicised, that not possessing much knowledge of the real condition of agriculture and the agriculturists he is not likely to be of much use on the Commission, and that his appointment appears to be purposely made by Government with a view to throw dust into the eyes of the public, and remarks:—It would have been better if no Native at all had been appointed on the Commission than to have nominated the Honourable Mr. Nulkar. The Commission should take evidence of those who have suffered by the operation of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act and not of those who have been engaged in supervising its working, as the latter are sure to justify it through selfish motives. Since the introduction of the Act the condition of the agriculturists has become more miserable than before. Government and not the sáwkárs are the cause of the ruin of the agriculturists, who are forced to go to the latter to borrow money. Unless, therefore, a reasonable reduction is made in the assessment, the condition of the agriculturists will remain unimproved in spite of the Deccan Agriculturists' Relief Act.

19. The Kaiser-i-Hind (87), in its issue of the 20th December, approves of the general tenour of the new Factory Act which is to come into force from the 1st proximo, but does not like the limitation put on female labour, approves of the memorial of the female mill hands of Ahmedabad, requests the Bombay Government to recommend the memorial for the favourable consideration of the Supreme Government, and hopes that the memorialists will not be deprived of their bread. [The Hindusthán (106), in its issue of the same date, wishes the Bombay Government to favourably consider the memorial.]

The new Indian Factories Act and the female mill hands at Ahmedabad.

20. A correspondent of the Muswin-i-Majma-i-Muhammadi (153), in its issue of the 7th December, writes:—The Government officers say: The winter has now set in and the touring season commenced. Let us prepare to go on circuit, draw travelling allowances, plunder the people, enjoy pleasures, drink milk, eat goats, fill pockets with money, and engage riding camels. But why engage them on monthly pay? We can get conveyance stage by stage from the Tapedárs and Zamindárs. In God's country we can get what we desire. It is in consideration of the advantages of tour that we incur so much expenditure at head-quarters. Gamblers and pick-pockets enrich themselves at fairs and gatherings, while in our case our tour has the same object. Warn the Zamindárs and subordinate servants of Government to be ready and to collect fuel, grass, fowls and eggs and to be prepared to spend their own pay. Tell them that they have plundered many people, but now monsters are coming. Be careful to serve. Don't mind if your office work be bad.—Oh tour! You have not only disgraced yourself, but have also brought infamy upon officers who pay double prices for the articles they are supplied with. Butlers and Munshis are a source of annoyance to the people, otherwise there are innumerable advantages in officers' tours.

Remarks in connection with the coming winter tours of Government officers in Sind.

21. The Prabhát (155), in its issue of the 5th December, says:—In consequence of the abolition of the Civil Court at Mirpur Batoro, the people are subjected to considerable hardship. Some time ago we showed that in order to effect a small economy Government put the inhabitants of Mirpur to great inconvenience. We are now informed that many people have given up all idea of filing suits against their debtors. Their reason is that the cost of litigation would exceed the amount sought to be recovered. The chief duty which Government owes to the people is to administer justice to them. Now, if Government in order to save only a small sum of money neglect to perform that duty, it does not speak well for them. People will be disappointed and the good name of Government will thereby suffer. The want of a Civil Court at Mirpur Batoro is greatly felt, and the complaints of the people are not without foundation. Every one knows that the expenses of litigation are ruinous. The plaintiff must purchase an expensive stamp before his plaint can be filed or he can be allowed to appear in court. He cannot do without a pleader. Only when he pays a heavy fee to a pleader, does he feel confident of his claim being substantiated, for the decision does not depend entirely upon facts but also upon the technicalities of law. Besides this there are many other expenses to be incurred. But people are accustomed to these inconveniences and expenses. Now if they are required to leave their native places and go about after the Judge, they have got reasonable ground for complaint. It is right that Government should listen to these complaints. We also beg to bring this matter to the notice of the Judicial Commissioner and trust that he will make some arrangement.

Inconvenience alleged to be suffered by the people by the abolition of the Civil Court at Mirpur Batoro in Sind.

22. The Muswin-i-Majma-i-Muhammadi (153), in its issue of the 7th December, says:—It is rumoured that in consequence of the transfer of the engine shed from Radhan to Dádu all the buildings at the former station will be handed over to the Revenue Department and that all the public offices, revenue and judicial, now located at Mehar will be stationed at Radhan. We do not know how far this rumour is true. But if it be true, we are unable to understand why Government should abandon the present building at Mehar, worth thousands of rupees, and change the head-quarters of the táluka. The only advantage that, we understand, will accrue from this transfer is that Government servants will be enabled to go to their native places more rapidly than at present, while the subjects will be put to considerable inconvenience. The town of Mehar is the centre of the táluka. If Government offices are removed therefrom it will become desolate. If the water at Mehar is brackish, sweet water can be easily supplied. To remove offices only on this paltry ground is against common sense. For our own part, we do not think Government will take such a step.

Dissection of the unclaimed corpses of Mahomedans dying in the J. J. Hospital, Bombay, disapproved of by the Mahomedan community.

23. The Bombay Samachár (95), in its issue of the 23rd December, expresses a hope that the prayer which will be shortly submitted to Dr. Gray, Principal of the Grant Medical College, by the Mahomedan community of Bombay in accordance with a resolution passed at a meeting of certain prominent Mahomedan gentlemen of Bombay, to stop the dissection of the unclaimed bodies of Mahomedans who die in the J. J. Hospital and to hand over the corpses to such Mahomedans as may undertake to give them a religious burial, will receive due attention and will be granted at an early date.

Alleged appearance of influenza in Gujarát.

24. The same newspaper, in its issue of the 25th December, says that this year a severe outbreak of fever and cough has appeared in Gujarát, increasing the death-rate of that province, that this epidemic appears to be nothing less than influenza which has made India its home for the last two or three years, and that it behoves Government and the charitable public to ascertain the real nature of the outbreak and to take measures to drive it away or mitigate it.

Disapproval of the opinion recently expressed by Mr Acworth and the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang about the late Vishnu Shástri and his work, entitled, "Nibandhamála."

25. The Kesari (45), in its issue of the 22nd December, refers to the lecture recently delivered by Mr. Acworth, Municipal Commissioner, Bombay, on Maráthi poetry and to the remarks made on that occasion by the chairman, the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang, about the late Vishnu Shástri Chiplunkar and his periodical, the Nibandhamála, disapproves of the opinions expressed by these gentlemen in deprecation of the Nibandhamála, and severely takes the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang to task for some remarks he is reported by a correspondent of the Kesari to have made in contempt of Mr. Vishnu Shástri and his Maráthi essays. The paper adds that the Honourable Mr. Justice Telang has, in his attack on the late Vishnu Shástri, disclosed many of his own defects and that Mr. Telang's knowledge of the Maráthi language is not such as to entitle his opinion about Vishnu Shástri as a prose writer to any weight at the hands of the Maráthi-reading public. [The Dnyán Prakásh (13), in its issue of the 24th December, expresses similar sentiments.]

The organisation of the new Detective Police Department in the Bombay Presidency approved.

26. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 20th December, praises Major J. Humfrey, Inspector-General of Police, Bombay, for his zeal to improve the police force of the presidency, and approves of the new Detective Department organised by him and of the appointment of Ráo Sáheb Prínshankar Tripurúshankar as the head of this department. [The Din Mani (80), in its issue of the 22nd December, expresses similar sentiments.]

A complaint about delay in the delivery of letters at Navsari in the Baroda State.

27. A correspondent of the Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 20th December, complains that the single delivery peon for the Mota Falia section of the town of Navsari in the Baroda State takes about 7 hours to finish his daily work, and that consequently some of the residents of that quarter receive their letters seven hours after arrival of the post and are thereby much inconvenienced, and recommends the postal authorities to engage a second peon.

28. The Muawin-i-Majma-i-Muhammadi (153), in its issue of the 7th December, says:—There is no separate post master at Khairpur Nathe Shah. The postal business is done by a school-master. People are, therefore, obliged to suffer great inconvenience. Formerly when there was a full-time post master on Rs. 20 per mensem, great facilities for the people existed. It is to be wondered at that at the head-quarters of the táluka the postal arrangements are so defective. It is apparent that no stranger will do any work so satisfactorily as he who is specially responsible for it. A man of another department will be bound to give preference to his own legitimate work. It therefore follows that the school-master to whom the postal work is entrusted at Khairpur Nathe Shah will neglect either the school or the postal work. The town of Khairpur is, in many respects, more important than that of Mehar, where there is a separate post master. On the appointment of a full-time post master it is expected that the revenue of the post office at Khairpur will increase. We hope that the authorities will see to this and make some suitable arrangement.

A postal complaint of the people of Khairpur Nathe Shah in Sind.

Part II.—Education.

29. Writing on the Bombay University examinations and the examiners, the Indian Spectator (2), in its issue of the 20th December, says:- Some time ago it was nearly taken for granted that the examiner was infallible. In the course of some five or six years we have seen that public opinion—other than Native public opinion—is greatly changed. This is a clear gain. It is an important concession by our adversaries that there is really something to find fault with in the ways of examiners and of the Syndicate that appoints them and controls or is supposed to control them. If we recur to this subject, to which we have in the past devoted so much space, it is because the recent English paper for the University School Final Examination gives us an apt occasion to point out the old moral once more. This question paper fairly beats all previous question papers. It may be well styled an original production, distancing all its competitors. We are sorry to have to condemn the judgment of the Syndicate in appointing examiners who, it seems, will take some time yet to learn by means of what questions to test the English knowledge of candidates for the University School Final Examination. We have complained before that there are persons who think any examiner may do for the Natives. And with that we come across examiners who think any questions will do to test their knowledge.

The Bombay University examinations and the examiners.

30. The Native Opinion (15), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—Good as the result of the last Second B. A. Examination has been, there is one feature connected with it which requires special notice. Since the departure of Dr. Wordsworth, the charge of the history and political economy chair had come to be entrusted to two competent Native graduates of this University in succession, we mean Professors Banáji and Pádhye. We have always held that of the collegiate chairs, that of English Literature should always be graced by a first-class Oxonian, and that of History and Political Economy and Moral Philosophy by men of the calibre of Professors Wordsworth and Selby. Learning under such men is by itself an advantage, inasmuch as the instruction imparted, not only widens one's breadth of views, but gives a tone to one's thinking faculty. Unfortunately, such teachers as these are rare, and the Educational Department does not seem in a mood to indent upon England any longer for men like Professor Wordsworth. Be that as it may, the special feature of the last B. A. Examination we refer to is that out of some nine students who had taken up history and political economy, about fifty per cent. have passed, one of them coming in the second class. One of the successful students has also carried the James Taylor Prize. Excellent as this result is, it is creditable not only to Professors Banáji and Pádhye, but to their alma mater also. If this experiment proves anything, it proves that where the services of such men as Dr. Wordsworth are not available, or where the responsible authorities are not disposed to engage their services, the services of competent Natives might be preferred to those of second-rate Europeans.

Alleged mismanagement of the Fardunji Sorábji Párakh School of Art at Surat.

31. The Gujardt Darpan (82), in its issue of the 20th December, complains that mismanagement exists in the Fardunji Sorábji Párakh School of Art at Surat, which is maintained jointly by Government and the local municipality. The paper says that this state of things is due to the school committee being composed of inexperienced persons, who are not anxious for the efficient working of the institution and who often change the Superintendent, and is of opinion that if the municipality cannot improve the condition of the school the best course would be for Government to take up its management into their own hands.

Part III.—Railways.

A complaint about the inconvenience suffered by passengers at the Ruk Station on the N.-W. Railway line.

32. The Aftab-i-Sind (152), in its issue of the 2nd December, says:—The hours of arrival and departure of trains running on the frontier of Sind are very inconvenient, and passengers travelling by the up and down mail trains are obliged to wait unnecessarily at the Ruk Station for a long time. No accommodation is provided for them there. They are, therefore, put to great inconvenience, which the railway authorities should try to remove as soon as possible. The winter has set in, and it will be very hard for passengers to lie on the open platform at night. It is not for half an hour or so that they are required to wait, but for four or five hours together. There is no Musáfarkhána, but only one shop at the Ruk Station, and water is sold there at the rate of one glass for a pice. It is only at this station that we hear of such a high price being charged for water. We hope the railway authorities will take notice of this and remove the hardship.

Part IV.—Municipalities.

Remarks on the conduct of the Bombay Government towards the Bombay Municipality in the matter of police charges and the contagious diseases hospitals.

33. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The Bombay Municipal Corporation have had two very tough questions to fight out, viz., the police charges and the contagious diseases hospitals. We regret to find that on both these questions they have lost, with the displeasure of Government in the bargain. We regret the decision of the Government of India in the matter of the police charges, but we regret more the decision of the Government of Bombay in the matter of the hospitals. Government are determined upon taking extreme action and compelling the Corporation to keep the hospitals open during all the twelve months of the year. The cost of doing that is a trifle, but it is the sacrifice of the principle that pains us most. It remains to be seen what action the Corporation takes, and we have little doubt that they will fight the battle to the bitter end. We should very much wish that the Corporation should not yield. Let the Government keep the hospitals, charge the expenditure to the Corporation and recover it from its funds. In the meantime, an appeal should be made to the higher authorities. If they fail to get justice there, let the matter be taken to Parliament. If the representatives of the presidency town, who have a good cause and all the means at command, do not show sufficient rigidity of character, they will not only reduce their own worth, but encourage District Collectors to pounce upon the rights of the smaller municipalities.

34. The Kaiser-e-Hind (87), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The Government of Bombay is evidently on the war-path. This is to be expected so long as it has at its back an adviser like Mr. Lee-Warner. He brought the Government into ill odour by his ill-advised skirmishes with the Poona Municipality. Having been utterly routed there, he has since been trying conclusions with the Bombay Municipal Corporation. But, as we said before, he is destined to achieve anything but glory. He may ever so many times drag out

"historical" documents so-called from their damp and dank cellars,—now a century old State instruction, now a thirty years old educational letter,—but these will avail him not. Neither will distorted statements and reports of hocus-pocus committees specially formed to register foregone conclusions would be of any advantage. They are dross and may be consigned to the bottom of the sea. It must have gone hard with the Provincial Government to find the Supreme Government brushing aside the "historical" argument, directing it to continue the minimum contribution from which it threatened to exempt itself, and giving a sharp reminder that it has been extravagant in its demands regardless of existing facts, such as the insignificant increase in the population of the city. The Government of India's reply is, if closely looked into, half the victory of the Corporation. But the Corporation should not rest content with that alone. We see that Mr. Geary is courteous enough not to allow the local Government to suffer another humiliating defeat. He is anxious to let things alone. So he wishes the Corporation to accept the proposals embodied in the reply of the Government of Bombay. This will never do. The Corporation has throughout rested its case on right principles, and right principles must triumph in the end, notwithstanding the dust-storm that may be artificially raised round it. The Corporation, pace the "slavists," feels that full justice is not yet done even by the Government of India, so that it is necessary to appeal to the Secretary of State. There is even a strong feeling on the subject outside the Corporation Hall—a feeling which the latest demand for the maintenance of the contagious diseases hospital has vastly aggravated. There is a sullen dissatisfaction at the arbitrary and one-sided procedure of the local authorities. So much is the depth of this angry feeling that we have heard on very good authority that there is about to be held a public meeting of the rate-payers to indignantly protest against the way in which the additional police charges are to be foisted on them. The protest will be in support of the Corporation's proposal to appeal to the Secretary of State. We are glad to see Mr. P. M. Mehta is once more forward in the matter, and we wish him every success in his new agitation on behalf of the best interests of the city. Meanwhile the municipal whip has gone the round of our daily contemporaries, vociferously urging members to be present at both Monday's and Wednesday's meetings, so that it is clear the Government clique is going to have a packed meeting and catch votes for the mábáp (?) Sarkár!

35. The Gujarátí (83), in its issue of the 20th December, observes:—From the heavy pecuniary liabilities which the Bombay Government are trying to throw upon the Municipal Corporation of Bombay in connection with the police force, primary education and the maintenance of hospitals for infectious diseases, it appears that the local Government do not care for the unreasonableness of their demands and are acting high-handedly, and it is much to be regretted that the Supreme Government should sit silent on an important occasion like this. Thus the franchise of local self-government bestowed on the Corporation is a mere sham and the Corporation is being persistently denied its privileges and burdened with more charges than it is bound to pay under the new Municipal Act. It is therefore high time that a Commission should be appointed to fix the respective liabilities of the Corporation and the Government, and if this be not done soon the Corporation will be frequently threatened by Government with the bludgeon clauses.

Remarks in connection with the proposed imposition of a house-tax in Hyderabad and Shikárpur (Sind).

36. The Phœnix (6), in its issue of the 19th December, writes:—Our readers are aware of the exceedingly well meant attempt of the Bombay Government to coax or intimidate the municipalities of Hyderabad and Shikárpur into the imposition of a house-tax, and they have also learnt from our news-columns about the stout resistance offered to these measures by both the cities, in spite of the unavailing bluster of over-zealous officials. We feel that the tax should not have been pressed so unconstitutionally, and that the opposition should have given greater consideration to the scheme of the local Government, and we proceed to give our reasons. Firstly, and this, though unperceived, lies at the bottom of the agitation, there is a lurking suspicion about the sincerity of Government motives The suspicion may be unjust, but there is a great deal to suggest it. To hear official apologists of the house-tax discourse learnedly on the evils of octroi and the consequent hardships on the poor, is like hearing the Devil quote scripture. A Government responsible for the salt-tax maintained (and rightly maintained) in the face of the demonstrated burden it is to the poor, cannot decently preach sermons on the iniquity of the comparatively innocent octroi. Again, the readiness with which Government multiplies municipalities in small places and then proceeds to throw on them its own educational and police charges, appears to give colour to the view that local self-government is meant not as an educational instrument in the art of government, but as an engine of increased direct taxation which the Government does not dare to impose itself. It does not do to show any balances in the budgets, for the municipalities fear being saddled with new duties. But, secondly, it is denied that the octroi is any hardship to the poor. The old creed of the elasticity of taxation, which gave a sure guarantee of the diffusion of taxes on commodities until they reached the consumer, is a dogma now discarded by every economist of repute. The newer doctrine is that burdens have a tendency to remain where originally laid by the Government, unless they are passed on by the special effort of the classes thus taxed. This special effort will be unequally made by the different classes—a fact which has very important practical consequences. It thus results that a new duty on a commodity quickly increases the price by the whole amount or more than the amount of the duty, whereas the reduction or abolition of a duty does not lead to a corresponding reduction of price. The reason is that a few dealers, alive to their own interests, quickly combine or otherwise raise the prices, but in the retail market the scattered units of consumers are perfectly helpless, and are totally incapable of making an effort to shake off the old burden, which, therefore, in a great measure sticks to them. Perhaps there is no retail market in the world with more intelligent consumers than the London market; but the abolition of the London coal-duty is an eye-opener. Coal has not been diminished in price; and this viscosity is not wholly accounted for by the advance in the wholesale prices of coal and the miners' strikes. We presume that Messrs. James, Urquhart, Woodburn and Barrow are Tories—all Anglo-Indians are; they know no better, and we guess they do not scruple to take up the favourite refrain of the London Tory organs against the London Country Council. Has it ever occurred to them that the great part of the unpopularity of the Country Council is due to the increase of rates made necessary by the abolition of the coal duty, while the prices of coal do not stand appreciably lower? With that example of the impatience of that pattern of humanity—the English householder—our municipalities are not likely to provoke a similar demonstration against themselves. But here in India there is greater reason for caution. Customary prices here rule largely; therefore the abolition of the octroi is merely putting into the pockets of the trader the sum which the municipalities are compelled to forego. It is useless to quote the variations in the prices of salt with the salt-duty; the conditions of the manufacture and sale of salt are different. But, thirdly, while any relief to the poor by a remission of octroi is, at the least, questionable, the burden of the house-tax on the poor and the rich alike is only too apparent. But we have already allowed ourselves the luxury of an unusually long article. We must, therefore, postpone for the next issue the remaining considerations which make for the position of the opposition, and one very important reason, on the Government side, which entitled the Government proposition to greater consideration than it has received.

37. The Sind Sudhár (157), in its issue of the 5th December, says:—One of the several grievances which the Mahomedans of Sind set forth in their address to His Excellency Lord Harris was that the present election system prevailing in the municipalities, i. e., the one by which the town was divided into wards and each ward required to return its own member, should be discontinued. They contended that by that principle of election Mahomedans were precluded from obtaining seats on municipal boards. They therefore expressed their opinion that, as was suggested by Mr. Erskine, a certain number of representatives should be chosen from each sect and community, as they said that by that arrangement all communities could be fairly represented on municipal boards. We are not aware whether

The Mahomedans in Sind and local self-government.

Mr. Erskine was of opinion that each community should be allowed the right of returning its own members, but we dare say that the present system of election by wards works satisfactorily. In matters of this kind no partiality should be shown to any particular religion. If in choosing members preference is given to any religion, it is certain that the work will not go on properly and that no improvement can ever be expected. If any member is returned by Hindus and Mahomedans together, it is certain that he will be bound to protect the interest of both the communities and thus no dispute will arise. In the beginning, when Government intended to divide towns into wards and to choose one or two members for each ward, the subject was thoroughly discussed in newspapers and the Sabhas and associations publicly stated that the nomination of members by communities and religions would produce religious complications. Lord Ripon has undoubtedly conferred a great boon on the people of India by introducing a local self-government scheme, but the good results of local self-government have not yet been realized. In order to secure all the advantages intended to be conferred by the local self-government scheme, it is necessary that the people should unite and the voters should be competent, intelligent and careful. Most of the present voters do not even understand the meaning of the word vote. This is a great defect which should be remedied. Only those persons should be allowed to vote who understand their responsibility. If this is done nobody will blame the local self-government scheme.

Part V.—Native States.

The Manipur tragedy and the alleged cause of Mahárája Surchandra's death.

38. The Mahratta (5), in its issue of the 20th December, writes:—The Manipur tragedy has closed, and closed, perhaps, for ever. Nobody will ever re-open it. But the sorrowful facts in it will ever remain staring the administration of Lord Lansdowne full in the face. They have brought disgrace upon many, and the British nation must bring to book those through whose ignorance, neglect or obstinacy the disgrace was brought upon them. The circumstances connected with Mahárája Surchandra's death call for an enquiry, and if the enquiry is not held and public mind satisfied, a deep discontent will have been caused. The Mahárája's death is attributed to starvation and its results, and the country has a right to ask why the charge so publicly made has not been explained away. It ought to be disproved at the earliest day.

The Manipur affairs and remarks thereon.

39. The Gujarát Mitra (84), in its issue of the 20th December, observes:—The manner in which the late Malhárráo Gáikwád of Baroda was arrested while he was on a visit to the Resident and the attempt made by the late Mr. Quinton to arrest the Jubráj of Manipur in open Darbár, indicate dishonest motives on the part of Government. Such arrests make the Native Chiefs look upon Residents and their Darbárs with suspicion. Government should therefore issue a regular warrant whenever they may want to arrest a Native Prince and send a small military force to his place of residence to give effect to the warrant, without giving him previous intimation, even at the risk of bloodshed, which, indeed, would be preferable to loss of honour and prestige of the paramount power. Both Mr. Quinton and the Jubráj deserve censure, and it is gratifying that the Secretary of State for India has acknowledged the mistake of the British officer.

Alleged prevalence of a fever epidemic in Káthiáwár and a suggestion to the Political Agent and the Native States in the province.

40. The Káthiáwár Times (3), in its issue of the 21st December, writes:—An epidemic of fever has been raging for a month almost throughout the province of Káthiáwár—rather an unusual thing at this time of the year. It is accompanied with nasty cough and sore throat. In some of the districts a large number of people has already succumbed to it, and it is believed that if mortuary returns are called for ten per cent. of the deaths, over and above the usual death-rate, would come to be ascribed to the epidemic. We know not what steps the Agency and the Native Princes have taken to check the further spread of the fever; but if no steps have been taken, which is by no means probable, with Mr. Ollivant as Political Agent, it would be very advisable to impress upon all Print officers and the States the extreme necessity for adopting immediate precautions for preventing further mischief by detailing hospital assistants to attend upon the people at convenient localities or at their houses, if need be. In short, resort may be had to the arrangement generally adopted at the time of cholera epidemics. In Rájkot itself a large number of people are laid up with fever in the Civil Station and a larger still in the city. It would be well, we think, if hospital assistants were ordered to attend upon the people, supplying free medicines to such as cannot afford to pay for them.

41. A correspondent of the Bombay Samáchár (95), in its issue of the 25th December, states that on or about the 17th instant the village of Lákhávád in the Vánkáner State in the Káthiáwár Agency was plundered by a gang of armed dacoits, who carried away valuables worth about Rs. 2,500.

Perpetration of dacoity in the State of Vánkáner in the Káthiáwár Agency.

1. The Pramod Sindhu (1), in its issue of the 23rd December, writes:—

A certain change in the new rules about legal practitioners in Berár recommended.

We are very happy to note that Mr. Gopálráo Wáman Bápat, B.A., son of our popular Extra Assistant Commissioner Mr. Wámanráo Bápat, has successfully passed the examination for the degree of LL.B. of the University of Bombay. He is a young gentleman of great promise, was educated at one of our local High Schools, and held a scholarship of Rs. 20 a month as a Berár student. We congratulate him heartily and wish him a long and useful career. By his well deserved success the contingency contemplated by us in reviewing the new rules about the legal practitioners in Berár has come to pass, and the question then raised as speculative may now properly be put as requiring immediate solution at the hands of our Local Government. Under the rules now before us no High Court Vakil can be allowed to practise here as a lawyer unless he has exercised his profession for at least 3 years in the High Court in which he is first enrolled. Shall we then keep Mr. Gopálráo out of his profession for that long period to carry out the rule? Such a course would be absurd in the extreme. He was brought up at one of our High Schools. We encouraged him to study at an University by paying him Rs. 20 a month for three years. He has fulfilled our expectations and taken two high degrees and is now qualified to take rank among the respected High Court Vakils of Bombay, and may easily choose to return to the scenes of his youth to carry on his profession and give the advantage of his "book-learned skill." Since this province helped him in his education it is but proper that the people of this province should reap the benefit of his learning. The rule mentioned above, however, comes in the way and the question is, should the said rule be allowed to stand as it is? We pointed out before the desirability of so modifying it as to admit Berár students at once, and we repeat the same recommendation now. As stated before, it appears to us that the framers of the rule inadvertently forgot to make the provision we demand, and it is now time that the same should be formally introduced. There are many similar cases and they may come to the front any time within a few years hence.

2. The same newspaper says that last week a highway robbery was committed on the road between Amráoti and Elichpur and ornaments worth about three thousand rupees that were on the person of the wife of Mr. Dinkar Náráyan, a well-known pleader of Elichpur, were carried away, that it is surprising that people should be robbed of their property on a road of such extensive traffic, and that it will be unsafe to use the road unless the offenders are at once detected and severely dealt with according to law.
